TEAHAN et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

S. F. 13830.

Supreme Court of California.

Sept. 29, 1930.

1. Admiralty ⇨13.

Assistant wharfinger employed by city held land employee, and contract of employment not maritime.

Employee was charged with the care and custody of goods and property placed on the dock adjacent to navigable waters. He was required to check all property arriving on or leaving wharf, but took no part in actual loading or unloading of vessels. Ordinarily, manifest papers of vessels tied to dock were delivered to him on land, though occasionally he boarded vessel to secure such papers.

2. Admiralty ⇨20.

That employee suffered injury while temporarily on navigable waters held not alone determinative of exclusiveness of maritime jurisdiction (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended).

3. Admiralty ⇨20.

That employee, at moment of injury, was performing services maritime in character held not alone determinative of exclusiveness of maritime jurisdiction (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended).

4. Admiralty ⇨20.

Tests determining exclusiveness of maritime jurisdiction in case of injury to employee temporarily on navigable waters and, at moment, performing maritime service, stated.

The tests to determine whether maritime jurisdiction is exclusive in such cases are: (1) Had the injured person's activities at the time of accident "direct relation to navigation or commerce"? (2) Under the circumstances of the particular case, would the regulation of the rights, obligations, and consequent liabilities of the parties, as between themselves, by a local rule, necessarily work material prejudice to any characteristic feature of the general maritime law, or interfere with its proper harmony or uniformity?

5. Admiralty ⇨20.

State Workmen's Compensation Statute may be treated as modifying maritime law, where concerning purely local matters and not occasioning interference with uniformity of maritime law in international and interstate relations (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended).

6. Admiralty ⇨20.

Notwithstanding general admiralty jurisdiction, state Workmen's Compensation Act is applicable when injured employee was engaged in work not so directly connected with navigation and commerce that operation of local law would interfere with essential uniformity of general maritime law (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended).

7. Seamen ⇨2.

Assistant wharfinger employed by city held not "seaman," as regards exclusiveness of maritime jurisdiction for injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Seaman," see Words and Phrases.]

8. Admiralty ⇨20.

Workmen's Compensation Act held applicable to injury to assistant wharfinger, employed by city, while temporarily on ship tied to dock on navigable waters, to receive manifest papers (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended).

In Bank.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Bessie K. Teahan and others, claimants, for the death of Joseph D. Teahan, opposed by the City of Oakland, employer. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission denying compensation, claimants apply for a writ of review.

Order and decision denying award set aside, and cause remanded.

Marcus L. Samuels and George C. Faulkner, both of San Francisco, and Hudson Ford, of Oakland, for petitioners.

Edward O. Allen, of San Francisco, Markell C. Baer, Port Atty., and Hilton J. Melby, Asst. Port Atty., both of Oakland, for respondents.

WASTE, C. J.

Joseph D. Teahan, a civil service employee of the city of Oakland, a municipal corporation, sustained injuries to his head and spine when he fell on the steamer Washington, at the time tied up at one of the city's wharves and afloat on navigable waters of the United States. Upon his death several months later his dependents filed an application with the respondent commission for adjustment of claim. The city of Oakland, which is self-insured, opposed the application, contending that the injury was of a maritime character and that, therefore, the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended) was without application by reason of the paramount force of the law maritime. Evidence addressed to this jurisdictional question was taken by the commission, which found that "said injuries were sustained by the employee while upon navigable waters of the United States, and the work being done by deceased at said time was maritime in character." A dismissal of the application for adjustment of claim followed, and the cause comes to this court on a writ of review to determine whether or not the respondent commission has jurisdiction in the premises. In denying an award of compensation the commission apparently assumed the position, vigorously urged by the employer, that, since the unloading of vessels has been held to be a maritime occupation, the delivery of the manifest papers, which is a prerequisite to such unloading, partakes of the nature of the unloading and is also essentially maritime in character.

The evidence discloses that, as an assistant wharfinger at the Livingston street dock, Teahan was charged with the care and custody of goods and property placed thereon. While he was required to check all property arriving on or leaving the wharf, he took no part in the actual loading or unloading of vessels and exercised no control over persons engaged for that purpose. His duties were performed almost entirely on land, though occasionally he would board a vessel tied to the dock in order to secure the manifest papers and thus facilitate the work of unloading. The testimony of the captain of the steamer Washington shows that it is the usual and customary thing for the captain of a vessel to take the papers ashore. His testimony also discloses that "most of the time" he took the manifest papers ashore when he docked at the Livingston street wharf. However, on February 7, 1929, Teahan, varying this procedure, boarded the steamer Washington, which had just docked, to get the manifest papers. After securing them and while returning to the dock, but while still on board the vessel, he fell down a ladder or stairway and sustained the injuries above described.

[1-6] A wharfinger has been described as the "owner or occupier of a wharf." Encyc. Brit. In Chapman v. State, 104 Cal. 690, 694, 38 P. 457, 458, 43 Am. St. Rep. 158, he is referred to as "one who for hire receives merchandise on his wharf, either for the purpose of forwarding or for delivery to the consignee on such wharf. * * * Docks and wharves are not a part of the navigable waters, but are extensions of the land. Ind. Comm. v. Nordenholt, 259 U. S. 263, 272, 273, 42 S. Ct. 473, 66 L. Ed. 933, 25 A. L. R. 1013; Lon. G. & A. Co. v. I. A. C., 279 U. S. 109, 122, 49 S. Ct. 296, 73 L. Ed. 632; Smith v. Taylor, 276 U. S. 179, 181, 48 S. Ct. 228, 72 L. Ed. 520. Teahan was a land employee. His contract of employment was nonmaritime, and the services required of him were not maritime in character, but, in the main, had to do solely with the custody and protection of property placed on the dock. Here we have the deceased working for an employer whose business is on land and whose contract in its essential details was to be performed on land, temporarily boarding a vessel tied to a dock in order to procure its manifest papers, which, under the evidence, ordinarily would have been delivered to him on the dock by the captain of the vessel. The fact that such employee suffered injury while thus temporarily on navigable waters is not alone determinative of the exclusiveness of maritime jurisdiction to adjudge the rights and obligations growing out of such a situation (Grant Smith-Porter Co. v. Rohde, 257 U. S. 469, 475, 476, 42 S. Ct. 157, 66 L. Ed. 321, 25 A. L. R. 1008), nor is the fact that, at the moment of his injury, the employee was engaged in performing services which might be classed as maritime in character. Sultan Ry., etc., Co. v. Dept. of Labor, 277 U. S. 135, 48 S. Ct. 505, 506, 72 L. Ed. 820. The later decisions of the United States Supreme Court lay down additional tests, namely: (1) Had the injured person's activities at the time of the accident "direct relation to navigation or commerce"? (2) Under the circumstances of the particular case, would the regulation of the rights, obligations, and consequent liabilities of the parties, as between themselves, by a local rule, necessarily work material prejudice to any characteristic feature of the general maritime law, or interfere with its proper harmony or uniformity? Grant Smith-Porter Co. v. Rohde, supra; Millers' Indem., etc., v. Braud, 270 U. S. 59, 64, 46 S. Ct. 194, 70 L. Ed. 470; Alaska Packers' Ass'n v. I. A. C., 276 U. S. 467, 469, 48 S. Ct. 346, 72 L. Ed. 656. State statutes providing compensation for injured employees may be treated as amending or modifying the maritime law in cases where they concern purely local matters and occasion no interference with the uniformity of such law in its international and interstate relations. Oakland v. I. A. C., 198 Cal. 273, 275, 276, 244 P. 353, 355. If a reasonable view of the facts involved in any particular case warrants a negative answer to the above questions, admiralty will yield to the local law, even though such law be a Workmen's Compensation Statute. It is not necessary, therefore, to determine whether admiralty could have jurisdiction, but only whether or not our state Workmen's Compensation Act can apply, notwithstanding general admiralty jurisdiction; or, otherwise stated, whether the deceased, when injured, was engaged in any work so directly connected with navigation and commerce that to permit the rights of the parties to be controlled by the local law would interfere with the essential uniformity of the general maritime law. It is difficult to lay down any general rule by which to judge whether a particular set of facts constitute a "purely local" situation, within the meaning of the federal authorities, to which a local act may apply, or a situation governed exclusively by the maritime law.

After reviewing the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, it is concluded in La Casse v. Great Lakes Eng. Works, 242 Mich. 454, 219 N. W. 730, 733, that: "1. If an injury occurs on land, the maritime law does not operate. 2. If it occurs on navigable waters, the jurisdiction of admiralty is prima facie exclusive. 3. If an injury occurs on navigable waters and in the performance of a maritime contract, it is certainly within the exclusive jurisdiction of admiralty unless (a) the contract is of merely local concern; and (b) its performance has no direct effect upon navigation or commerce; and (c) the application of the state law 'would not necessarily work material prejudice to any characteristic feature of the general maritime law, or interfere with the proper harmony or uniformity of that law in its international or interstate relations.' 4. State Workmen's Compensation Laws, contractual in character, are applicable to maritime service on navigable waters, when, and only when, the service is within exceptions (a), (b), and (c) above. 5. If, however, the injury occurs on navigable waters, but in the performance of a nonmaritime contract, it is, at least prima facie, local and within the operation of state laws. If there are any exceptions to this rule, they are yet to be developed."

Teahan was essentially a land employee, engaged under a nonmaritime contract. The parties thereto unquestionably contracted with reference to the state statute, and the application of the local law to their rights and liabilities "cannot materially affect any rules of the sea whose uniformity is essential." Grant Smith-Porter Co. v. Rohde, supra, page 477 of 257 U. S., 42 S. Ct. 157, 158. If Teahan had been injured on the dock little doubt could exist as to the applicability of the Compensation Act. Ind. Comm. v. Nordenholt, supra. Since his contract of general employment is not shown to have been other than a land contract, the mere incident that in its performance he occasionally went on navigable waters is not sufficient, in our opinion, to cause that employment, and the rights and liabilities which pertain to it, to be so deprived of their essentially local character that admiralty would take jurisdiction to the exclusion of a helpful state law. While the kind of work Teahan was doing at the time of his injury bore a certain relation to navigation, in that delivery of manifest papers is a prerequisite to the unloading of vessels, we are not prepared to say that it bore such a "direct" relation thereto as to preclude the application of the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

In the cases cited by respondents where admiralty has taken jurisdiction to the exclusion of the local law, the person injured was either employed under a maritime contract or was engaged in activities which had a much plainer and more direct relation to navigation than the work of Teahan. Northern Coal Co. v. Strand, 278 U. S. 142, 49 S. Ct. 88, 73 L. Ed. 232; So. Pac. Co. v. Jensen, 244 U. S. 205, 37 S. Ct. 524, 61 L. Ed. 1086, L. R. A. 1918C, 451, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 900; Nogueira v. N. Y., etc., Ry. Co., 281 U. S. 128, 50 S. Ct. 303, 74 L. Ed. 754; Baizley Iron Works v. Span, 281 U. S. 222, 50 S. Ct. 306, 74 L. Ed. 819; and Employers' Liab. Assur. Corp. v. Cook, 281 U. S. 233, 50 S. Ct. 308, 74 L. Ed. 823. The concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Stone very clearly explains the majority decision in the Northern Coal Co. Case as being based on the conclusion that a stevedore, while working on a ship in navigable waters, is a "seaman" within the meaning of the Jones Act, 41 Stat. 1007 (46 USCA § 688), and must therefore look to that act for redress, to the exclusion of state legislation.

[7, 8] The three more recent cases above cited fell squarely within the earlier rulings of the Supreme Court, and therefore added nothing of a new or novel character to its prior adjudications. For the respondent commission to assume jurisdiction of this proceeding will not, in our opinion, do violence to any of these decisions. The deceased in this case was not a seaman in any sense of the word. His boarding of vessels was merely casual and prompted solely by a desire to facilitate the discharge of his duties under a nonmaritime contract. To permit the rights and liabilities of the parties to this proceeding to be determined by the respondent commission under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act will not in any way interfere with the characteristic features of the general maritime rules. This conclusion makes it unnecessary for us to determine petitioners' remaining contention that the city of Oakland is precluded under the decision in City of New York v. McEntee, 263 U. S. 688, 44 S. Ct. 229, 68 L. Ed. 507, from urging that the respondent commission is without jurisdiction of this cause.

The order and decision denying the petitioners an award in this case is set aside, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings before the commission.

DREYER et ux. v. COLE et al.S. F. 13195.*Supreme Court of California.*Sept. 29, 1930.*1. Appeal and error ⇨607(1).

Where no notice of denial of new trial by operation of law was served, contention transcript could not be considered because notice for preparation thereof was not filed within ten days was without merit (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 660, 953a).

It was contended that reporter's transcript, prepared under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, could not be considered because notice for its preparation was not filed within ten days after motion for new trial was denied by operation of law due to mandatory provisions of section 660.

2. Judgment ⇨248.

That description fixing boundaries in findings and judgment in action to quiet title differed from description in complaint and summons was immaterial, if supported by evidence.

3. Adverse possession ⇨112.

Person claiming title by adverse possession has burden of showing all elements essential to prescriptive title.

4. Appeal and error ⇨931(1).

All intendments and inferences favor judgment, and all conflicts and discrepancies in evidence must be resolved in support of judgment.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1).

Findings, if supported by any substantial showing, will not be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action by William J. Dreyer and wife, against Willard C. Cole, Mary Easdale, John Doe Easdale, and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants named, except defendant first named, appeal.

Affirmed.

Barrett & McConnell, of Santa Rosa, for appellants.

H. W. A. Weske, of Santa Rosa, and R. M. J. Armstrong, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, C. J.

[1] This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs quieting their title to real property. Respondents first contend that this court may not consider the reporter's transcript prepared under the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the alleged reason that the notice for its preparation was not filed within the time provided for by statute. This contention is based on the fact that the notice was not filed within ten days after a motion for a new trial, made in the case, was denied by operation of law by reason of the mandatory provisions of section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure. No notice of such termination of the motion for a new trial was served upon appellants. There is, therefore, no merit in respondents' contention. Anstead v. Pac. G. & E. Co., 201 Cal. 198, 200, 256 P. 209; Preo v. Roed, 99 Cal. App. 372, 375, 278 P. 928.

[2] On the merits, the main point involved on this appeal is whether or not the finding of the trial court, incorporated in its decree, fixing the boundary line between the appellants' and respondents' properties, is supported by the evidence. Appellants denied title in respondents to the portion of land in dispute. From an examination of the description fixing this boundary in the findings and judgment, it is at once apparent that the description therein contained is different from that in the complaint and summons. In the complaint and summons the respondents' westerly boundary is described as a straight line, but by the findings and decree this line has a different point of beginning and follows an irregular course along certain fences and other monuments. Appellants complain of this variance, respondents having neglected at the trial, upon the true situation developing, to ask leave to amend their complaint. However, we deem this immaterial, if, in fact, there is any evidence to support the finding of the trial court. Appellants contend there is no such evidence.

[3-5] Upon a reference to the deeds constituting respondents' record title it is apparent that the westerly boundary described therein is the same boundary described in the complaint. It therefore follows that whatever claim respondents may have to the irregular boundary described in the decree (inasmuch as that line includes some land not included within the line described in the complaint) is based on adverse possession. The trial court made the appropriate findings of adverse possession. It is, of course, elementary that the burden is upon one claiming title by adverse possession to show all of the elements essential to a prescriptive title (San Francisco Clearing House v. Wells, 196 Cal. 701, 705, 239 P. 319; Ward v. Parkford, 74 Cal. App. 318, 322, 240 P. 521; Biaggi v. Mainero, 60 Cal. App. 608, 610, 213 P. 541), but it is likewise elementary that all intendments and inferences are in favor of the judgment of the trial court, and that all conflicts and discrepancies in the evidence must be resolved on appeal in support of the judgment of the trial court. It would serve no useful purpose to review herein the evidence produced at the trial of this action.

Sufficient it is to say that upon a reading of the entire record we do find evidence directly and indirectly tending to support the findings in reference to the description found in the decree, and likewise find sufficient evidence tending to support the finding of adverse possession. This evidence, it is true, is far from being as satisfactory as it might have been, but that was a matter for the trial court to determine, and, as long as there is any substantial showing in behalf of the court's finding, it will not be disturbed on appeal.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

S. F. 13870.

Supreme Court of California.
Sept. 26, 1930.

Rehearing Granted Oct. 23, 1930.

I. Constitutional law ⇨15.

Constitutional provisions in pari materia must be construed together.

2. Eminent domain ⇨172.

Jurisdiction to try eminent domain cases is vested solely in superior courts, with exception of rights of Railroad Commission under Constitution to fix compensation for taking property of public utility (Const. art. 1, § 14; art. 12, § 23a).

3. Eminent domain ⇨172.

Constitutional provision authorizing Railroad Commission to fix compensation for taking property applies only to acquisition of public utility property by political subdivision of state, not to acquisition of property held in private ownership (Const. art. 12, § 23a).

4. Constitutional law ⇨14.

Enumeration of specific things in constitutional provision is construed as exclusion of matters not enumerated, under maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius.

5. Constitutional law ⇨12.

Constitutional provisions cannot be extended to include something not expressed therein directly or by necessary implication.

6. Constitutional law ⇨13.

Statutes ⇨131(1).

In construing constitutional or statutory enactments, courts are limited to language of enactments themselves.

7. Constitutional law ⇨50.

Constitutional jurisdiction cannot be enlarged or restricted by statute.

8. Public service commissions ⇨6.

Railroad Commission's constitutional powers are limited to regulation and control of public utilities (Const. art. 12, §§ 22, 23, 23a).

9. Eminent domain ⇨209.

Constitutional provisions creating and conferring powers upon Railroad Commission held not intended to deprive owner of private property of right to have value determined by jury in eminent domain proceedings (Const. art. 1, § 14; art. 12, §§ 22, 23, 23a).

10. Eminent domain ⇨167(2).

Statute, insofar as conferring upon Railroad Commission power, in proceedings pertaining to separation of grades, to condemn property of private individuals or corporations not engaged in public service operations and fix compensation therefor, held unconstitutional (St. 1927, p. 1215, amending St. 1915, p. 137, § 43 (b, c), as amended and added by St. 1917, p. 320; Const. art. 1, § 14).

Const. art. 1, § 14, provides that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having first been made.

11. Constitutional law ⇨81.

Police power is subject to rule that Legislature may not exercise powers expressly or impliedly forbidden by Constitution.

12. Eminent domain ⇨167(2).

Statute authorizing Railroad Commission, in proceedings involving separation of grades, to condemn and fix damages for taking private property, not owned by public utility or used for public service, held not proper exercise of police power (St. 1927, p. 1215, amending St. 1915, p. 137, § 43 (b, c), as amended and added by St. 1917, p. 320; Const. art. 1, § 14; art. 12, §§ 22, 23, 23a).

13. Eminent domain ⇨167(3).

No public necessity, however urgent, will justify taking contrary to law (Const. art. 1, § 14).

14. Eminent domain ⇨167(2).

Proceeding to condemn and fix damages caused to private property, not used in public service, by relocation of track and separation of crossings resulting in closing of street, held not germane to regulation of public utilities, as regards legislative power to invest Railroad Commission with jurisdiction (St. 1927, p. 1215, amending St. 1915, p. 137, § 43 (b, c), as amended and added by St. 1917, p. 320; Const. art. 1, § 14; art. 12, §§ 22, 23, 23a).

The application for condemnation here involved was one to fix full compensation for damages resulting to certain private property owners from an improvement involving the relocation of railroad tracks and the separation of crossings, necessitating the construction of a subway in front of property owned by them and the closing and abandonment of a street, thus allegedly destroying all ingress to and egress from such property.

15. Eminent domain ⇨106.

Construction of subway in front of property and closing of street on which property fronts, destroying ingress and egress, as result of track relocation and grade crossing elimination, held to constitute "taking" (Const. art. 1, § 14).

16. Eminent domain ⇨288(1).

Limitations of Public Utilities Act as to remedies therein provided held not to affect private property owners not within commission's jurisdiction, seeking to restrain commission from condemning property (St. 1915, p. 115, as amended).

17. Courts ⇨207(5).

Granting of prohibition is entirely within Supreme Court's discretion.

18. Courts ⇨207(5).

Supreme Court's power to issue writ of prohibition is derived from Constitution.

19. Prohibition ⇨1.

Prohibition is usually granted when there is unauthorized assumption of jurisdiction.

20. Prohibition ⇨6(2).

Where Railroad Commission was without jurisdiction to condemn private property not used in public service, in crossing separation proceeding, prohibition was granted (St. 1927, p. 1215, amending St. 1915, p. 137, § 43 (b, c), as amended and added by St. 1917, p. 320; Const. art. 1, § 14; art. 12, §§ 22, 23, 23a).

TYLER, Justice pro tem.

Application for a writ of prohibition to restrain the Railroad Commission from hearing a petition of the city of San Jose to condemn certain property of the petitioners, and fix compensation for the acquisition of or damage thereto under section 43(c) of the Public Utilities Act of this state (St. 1927, p. 1215, amending St. 1915, p. 137, § 43(c), as added by St. 1917, p. 320).

The controversy arises out of a grant by ordinance to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company by the city of San Jose of a franchise to construct, maintain, and operate a steam railroad over and upon certain streets within the boundaries of such city. For more than fifty years last past, the main line of the railroad company between San Francisco and Los Angeles has been located on Fourth street in the city of San Jose. The maintenance and operation of this line on such street having become undesirable, upon the expiration of the franchise, the city refused a renewal of the same, but in lieu thereof granted one for a new line along and across other and different streets. The railroad company thereupon made application to the Railroad Commission for the purpose of obtaining an order from such commission determining that public convenience and necessity required the relocation of certain of its tracks within such city and adjacent thereto.

the construction of tracks over certain streets and highways at grade, and the construction of tracks over certain other streets and highways at separated crossings.

The commission rendered its opinion and order in this proceeding, declaring, among other things, that the proposed tracks should cross certain designated streets within the city at separated grades, in accordance with the descriptions filed with the application, the cost to be borne in accordance with the ordinance passed by the city of San Jose. The city had agreed in the franchise granted to the railroad to pay all property damage, other than to railroad property, that might result to the owners by reason of the separation of certain grades and crossings made necessary by the relocation of the new line. The city then filed its application before the commission to have it ascertain and fix compensation to be paid for the property damage made necessary by the contemplated improvement in accordance with section 43 (c) of the Public Utilities Act. The commission thereupon issued its order to the persons named in said petition whose property was affected thereby, including petitioners herein, directing them to show cause why the commission should not proceed after hearing to order condemnation to be entered and to fix the just compensation to be paid for the acquisition of or damage to their lands. Petitioners failed to appear, and instituted the present proceeding to prevent the commission from further proceeding in the matter, claiming that it was without jurisdiction or power to condemn their lands or to fix the compensation to be paid for the taking thereof or the damage thereto, as neither of them was engaged in any business subject to the Public Utilities Act, but on the contrary, the properties owned by them were held in private ownership, the same not being used for any public service. In their application for the writ, petitioners have set forth the nature and extent of the damage they will suffer by reason of the improvement.

It is disclosed by the petition that the contemplated improvements include a subway to be constructed on Julian street in front of the property of petitioners, together with the elevation of the grades of such street at least six feet higher than the present elevation thereof and petitioners' adjacent lands facing thereon, and the complete abandonment, closing, and change of grade of Center street, which improvements will, it is alleged, result in destroying all ingress and egress to petitioners' property and render it unfit for the purpose for which it is being used or for any other purpose. It further discloses that the petitioner, S. H. Chase Lumber Company, is the owner of a considerable tract of land fronting on Center street and also on certain other streets to be affected by the proposed change of grade, and that it operates a large lumber mill upon said property and has for many years used Center street as its main means of egress and ingress to its property. The other petitioner, Alice F. Farney, also owns property affected by the improvement, and her only means of egress and ingress to such property is through such street. Both petitioners own the fee in said street to the center thereof, subject only to the rights of way of the city and the railroad company as they existed prior to the institution of the proposed proceedings. It also is claimed that the plans and specifications approved by the Commission call for the taking of a strip of land off petitioner Farney's property on Center street, and, likewise, provide for the taking of a strip along the entire frontage of the S. H. Chase Lumber Company's property on Center street. The contemplated improvement also affects the rights of numerous other property owners not parties to this proceeding.

Petitioners claim that if the Railroad Commission is allowed to proceed with the matter thus presented to it, it will be undertaking to fix the compensation for and to condemn not only the ownership which the petitioners have in the fee of Center street, but will also be undertaking to fix the compensation for and damage sustained by them to their private property and the use thereof adjacent to and fronting upon said street. This they contend amounts to a violation of the provisions of section 14 of article 1 of the Constitution. Respondent commission seeks to justify its assumption of jurisdiction on the ground that it is regularly proceeding under the authority of section 43(c) of the Public Utilities Act, the provisions of which are necessary, convenient, and essential to the proper and effectual exercise of other powers of regulation and control of railroads delegated to the commission under such act and under section 43(b) thereof in particular. It is the contention of respondent commission that section 43(c) of the act is constitutional under the provisions of sections 22, 23, and 23a of article 12 of the Constitution as being cognate and germane to the purposes of the act as a whole, for which reason section 14 of article 1 of the Constitution must yield to it.

Section 14, article 1, of the Constitution provides that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having first been made to, or paid into court for, the owner * * * which compensation shall be ascertained by a jury, unless a jury be waived, as in other civil cases in a court of record, as shall be prescribed by law."

Sections 22 and 23 of article 12 of the Constitution create the Railroad Commission and grant to it powers to supervise and regulate public utilities, and the powers granted are declared to be plenary and unlimited by any provision of the Constitution. Section 23a of article 12 provides that the Railroad Commission shall have and exercise such power as shall be conferred upon it by the Legislature to fix the just compensation to be paid for the taking of any property of a public utility in eminent domain proceedings by the state or any county, and this right is declared to be plenary and unlimited by any provision of the Constitution.

Section 43(c) of the Public Utilities Act, as amended in 1927 (Stats. 1927, chap. 704, p. 1215), passed in pursuance of sections 22, 23, and 23a, of article 12, of the Constitution, provides that the Railroad Commission shall have power to fix the just compensation to be paid for property or any interest in or to property to be taken or damaged in the separation of grades at any crossing specified in subdivision (b) thereof or for property or any interest in or to property to be taken or damaged in the construction, alteration or relocation, under the order or with the approval of the commission, of elevated tracks or subways, etc., and upon payment of the compensation to make a final order of condemnation. Subdivision (b) referred to in subdivision (c) relates in general to the powers of the Commission over crossings of railroads upon highways. Subdivision (c) is declared in the act to be an aid to the jurisdiction of the commission in the supervision and regulation of railroads.

[1-10] The question here presented for determination under the different contentions is whether or not the Legislature has attempted to vest in the Railroad Commission the exclusive right under section 43(c) of the Public Utilities Act (Stats. 1927, p. 1215) to fix the just compensation to be paid for property, or any interest therein, held in private ownership, to be taken or damaged in the separation of grades, and to make a final order of condemnation when it appears that the property sought to be condemned is not the property of a public utility, and if so, is the section in its enforcement against the petitioners constitutional. In other words, have or have not, private property owners the right under section 14 of article 1 of the Constitution to have compensation assessed when their property is about to be taken for public use by a jury as in other civil cases, notwithstanding the constitutional and statutory provisions invoked by respondent commission. The solution of the question depends upon the proper construction to be given to the constitutional provisions above referred to. These provisions are in pari materia and are to be construed together. So construed, it seems plain that the jurisdiction to try cases in eminent domain is vested solely in the superior courts of the state, with the exception of the rights conferred to the commission by section 23a of article 12 of the Constitution. This section does not authorize the Legislature to take away from an individual the rights conferred by section 14, article 1, of the same organic law. It only authorizes the exercise of the power conferred upon the commission where political subdivisions of the state are involved and the property of a public utility is being acquired, and it has no application to the acquisition of property held in private ownership. Under the maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius, the enumeration of certain specific things in a constitutional provision will be construed to exclude all that is not thus enumerated. Constitutional provisions cannot be extended to include something which is not expressed therein either directly or by necessary implication. The proceeding, as above indicated, is one in invitum for the valuation and acquisition of property held in private ownership for the purpose of involuntary acquisition. It may be conceded for the purpose of this case that the power of eminent domain, or a power akin thereto, in matters involving public utilities over which the commission has gained control, has been vested in that body and that the exercise of this power, including the making of awards thereunder without the intervention of a jury, are not in violation of the Constitution where the powers are cognate and germane to the purposes for which the commission was created, i. e., the regulation of public utilities. It may further be conceded that the control of the manner of constructing railroad crossings is a vital and material part of the regulation of railroads and is cognate and germane to that subject within the purview of sections 22 and 23 of article 12 of the Constitution where jurisdiction exists. City of San Jose v. Railroad Commission, 175 Cal. 284, 165 P. 967. But these considerations do not enter into or in any manner control the question here involved. Here it is sought to acquire on behalf of a railroad company, and for its benefit and use, substantial property rights of numerous individuals property owners who do not come within the purview of the Public Utilities Act, as their property is held by them in private ownership and not devoted to any public use. The case does not present the ordinary situation of the construction of grade crossings where private property rights are not involved, but rather the transportation of an extensive portion of railroad tracks from one portion of the city to another for a very considerable distance. The constitutional provisions invoked by respondent do not attempt to affect private property. Courts in construing constitutional enactments or statutes are limited to the language of the enactments themselves. Constitutional jurisdiction can neither be enlarged or restricted by legislative act. There is no possible connection between the regulation and control by the commission of public utilities and the control of private property by individuals. It is not possible to read into a plain certain grant of power in a constitutional provision something not therein contained. Whatever powers, therefore, plenary or otherwise, the commission may have as a regulatory body having full control of matters cognate and germane to the regulation and supervision of utilities and whatever rights it may have under the Constitution are limited and restricted to the regulation and control of public utilities. This is the declared purpose of the provisions invoked by respondent. These provisions were never intended to do away with the right of an owner of private property to have the value of such property determined by a jury in eminent domain proceedings, and this very question has been so determined by this court. In Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 647, 137 P. 1119, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822, it was held that such an attempted taking on the part of the commission was at variance with article 1, § 14, of the Constitution. There the constitutional provisions were construed together and the determination reached that as to public utilities there may be a taking by the commission if germane and cognate to regulation, but that as to all other property, especially as to that held in private ownership, a taking is only justified in accordance with the provisions of article 1, § 14. See, also, East Bay M. U. Dist. v. Railroad Commission, 194 Cal. 603, 229 P. 949. The Eshleman and East Bay Cases extensively consider and pass upon the very question here involved, and they hold that whenever the commission by order, either directly or indirectly, attempts to acquire private property for a public use, or attempts to fix the compensation to be paid therefor, it entirely exceeds its power and its order is void. In view of these decisions, a further discussion of this question becomes unnecessary. Section 43(c) of the Public Utilities Act therefore, in so far as it purports to give the Railroad Commission power to condemn property of private individuals or corporations, who are not engaged in public service operations, is a despotic grant of power and therefore unconstitutional and void.

[11-15] In a brief filed by certain amici curiae it is claimed that section 43(c) is constitutional, irrespective of sections 22 and 23 of article 12 of the Constitution, as being a valid exercise of the police power of the state. However broad the scope of the police power, it is always subject to the rule that the Legislature may not exercise any power that is expressly or impliedly forbidden by the Constitution. Nor does the fact, if it be a fact, as claimed by respondent, that the present proceeding is a more complete, speedy, and effectual method of obtaining results than a proceeding in a court, alter or change the situation. No public necessity, however urgent, will justify a taking contrary to law. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Eshleman, supra. The same may be said in answer to the argument that there is no relation between damages suffered by property owners by reason of separation of grades at crossings and damages due to the closing of certain streets and that each taking can be determined when necessary in separate suits. The application to the commission is one to fix the full compensation for the acquisition of or damage to the property of persons affected by the improvement, and the record shows that the commission has approved the plans of the subway, the relocation of the tracks, and nothing remains to be done except to acquire by purchase or condemnation the property of the particular individuals in accordance with the order of the commission to carry out the general plan. The application prays that the commission fix the compensation to be paid to the individual property owners named therein and that it make such final order of condemnation as may be proper in the premises. As we have seen, the commission has no power to make any order affecting the property of petitioners, as it is totally without jurisdiction in the matter, and lacking jurisdiction, the proceedings are not cognate and germane to the regulation of public utilities. The whole controversy, so far as it affects the property of petitioners, is one that should be determined in a single proceeding in the proper forum, as each of the contemplated acts constitute a taking within the meaning of the law.

[16-20] Something is said in the briefs of respondent concerning the remedy invoked by petitioners, it being claimed that mandamus and certiorari are exclusive under the statute. If petitioners do not come within the confines of the act for the reason that they are not public utilities, and the commission is therefore without jurisdiction over them or their property, they are in no manner affected by the provisions of the act and the limitation contained therein as to the pursuit of remedies has no application to them. The granting or refusal to grant prohibition is entirely within the discretion of the court. Its power to issue the writ is derived from the Constitution. The writ is usually granted when there is an assumption of unauthorized jurisdiction. Here the commission being without jurisdiction, the writ should be granted in the interest of justice. Respondent concedes the importance of the issues involved and, recognizing the necessity of a speedy determination of the case, waives this objection.

Considering the conclusion we have reached, it is ordered that the Railroad Commission be and it is hereby restrained from entertaining, passing upon, and deciding what properties of petitioners should be condemned for the purposes as set forth in the petition of the city of San Jose and from fixing the compensation or damage to said properties.

We concur: SEAWELL, J.; CURTIS, J.
RICHARDS, J. (concurring).

This proceeding does not involve merely the elimination of an isolated grade crossing at the intersection of two already established roadways, wherein any private interests which might be affected would be of a minor and incidental concern. This proceeding involves the transposition of that portion of the main line of the railway of the Southern Pacific Company which for many years heretofore has occupied Fourth street in the city of San Jose, from that location to the western portion of the city, such transposition when completed to traverse the entire length from north to south of the city, and thence to proceed southward for several miles to Lick station, the point where it will be reunited with the main line.

This proceeding had its inception in the year 1917, when the franchise of the railroad, which entitled it to occupy Fourth street, expired. It began in a public agitation having for its end the removal of the main line of said railroad from the central portion of the city to the western limits thereof. It took a preliminary form in the application of the railroad, an interstate line, to the Interstate Commerce Commission, for permission to make such transposition, which application was granted on October 11, 1928. 145 I. C. C. 515. On December 5, 1928, the city of San Jose granted a franchise to said railroad "to construct a line of railroad through the city of San Jose over, along and across the several streets, lanes, alleys and highways herein-after described," etc. The description of the character and route of the railway to be constructed in conformity with said franchise provides expressly for the closing of Center street throughout its entire length of several blocks, and further provides for the construction of overhead tracks at eight street crossings in said city, one of which is at Julian street. This franchise contains the following express provisions: "It is understood that the grantee shall at the time of applying for authority to construct the crossings as above specified in order to avoid unnecessary grade crossings, ask the Railroad Commission for an order directing the city of San Jose to close and abandon the following streets within the following limits, that is to say: San Fernando street, Kearny street, Center street between Lenzen avenue and San Augustine street, Pine street, Cahill street, San Carlos street, Jerome street, Mariin avenue, Fuller avenue, Bartlett avenue, Goodyear street and Sunnyside avenue; the closing of said streets shall be a condition precedent to the carrying out of this franchise."

Following the granting of said franchise, the city of San Jose presented to the Railroad Commission a petition under section 43(c) of the Public Utility Act "to fix compensation to be paid for property damaged in separation of grades at crossing of Julian street and proposed Southern Pacific track in the city of San Jose." In this petition the private property of every property owner along the entire course of Center street from a point several hundred feet northward of Julian street to a point several hundred feet southward thereof and to the end of Center street is described, and the commission is asked to fix "the just compensation to be paid for the damage to each piece or parcel of property specified herein, and declare that such compensation be paid as provided in decision No. 20559, and that the Commission make such final order of condemnation as may be proper in the premises." The decision No. 20559 above referred to is the decision of the Railroad Commission "In the Matter of the Application of the Southern Pacific Company for an order authorizing construction at grade and at separated grades of railroad tracks across certain streets, lanes, alleys and highways and across the track of the Western Pacific Railroad Company at locations herein-after described in the city of San Jose and in the vicinity of San Jose, county of Santa Clara, state of California." Said application of the Southern Pacific Company, presented after receiving its foregoing franchise, was an application "for authority to construct the various crossings over public thoroughfares involved in the relocation of its main line tracks through the city of San Jose and the unincorporated territory immediately south of the city of San Jose." The decision recites, after providing with much of detail for the construction of the several street crossings at separated grades within and beyond said city, including the Julian street crossing: "The above opinion and order is based on the express condition that the following streets and alleys in the city of San Jose be legally abandoned and effectively closed at the respective points of crossing with existing or proposed track of applicant." Here follows a list of eleven streets which are to be wholly or partially closed, at the head of which list is Center street, which is to be wholly closed. In order to construct the several crossings at elevated grades, as provided in said decision, and particularly in order to construct the crossing at Julian street, it is provided in said decision that said railroad shall begin to rise at or near Cinnebar street, several hundred feet north of Julian street, and shall reach an elevation at the latter street at its intersection with Center street of sufficient height to permit a subway with a minimum clearance of twelve feet at the Julian street crossing, and that such elevation of the railroad shall continue along the remaining distance of Center street to the end thereof with the entire width thereof occupied by said elevation and the tracks laid thereon, so as to effectually and completely close Center street to public travel and to ingress and egress on the part of the private property owners along the entire course of said street.

It is in order to prohibit the Railroad Commission from thus carrying into effect its aforesaid decision and order, with the consequent destruction of whatever private property rights the property owners along Center street have in the fee therein and in the right of ingress and egress thereto, without having their rights and the damages thereto declared and determined under the provisions of section 14 of article 1 of the Constitution of the state of California, that the instant application for a writ of prohibition has been presented by the Chase Lumber Company and Alice K. Farney, both of whom are property owners on and along the line of Center street.

It would seem to be obvious from the foregoing recital that the matter pending before the Railroad Commission involves not merely the grade crossing at Julian street, but the entire and unseverable matter of the transportation of the main line of the Southern Pacific Company from a central street in San Jose to a location near the western limits of said city, but across the entire length thereof, which involves and will involve in the course of the accomplishment thereof the private property rights of many persons, having relation particularly to the closing of such streets as the transposition and placement of said main line of railway require.

It should also be obvious that the construction of this main line of railway at the elevation required in order to the elimination of the grade crossing at Julian street will involve necessarily the private property rights of all of those persons owning property along the entire course of Center street, and which will be destroyed or damaged by the necessary closing of said street throughout its entire course to the northward and southward of said crossing, and that this being so, the proceeding before the commission and the order and decision thereof which is herein sought to be reviewed should be treated and considered in its entirety, and that neither the city of San Jose, nor the Railroad Commission, nor the railroad, should be permitted to chop up said proceeding into a large number of proceedings for the elimination of grade crossings and the condemnation of the property rights of private persons without the admeasurement of a jury, as provided for in the aforesaid section of the state Constitution.

I am in agreement with the main opinion prepared by Mr. Justice TYLER pro tem, and with the authorities cited by him therein to the effect that a proceeding of this character does not come within the regulatory powers with which the Railroad Commission is invested by the terms of sections 22 and 23 of article 12 of the Constitution and which I insist were never intended to work a repeal of section 14 of article 1 of said Constitution. I am further of the opinion that section 23a of article 12 of the Constitution is the only section thereof which purports expressly to confer upon the Railroad Commission the right to exercise the power of eminent domain and that by the express terms of that section such power and jurisdiction is limited to "the taking of any property of a public utility." If the framers of this the latest amendment to this article of the state Constitution intended to invest the Railroad Commission with power and jurisdiction to fix the just compensation to be paid for the taking of any property of a private person in eminent domain proceedings, here was the place to have done so; and the fact that it not only was not done, but that the power and jurisdiction of the commission in eminent domain was by the terms of said section expressly limited in its exercise to the property of public utilities, furnishes to my mind the clearest reason for holding that the cases of Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Eshleman, supra, and East Bay M. U. Dist. v. Railroad Commission, supra, cited in the main opinion, should be given full application to the facts of the instant case.

SHENK, J.

I dissent. In these days of automobile transportation the question of the elimination of crossings of highways and railroads at grade is of prime importance. The main opinion strikes down the power of the state through its Railroad Commission to eliminate such grade crossings in a prompt and effectual manner. The proceeding before the Railroad Commission is an endeavor to relocate the main line of the railroad company through the city of San Jose and through unincorporated territory immediately south thereof. Upon the completion of the project eighteen grade crossings would be abolished and certain streets as such will be abandoned.

The part of the proceeding now under review involves the separation of the grade at the intersection of Julian and Center streets. Incidental damage to private property will result. Section 43 of the Public Utilities Act specifically vests in the Railroad Commission the power to require the separation of grades and to apportion the expense thereof between the public utility corporation and the public corporation or public agency wherein the same takes place. Section 43 also vests power in the Railroad Commission to fix the just compensation to be paid for property taken or damaged, by reason of the separation of the grade. The procedure laid down by the statute for the ascertainment of such amounts is elaborate and complete and provides for notice and hearing on behalf of all parties interested.

The sole question presented is the validity of said section 43 under the constitutional grant of power to the Railroad Commission. The main opinion denies the right of the Railroad Commission to proceed under the statute because of the general requirement of section 14 of article 1 of the Constitution that the compensation to be assessed for the taking or damaging of private property for public use shall be ascertained by a jury as in other civil actions in a court of record. I cannot agree that said constitutional provision is applicable to the taking or damaging of private property incidental to a grade crossing authorized or required by the Railroad Commission.

Section 22 of article 12 of the Constitution provides: "No provision of this Constitution shall be construed as a limitation upon the authority of the legislature to confer upon the railroad commission additional powers of the same kind or different from those conferred herein which are not inconsistent with the powers conferred upon the railroad commission in this Constitution, and the authority of the legislature to confer such additional powers is expressly declared to be plenary and unlimited by any provision of this Constitution." Again section 23 of the same article provides that "the right of the legislature to confer powers upon the railroad commission respecting public utilities is hereby declared to be plenary and to be unlimited by any provision of this Constitution." This court has declared that the powers conferred on the Railroad Commission under the foregoing broad authorization must be cognate and germane to the subject of the regulation of public utilities. Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 647, 137 P. 1119, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822. If the power to fix the compensation for private property taken or damaged by the separation of grades be so cognate and germane, the general provisions of section 14 of article 1 are necessarily superseded and controlled by the specific provisions of sections 22 and 23 of article 12 and acts of the Legislature passed in pursuance thereof. That the fixing of such compensation by the Railroad Commission in authorizing or directing a separation of grades is so cognate and germane to the general purposes of the power conferred seems to me to be beyond question. Without the right to fix such compensation, the power to provide for or to eliminate grade crossings is either thwarted entirely or is restricted to such an extent as to render it ineffectual from a practical standpoint. It is no sufficient answer to say that some one may voluntarily or by direction proceed in the superior court to have the compensation fixed by a jury. Such a proceeding would entail expense and delay and uncertainty not at all in harmony with the ends and purposes of the full and complete determination and accomplishment of the matter specially intrusted to the Railroad Commission. It cannot be rightly urged that just compensation will not be awarded if the same be fixed by the Railroad Commission. Commenting on this phase of the matter with reference to fixing the compensation for a taking of the property of a public utility, this court said in Pacific Telephone, etc., Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, at page 684, 137 P. 1119, 1137, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, Ann. Cas.

1915C, 822: "It is certainly true that in the vast modern development of public utilities in their multifarious activities, in their complicated interrelations, where a taking of property is involved, a great saving of time, and a more just award may be expected from a learned, skilled, and dispassionate tribunal such as the Railroad Commission than can ever be hoped for from the haphazard verdicts of juries. And very good reasons therefore appear why, for the benefit of the state as well as for the benefit of the public service companies, awards as to the latter should be made by this body, and not by a jury." There need be no apprehension of the undue enlargement of the powers of the Railroad Commission when the exercise thereof in fixing compensation is confined, as in this proceeding, to the specific matter of the separation of the grades at a railroad crossing. Nothing else is involved. The power of the commission to apportion the cost of the separation of the grades has been recognized and confirmed as cognate and germane to regulation (City of San Jose v. Railroad Commission, 175 Cal. 284, 165 P. 967), and there would seem to be no difference between the power to apportion the cost of the improvement and the power to fix the amount of the cost thereof. Both are necessary to the full exercise of the power granted.

Furthermore, section 43(c) of the Public Utilities Act provides: "The legislature hereby declares that subsection (c) hereof [providing for the fixing of compensation in the elimination of grade crossings] is enacted as a germane and cognate part of and as an aid to the jurisdiction of the railroad commission in the supervision and regulation of railroad and street railroad corporations." St. 1927, p. 1222. While this declaration may not in a strict sense be binding upon this court, it should not be disregarded except when the court must say as a matter of law that there is no reasonable relation between the fixing of such compensation and the main purpose of the proceeding, which is to prevent or eliminate grade crossings and thus provide safety for the traveling public.

The case of East Bay M. U. Dist. v. Railroad Commission is not in point. There a public agency not then authorized to invoke the powers of the Railroad Commission under section 23a of article 12 of the Constitution was endeavoring to compel the commission to fix and determine the compensation to be paid by the petitioner in contemplation of eminent domain proceedings against the East Bay Water Company, and it was held that under the provisions of the Constitution in force at the time the relief could not be granted. There condemnation was the sole purpose of the proceeding and no question of the regulation of the public utility was involved. Here the condemnation is merely incidental to the main purpose of regulation and control of the public utility.

In my opinion the petition should be denied and the alternative writ discharged.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 24, 1930.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court
Nov. 20, 1930.

1. Automobiles ⇨226(2).

Where view is obstructed, motorist's failure to observe statutory requirements as to speed in entering intersection, if failure proximately contributes to injury, constitutes negligence (St. 1923, p. 517, § 113).

2. Automobiles ⇨245(90).

Whether failure of motorist, whose view was obstructed, to observe statutory requirements as to speed in entering intersection proximately contributed to injury, held for trial court in nonjury case (St. 1923, p. 517, § 113).

3. Automobiles ⇨242(8).

Burden of proving that plaintiff motorist's failure to observe statutory requirement as to speed in entering intersection proximately caused injury was on defendant (St. 1923, p. 517, § 113).

4. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1).

Reviewing court cannot disturb judgment unless it appears that on no hypothesis is there sufficient substantial evidence to support it.

5. Appeal and error ⇨996.

Reviewing court cannot review finding based on reasonable inference, though in its judgment opposite inference is more probable.

6. Automobiles ⇨245(90).

Whether speed of plaintiff's automobile three miles per hour in excess of that permitted by statute regarding intersections proximately contributed to collision held for trial court in nonjury case (St. 1923, p. 517, § 113).

7. Damages ⇨5.

"Special damages," as contradistinguished from general damages, are those which are natural but not necessary consequences of act complained of.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "General Damages" and "Special Damages," see Words and Phrases.]

8. Damages ⇨142.

Plaintiff must plead special damages which he sustained, or he cannot give evidence thereof.

9. Appeal and error ⇨1170(5).

Where defendant stipulated that amount claimed for medical expenses was reasonable and necessary, error, if any, in permitting proof of such damages, although not pleaded, held not prejudicial (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

10. Pleading ⇨250.

In action for personal injuries, trial amendment for medical expenses is not introduction of new cause of action.

11. Damages ⇨132(3).

$12,750.31 held not excessive for injury to vertebra causing from 20 per cent. to 25 per cent. disability.

Facts disclosed that before the accident plaintiff was strong, in good health, and capable of earning $6.50 per day. After the accident he remained in hospital several weeks, and, after leaving the hospital, wore a brace for eleven months, suffered severe pain, and had his earning capacity impaired.

J. Hampton Hoge, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Wyckoff & Gardner, of Watsonville, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligent operation of an automobile. The defendant denied the alleged negligence, and averred that negligence on the part of the plaintiff proximately contributed to the injuries complained of. The action was tried before the court without a jury. The court found for the plaintiff and entered judgment accordingly. Defendant's motion for a new trial was denied, and he has appealed from the judgment. The grounds for the appeal are that the evidence shows as a matter of law that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, that the court erred in receiving evidence of and awarding judgment for special damages, and that the damages awarded were excessive.

On February 11, 1924, at about 9 o'clock a. m., the plaintiff was operating an automobile in an easterly direction along the right-hand side of Alisal street in Salinas. This street, which is 75 feet wide, runs east and west. It intersects with Soledad street, which runs north and south; the latter street being 50 feet in width. As plaintiff neared the intersection, defendant's automobile approached from the south along Soledad street, and a collision occurred in the northeast quarter near the center of the intersection. According to the plaintiff, he was from 20 to 30 feet west of the westerly curb line of Soledad street when he first saw defendant's car, which was then from 60 to 70 feet south of the southerly curb line of Alisal street. Plaintiff estimated the speed of his car at about 18 miles, and that of defendant's at about 40 miles an hour. Other witnesses testified that the defendant's speed was between 12 and 15 miles an hour. A dwelling house was situated on the lot at the northwest corner of the intersection and about 30 feet west of the westerly curb line of Soledad street. There was another dwelling on the southwest corner of the intersection; this structure being 82 feet west of the westerly curb line of Soledad street. Plaintiff testified that when he first saw the defendant approaching there did not appear to be any danger of a collision, and he assumed that defendant would yield the right of way; also that he entered the intersection first, whereupon, seeing that the defendant continued on his course, he swerved his car to the left in an effort to avoid the collision. The defendant testified that when he reached a point between 75 and 100 feet south of Alisal street he looked to his left toward Alisal street and saw no car approaching; that he had no recollection of having looked in this direction again, and did not see plaintiff's car until after the collision occurred. Defendant contends that the intersection was one where the view was obstructed within the meaning of the California Vehicle Act, and, it being admitted that plaintiff entered the intersection at a speed in excess of 15 miles an hour, he was negligent as a matter of law.

At the time the accident occurred, the California Vehicle Act (Stats. 1923, p. 517) provided as follows: "Section 113. Restrictions as to Speed. (a) Any person driving a vehicle on the public highways of this state shall drive the same at a careful and prudent speed not greater than is reasonable and proper, having due regard to the traffic, surface and width of the highway, and no person shall drive any vehicle upon a public highway at such a speed as to endanger the life, limb or property of any person. (b) Subject to the provisions of subdivision (a) of this section and except in those instances * * * specified in this act, it shall be lawful for the driver of a vehicle to drive the same at a speed not exceeding the following: * * *

2. Fifteen miles an hour in traversing an intersection of highways when the driver's view is obstructed. A driver's view shall be deemed to be obstructed when at any time during the last one hundred feet of his approach to such intersection he does not have a clear and uninterrupted view of such intersection and of the traffic upon all of the highways entering such intersection for a distance of two hundred feet from such intersection."

[1-6] It is clear from the physical conditions shown by the evidence that plaintiff's view of the traffic along Soledad street during the last 100 feet of his approach to the intersection was not clear and uninterrupted for a distance of 200 feet either north or south of the intersection. Where the view is thus obstructed, a failure to observe the statutory requirement as to speed will, if the same proximately causes or contributes to the injury complained of, constitute negligence as a matter of law; the principle that a violation of the statute is negligence per se being subject to the limitation that the act or omission must proximately cause or contribute to the injury (Mathes v. Aggeler & Musser, etc., Co., 179 Cal. 697, 178 P. 713; Dewhirst v. Leopold, 194 Cal. 424, 229 P. 30; Williams v. Southern Pacific Co., 173 Cal. 525, 160 P. 660; Thomas v. German, etc., Society, 168 Cal. 183, 141 P. 1186), and, when the evidence is conflicting or any reasonable man might differ as to the inferences which ought to be drawn from the evidence, this question is one for the jury (Smith v. Occidental, etc., Steamship Co., 99 Cal. 462, 34 P. 84); the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that the act or omission of plaintiff was a proximate cause of the injury complained of being upon the defendant (Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 237 P. 1066; Gett v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 192 Cal. 621, 221 P. 376). A reviewing court is not justified in disturbing a judgment unless it appears that upon no hypothesis is there sufficient substantial evidence to support it (People v. Tom Woo, 181 Cal. 315, 184 P. 389), nor can it review a finding based upon a reasonable inference, though in its judgment the opposite inference is the more probable (2 Cal. Jur. "Appeal and Error," § 549, p. 935; Ryder v. Bamberger, 172 Cal. 791, 158 P. 753). Granting that the speed of the plaintiff's automobile was 3 miles per hour in excess of that permitted by the statute, it does not follow with certainty that this proximately contributed to his injury. In view of the excessive speed of the defendant and the other circumstances shown, the court might reasonably have concluded that the sole proximate cause of the collision was defendant's negligence, and, had plaintiff been traveling at the speed allowed by law, the collision would nevertheless have occurred and that he would not have escaped injury. Under all the circumstances, the question was one for the trial court (Gett v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., supra; Godeau v. Levy, 72 Cal. App. 13, 236 P. 354), and we cannot say that its finding is unsupported.

[7-10] The court, over objection, admitted evidence of the expenses incurred by plaintiff for the services of physicians and nurses and hospital expenses aggregating $1,156.41, which amount was awarded as part of the judgment. A claim for these items was not specifically made in the complaint, and defendant contends that evidence thereof was for that reason improperly admitted. Special, as contradistinguished from general, damages are those which are the natural but not the necessary consequences of the act complained of (Moore v. Fredericks, 24 Cal. App. 536, 141 P. 1049; Morris v. Allen, 17 Cal. App. 684, 121 P. 690), and therefore, to prevent a surprise on the defendant, it is the general rule that the plaintiff must state in his complaint the particular damage which he has sustained, or he will not be permitted to give evidence of it (1 Chitty on Pleading, p. 396; 8 Cal. Jur., Damages, § 127, p. 889). In 17 Corpus Juris, "Damages," § 315, p. 1018, it is said that "in perhaps the greater number of jurisdictions it is essential to the admissibility of proof of payment or incurrence of doctors' bills occasioned by personal injuries that these facts be specifically alleged. In some jurisdictions, however, particularly if the injury be a severe one, such expenses are considered as a reasonably necessary result of the injury and may be proved under a general allegation of damages." No authority in this jurisdiction which is directly in point on this question has been called to our attention, although in Abalas v. Consolidated Construction Co., 32 Cal. App. 732, 164 P. 19, the necessity for such pleadings appears to have been recognized. In the case at bar, however, defendant stipulated, subject to his objection to the admissibility of the testimony, that the amounts claimed were reasonable and necessary. Such damages being a natural consequence of the act complained of and the requirement that the same be pleaded being to prevent a surprise on the defendant, where, as here, the necessity for and reasonableness of the expense incurred is undisputed, the error, if any, in permitting proof of the same, was not prejudicial and could not in any view of the case have resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Under such circumstances, notwithstanding any defect in the pleadings, a reversal would not be justified. Const. art. 6, § 4½; Baker v. Miller, 190 Cal. 263, 212 P. 11. Moreover, such amendments are not regarded as a statement of the introduction of a new cause of action (49 Cor. Jur., "Pleading," § 697, p. 528; 21 Cal. Jur. "Pleading," §§ 135, 138, pp. 195-200; Stohlman v. Martin, 28 Cal. App. 338, 152 P. 319; Barnes v. Berendes, 139 Cal. 32, 69 P. 491, 72 P. 406); and defendant's contention that the claim for the expense incurred was at the time of the trial barred by the statute of limitations cannot be sustained.

[11] The court awarded plaintiff the sum of $12,750.31. It is claimed that this amount was excessive. According to the testimony, the plaintiff at the time of the accident was strong, in good health, and capable of earning $6.50 per day. In the accident he received an impacted or crushed fracture of the fourth lumbar vertebra, three other vertebrae being injured. He remained in the hospital for several weeks, where the surgeons removed a section of the bone of his left leg and grafted the same upon the vertebrae. After leaving the hospital he wore a brace for about 11 months, and has since used a cane in walking. According to a physician, the degree of his disability is from 20 per cent. to 25 per cent., and the condition will be permanent. In addition, it is shown that his earning capacity was impaired, and plaintiff testified that he has suffered and continues to suffer severe pain from the injury. Considering the character of his injury, his loss of earnings and earning power, together with the other elements of damage which the trial court had the right to consider, we cannot say that the award was excessive.

The findings were fairly supported by the evidence, and the record discloses no prejudicial error.

The judgment is accordingly affirmed.

1. Corporations ⇨131.

Purchaser of corporate stock at pledgee's sale became legal owner and was entitled to have stock transferred on books of corporation to his name (Civ. Code, § 324).

2. Mandamus ⇨126.

Purchaser of corporate stock cannot enforce right to have stock transferred to his name on books of corporation by mandamus (Civ. Code, § 324).

Petition by George D. Clark for writ of mandate prayed to be directed to Charles T. Foster and another to compel transfer of certain corporate stock to petitioner.

Writ denied.

Morris, Jaffa & Thompson, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

McKinstry, Haber & Firebaugh, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, P. J.

This is an original proceeding in mandamus to compel the respondents, as president and secretary, respectively, of the Trinity County Water & Power Company to transfer to petitioner on the books of said corporation 4,995 shares of its capital stock and to issue to him a new certificate therefor. Respondents excuse their refusal to perform this duty on the grounds that petitioner's purchase of the stock from the United Trinity Mines (a corporation) was irregular, as it gave petitioner a preference over other creditors of the latter corporation which was then insolvent.

[1, 2] Petitioner purchased the stock at a pledgee's sale and is the legal owner. His right to have the transfer made and a new certificate issued is fixed by section 324 of the Civil Code. This section provides that such shares of stock are personal property which may be transferred by indorsement and delivery of the certificate, but that the transfer is not complete as to all parties until so entered upon the books of the corporation. The same section declares it to be the duty of the officers of the corporation to make such entry in the books and to issue to the purchaser a new certificate.

The right of a purchaser to have the stock transferred to his name is clear under the statutes, but the courts have declared that he cannot enforce this right in mandamus. Kimball v. Union W. Co., 44 Cal. 173, 176, 13 Am. Rep. 157; Spangenberg v. Western Heavy H., etc., Co., 166 Cal. 284, 285, 135 P. 1127; Mahl v. E. A. Portal Co., 81 Cal. App. 494, 497, 254 P. 278; Davidson v. Alameda Mines Co., 66 Or. 412, 134 P. 782, and note in 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) pages 847-855.

In the Spangenberg Case the Supreme Court said that, "unless some extraordinary emergency exists, a suit in equity to compel the transfer would be found to be the most appropriate remedy." The petitioner insists that such an emergency exists here because the respondents are proceeding illegally to destroy and incur his property. Without discussing the allegations of the petition, it is sufficient to say that they show a series of unlawful acts on the part of respondents calculated to do petitioner injury, but we are not satisfied that petitioner has not an adequate remedy in equity, nor that such remedy is not the most appropriate under the circumstances.

The petition is dismissed and the writ is denied.

PEOPLE v. McKENNEY.
Cr. 2002.

1. Abortion ⇨1.

Conviction for attempted abortion held not erroneous for failure to prove agreement to perform operation or charge price therefor.

2. Abortion ⇨11.

Prosecuting witness' testimony that defendant performed incomplete abortion held sufficiently corroborated to sustain conviction for attempted abortion.

Prosecuting witness' statement that defendant performed an incomplete abortion was corroborated by incriminating circumstances narrated by woman who accompanied prosecuting witness to defendant's office and by testimony of two physicians who gave prosecuting witness physical examination and medical care shortly following visit to office of defendant when abortion was attempted.

3. Abortion ☞9.

In prosecution for attempted abortion, prosecuting witness' testimony that she paid money to defendant tended to establish relationship between prosecuting witness and defendant and was admissible.

4. Abortion ☞9.

In prosecution for attempted abortion, statements by prosecuting witness to defendant regarding waywardness of prosecuting witness were immaterial and properly rejected.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Mrs. V. I. McKenney was convicted of attempt to commit abortion, and she appeals.

Affirmed.

Hiram R. McTavish and M. G. Macneil, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Alberta Bedford, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HOUSER, J.

Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of an "attempt to commit abortion"; also, from the "verdict," as well as from each of the several orders made by the trial court by which, respectively, was denied to the defendant her motion for a new trial, her motion in arrest of judgment, and her motion "to dismiss the complaint."

[1,2] The first point made by appellant is that, because "there was no testimony of any agreement with defendant to do anything, or to perform any operation, or to charge any price therefor," and that because the only evidence "that defendant did anything wrong" was the statement made by the prosecuting witness that the defendant "performed an incomplete abortion," it became the duty of the trial court to grant the motion requested by defendant, to wit, to advise the jury to acquit defendant. Such position, however, is untenable for two reasons: First, because the gist of the offense of which defendant was charged consisted in the act of attempting to perform an abortion; and not in what, if anything, she agreed to do, or for what price, if any, she agreed to do it. Secondly, the statement made by the prosecuting witness that "defendant performed an incomplete abortion" was sufficiently corroborated, not only by incriminatory circumstances as narrated in the testimony given by a woman who accompanied the prosecuting witness to the office of defendant on the occasion when, according to such prosecuting witness, defendant attempted to commit the abortion, but as well by the testimony of each of two physicians who gave the prosecuting witness a physical examination as well as medical care and treatment shortly following her visit to the office of defendant. People v. Balkwell, 143 Cal. 259, 76 P. 1017; People v. Lee, 81 Cal. App. 49, 252 P. 763; People v. Watson, 21 Cal. App. 692, 132 P. 836; People v. Brewer, 19 Cal. App. 742, 127 P. 808.

[3,4] The fact that, as testified by the prosecuting witness, she paid the sum of $35 to defendant for her services, had a tendency to establish the relationship that existed between the prosecuting witness and defendant at the time in question. Alleged statements made by the prosecuting witness to defendant regarding the waywardness of the prosecuting witness were of no materiality to the defense of the action. Consequently no error was committed by the trial court, either in its order by which evidence relating to the former fact was admitted, or in rejecting the evidence by which the latter fact was sought to be established.

The judgment and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed. The appeals from the "verdict," and from the order denying the motion in arrest of judgment, and from the order denying the motion to "dismiss the complaint," are dismissed.

MOORE et al. v. HERON et ux.
Civ. 247.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Oct. 1, 1930.

1. Specific performance ☞6.

Specific performance of contract will not be granted when its nature is such that one seeking its enforcement could not himself be compelled to perform (Civ. Code, § 3386).

2. Specific performance ☞32(1).

Where original lack of mutuality has been removed at time action is brought, contract may be specifically enforced.

3. Specific performance ☞32(3).

Mining lease containing no obligation to be assumed by lessees could not be specifically enforced by them, notwithstanding they had prospected and discovered minerals.

The parties entered into a prospecting permit whereby the owners granted to the lessees right to enter and prospect for minerals under an agreement providing that, if lessees should discover mineral deposits having commercial value and worthy of further development, then the owners agreed in consideration of lessees' efforts and expenditures in making such discovery to execute to them a mining lease giving them full rights of ingress and egress, the right to sink shafts or drive tunnels for the development of the deposits and to all other rights and privileges usually contained in mining lease in California mining districts.

4. Specific performance ☞51.

Mining lease whereby lessees assumed no obligation held not "just and reasonable" within specific performance statute (Civ. Code, § 3391).

5. Specific performance ☞73.

Lessees could not obtain specific performance of mining lease calling for personal services of lessees which could not be enforced by lessors.

6. Specific performance ☞28(2).

Mining lease held so uncertain and indefinite that lessees could not obtain specific performance thereof (Civ. Code, § 3390, subd. 6).

The mining lease was indefinite and uncertain since the provision as to duration was that lease should remain in force for — years, or as long thereafter as the minerals in question should be produced in paying quantities, and also for the reason that the lease contained provision that all other rights and privileges contained in mining lease in California should be part of lease, but there was no provision showing rights and privileges contained in such lease.

Action by Leroy Moore and another against George D. Heron and wife. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Preston Turner and Clyde C. Downing, both of Santa Ana, for appellants.

John L. Campbell, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

BARNARD, J.

This is an action for specific performance. The plaintiffs, after alleging that Mary E.

Heron is the owner of the land involved herein, allege that an agreement was entered into, reading as follows:

"Prospecting Permit.

"We, the undersigned, G. D. Heron and Mary E. Heron, husband and wife, owners of the real estate hereinafter described hereby grant to Leroy Moore, Oliver Marriott and associates the exclusive right to immediately enter on said premises and prospect for minerals with the following understanding:

"First—If at any time within a period of 60 days from date said Marriott and Moore should discover mineral deposits which in their judgment has commercial value and worthy of further development, then we agree in consideration of their efforts and expenditures in making such discovery, to execute and deliver to them a mining lease or contract giving them full right to ingress and egress on said premises, the right to sink shafts or drive tunnels for development of said deposits, the right to erect all necessary machinery and equipment for properly mining and treating said ores and minerals, and all other rights and privileges usually contained in a mining lease in California Mining Districts.

"We represent that we are the owners of said premises in fee, including mineral rights.

"It is agreed that Marriott and Moore shall refill all holes made by them in their preliminary prospecting work.

"This permit shall include the right to quarry or mine lime or clay deposits if it should be determined that such deposits exist in commercial quantities.

"The royalty provided in said lease shall be 5% of the gross proceeds from sale of all minerals including lime or clay etc except in the event gold should be discovered the royalty shall be 10% gross proceeds of all sales of gold.

"The period of said lease shall be for — years or as long thereafter as ore or other products covered by this permit shall be produced in paying quantities.

"The premises covered by this permit are described as follows:

"The N. W. ¼ of Sec. 6 Twp. 2 S. Range 2 W. San Bernardino Co. Calif. containing 175 acres more or less.

"It is distinctly understood that this permit does not grant the right to prospect for or develop oil or other petroleum products.

"Witness our hands this 6th day of January, 1927. Geo. D. Heron "Accepted. Leroy Moore.

"Oliver Marriott."

They further allege that through inadvertence this agreement was not signed by Mary E. Heron, but that she thereafter orally ratified and affirmed all of the provisions thereof; that within sixty days they expended the sum of $1,500 in prospecting for ores and minerals upon the land in question, in accordance with the terms of the agreement; that they discovered a vein of gold and silver assaying $14.22 per ton; that on or about March 1, 1927, they demanded of the defendants the execution and delivery of a mining lease in accordance with the terms of the agreement; and that compliance with their demand was refused by the defendants. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained by the court, without leave to amend. From the judgment which followed this appeal is taken.

Appellants, apparently following the arguments raised upon the hearing of the demurrer, urge that the agreement set up in the complaint is not void for want of mutuality; that the consideration was just and reasonable; and that the contract and lease described therein are sufficiently definite and certain to be specifically enforced.

[1] The courts will not compel the specific performance of a contract when its nature is such that the one seeking its enforcement could not himself be compelled to perform. Civ. Code, § 3386; O'Brien v. O'Brien, 197 Cal. 577, 241 P. 861. In Poultry Producers, etc., v. Barlow, 189 Cal. 278, 208 P. 93, 94, the court says: "The doctrine is elementary and impregnably fortified by authority that a contract cannot be specifically enforced unless this remedy is available to both parties. Equity will not enforce a specific performance of a contract when the party asking its enforcement cannot, from the nature of the obligation assumed, be compelled to perform on his part." And, also: "The remedy must be mutual, as well as the obligation, and when the contract is of such a nature that it cannot be specifically enforced as to one of the parties, equity will not enforce it against the other."

[2,3] Appellants rely upon the contention that this rule does not apply in this case, for the reason that they have fully performed, and that this performance has removed any lack of mutuality theretofore existing. It has, of course, been held that where an original lack of mutuality has been removed at the time the action is brought, the contract may be specifically enforced. Sayward v. Houghton, 119 Cal. 545, 51 P. 853, 52 P. 44; Spire v. Urbahn, 124 Cal. 110, 56 P. 794. The justice and reason behind such an exception to the general rule are fully apparent in cases where all, or substantially all, that was to be done by the party seeking the relief has been fully performed. Where a party has agreed to convey a right of way on condition that a railroad be built, the actual building of the road is certainly as beneficial to the land owner, as an enforceable agreement to build the same. The situation is somewhat different in the case of a preliminary agreement, to be followed by a lease, looking to the exploration or prospecting of land for oil or minerals, and in which the main purpose in view is the actual development of the land in that regard, and the removal therefrom of the oil or minerals when found. The case of Dabney v. Key, 57 Cal. App. 762, 207 P. 921, is a case somewhat similar in principle to the case at bar. In that case, the defendants had agreed in writing to execute a lease enabling the land to be prospected for oil. The defendants having later refused to execute such a lease, the action was brought to compel specific performance. The court denied this relief on the ground that the form of lease which was presented to the defendants, and which they refused to execute, was not a mutual obligation, in that the plaintiffs did not bind themselves to drill for oil on the land, but specifically reserved the right to surrender the lease at any time they saw fit, whereas the instrument purported to bind the owners of the land for the term of twenty years, and as long thereafter as oil should be produced in paying quantities. In the instant case, it is not alleged that a form of lease was actually presented to these defendants, but it is alleged that the lease demanded and refused was to be in accordance with the terms of the agreement above set forth. While such a lease as is described in the agreement would not appear to contain a clause permitting its surrender at any time the lessee should see fit, that would undoubtedly be the legal effect of the whole lease. It is provided that the lease claimed shall give to the lessees certain rights which are mentioned, but nowhere is it provided that any obligations shall be assumed by the lessees. While the proposed lease gives them the right to enter the property and carry on mining operations, they do not agree to do so. If they should begin operations, they do not agree to continue them any designated time, nor even as long as they are profitable. Even the omnibus clause covering everything "usually contained in a mining lease in California" (whatever that may be) provides that the lessees shall be given all the rights and privileges known to the industry, but is absolutely silent as to any obligations upon their part. We are unable to find any provision for any right or benefit accruing to the lessors, which they might enforce. That the lessees might abandon the project at any time, regardless of the interests or wishes of the lessors, appears just as certainly from the terms of this contract as it does from the lease tendered in the case of Dabney v. Key, supra. Even the prospecting permit puts no obligation upon the appellants, providing only that a lease may be demanded, not upon a certain result being obtained, but upon a contingency left entirely to their own judgment. Respondents would be utterly unable to specifically enforce anything against the appellants, either upon the prospecting permit or upon such a lease as is therein described. The provision for a lease is included within the prospecting agreement and is an inseparable part thereof; the purpose of the entire agreement being not only to bring about a discovery of minerals in the land, but also to bring about the opening up of mines for the purpose of making such minerals available. Under such circumstances, we feel that the work done by the appellants as alleged in the complaint is not such a full and substantial performance as to bring them within the exception upon which they rely. While the objects and purposes of the agreement were still far from accomplished, under the terms of the instrument, the respondents could neither compel appellants to accept a lease, nor to proceed with the work.

[4, 5] Nor can we consider the agreement in question as just and reasonable, within the meaning of section 3391 of the Civil Code, since it is so entirely one-sided that it cannot be enforced by the respondents. Neither before nor after they receive a lease do they agree to do anything. The real purpose of this agreement is not merely the discovery of minerals, but also the further development of the property. This real purpose must be considered. Los Angeles, etc., v. Occidental Oil Co., 144 Cal. 528, 78 P. 25. Not only is the agreement here unenforceable for lack of mutuality, but it calls for personal services, the right to which could not be enforced by the respondents. Sturgis v. Galindo, 59 Cal. 28, 43 Am. Rep. 239. As was said in Pacific Ry. Co. v. Campbell-Johnston, 153 Cal. 106, 94 P. 623, 628, equity "will not decree specific performance when the duty to be performed is a continuous one, extending possibly over a long period of time and which, in order that the performance may be made effectual, will necessarily require the constant personal supervision and oversight of it by the court."

[6] It is next urged that the agreement in question is sufficiently definite and certain to permit of specific performance. This argument is addressed to the duration of the proposed lease, under the provision that it shall be for ——— years, or as long thereafter as the minerals in question shall be produced in paying quantities. If it be assumed that such a clause is not in itself void for uncertainty, when it is remembered that the lessees are not bound for any length of time, the duration of the lease could not well be made more uncertain. There is also the provision that the lease shall contain all the other rights and privileges usually contained in a mining lease in California. This agreement is not only indefinite and uncertain, but it would be practically impossible for any court to say what the terms of the lease should be.

Such an agreement cannot be specifically enforced. Civ. Code, § 3390, subd. 6; Stanton v. Singleton, 126 Cal. 657, 59 P. 146, 47 L. R. A. 334. Neither the terms of the lease nor the precise acts which are to be done by the respective parties thereto are clearly ascertainable. Berry v. Moulie, 180 Cal. 187, 179 P. 686, 687. In the case last cited, the court said: "The secrets remained within the breast of the defendant, and he alone would know whether or not he had complied with the judgment which required him to deliver the formulas." In the instant case, were the court to order a delivery of the lease described, whether or not the order was complied with, would not even be known to the respondents.

Since we are of the opinion that the complaint fails to set forth a contract which may be specifically enforced, it is unnecessary to consider the other points raised.

The judgment is affirmed.

MASSIMINO v. TARANTO.

Civ. 7382.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Sept. 30, 1930.

1. Judgment ⇨153(1).

Defaulting party, on discovering default has been entered, must proceed with reasonable diligence to have it set aside.

2. Judgment ⇨143(10).

Refusal to set aside default on attorney's mere statement he did not appear because he believed other attorneys had been substituted held not abuse of discretion.

Affidavit, on original motion to set aside default, recited that attorney failed to plead within time required because of mistaken belief that copy of complaint received from defendant was in another action in which he had already entered appearance. On date set for hearing of motion defendant failed to appear and motion was denied for lack of prosecution. Subsequently second notice of motion to set aside default was filed by substituted attorney. In attempted explanation of failure to prosecute first motion, affidavit of defendant's first attorney was presented merely stating he did not appear because he believed another attorney had been substituted in his place, without stating facts from which court might determine whether belief was reasonable.

Judgment in this action was taken by default for appellant's failure to appear and plead to the complaint within the time allowed by law after personal service of summons upon her. On May 7, 1929, a motion to vacate and set aside the default was filed by the attorney then representing appellant, fixing May 14, 1929, as the date upon which such motion would be made. This notice was accompanied by a proposed answer, and affidavits of appellant and her then attorney. These affidavits recited that on the date of service upon her appellant had personally delivered the copy of summons and complaint to her attorney and that he had failed to plead for her within time because of his mistaken belief that the copy of the complaint was one in another action between the same parties in which he had already entered an appearance for appellant. On May 14, 1929, appellant's then attorney failed to appear to present the motion and the motion was denied for lack of prosecution.

Subsequently, on September 17, 1929, a second notice of motion to set aside the default and judgment was filed by appellant's attorneys, they having in the meantime been substituted for the attorney who filed the first notice of motion. In attempted explanation of the failure to prosecute the first motion, an affidavit of appellant's first attorney was presented in which he stated that he did not appear at the hearing of the first motion because "he believed that another attorney had been substituted in his place." No facts were stated from which the court might determine whether or not this belief was reasonable or justifiable. This second motion was denied, and from that order this appeal is taken.

[1, 2] Once the fact that a default has been entered is discovered, the defaulting party must proceed with reasonable diligence in seeking to have it set aside. Smith v. Pelton

Water Wheel Co., 151 Cal. 394, 90 P. 934. Having pyramided one default upon another, it was incumbent upon appellant to show some good reason for the failure to prosecute the first motion as well as for the failure to appear originally in the action. We cannot hold that it was an abuse of discretion for the trial court to refuse to accept as an excuse for the failure to present the first motion the naked assertion of the attorney's belief, in the absence of the recital of any supporting facts upon which the belief was based.

Order affirmed.

BARNARD, J.

This is an action for damages for injuries sustained in an automobile accident at a street intersection. The complaint sets forth a cause of action for damages to the car belonging to the plaintiffs, and a second cause of action covering personal injuries sustained by plaintiff Marie Quatacker. The answer denies negligence on the part of the defendant and alleges the contributory negligence of the plaintiff Marie Quatacker. After a trial without a jury, the court entered judgment for the defendant, based upon findings of fact to the effect that both parties were negligent, and that any damages sustained by either of the plaintiffs was due directly and proximately to their own contributory negligence, in that Marie Quatacker so negligently operated plaintiffs' automobile at the time and place in question that she by her negligence proximately contributed to the injuries complained of. The plaintiffs have appealed upon the sole ground that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain these findings as to contributory negligence.

[1] It is conceded that the collision occurred at an intersection where the view was sufficiently obstructed to bring it within the provisions of section 113, par. (b), subd. 2, of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436), as in force in 1927; and a speed of more than 15 miles per hour at that point would therefore constitute some evidence of negligence. Benjamin v. Noonan, 207 Cal. 279, 277 P. 1045. Such evidence might be sufficient to establish negligence. That it was established in this case has been held by the trial court. If, then, there is evidence in the record from which the inference may legitimately be drawn that plaintiff Marie Quatacker was in fact crossing said intersection at a rate of speed greater than 15 miles per hour, that her speed was negligent under the existing conditions, and that such excessive speed contributed to the accident, the findings of the court are sustained.

[2] Appellant Marie Quatacker testified at the trial that when she crossed the intersection itself she was going from 13 to 15 miles per hour; that, as she arrived at the intersection, she looked to the right and the left, saw no one coming and did not see defendant's car until she was over half way across; and that she was stepping on the gas when she saw the other car coming and continued to do so, as she tried to get out of the way. As to her speed before she reached the intersection, she said she had not looked at the speedometer, but was sure she was not going over 25 miles per hour, as she never exceeded that speed when she had her baby with her. There was introduced in evidence a written statement made by this appellant shortly after the accident, which contained the following:

"On August 24, 1927, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, I was driving my Buick Sedan south on Tustin Blyd. near Santa Ana, and approaching the intersection of McFadden Street, which crosses Tustin at right angles. I was going 25 miles per hour at the intersection, and had reached the edge of the McFadden Street pavement on the north side of the intersection with my front wheels, when I first saw another car coming from my left—that is, from the east. I had no time to stop and did not apply my brakes as it was too late to stop, but I did try to get by across in front of him. I don't remember whether I stepped on the gas or not, or whether I turned any to the right. I wanted to get by so the other car would not hit my car in the middle."

Appellant insists that the speed of 25 miles per hour mentioned in this statement, refers to a point before she had reached the intersection, and that this is not contradictory to her statement at the trial that she was crossing the same at a speed of from 13 to 15 miles per hour. The statement is at least such as to justify the inference that she was going 25 miles per hour as she reached the beginning of the intersection, and this, coupled with her statement that when she reached the edge of the intersection she first saw the other car approaching, that she had not time to stop, did not apply her brakes, but did try to get across in front of the other car, and her statement at the trial that when she first saw the other car she was stepping on the gas and continued to do so in an effort to get across ahead of the other car, seems to justify the inference that she increased rather than diminished her speed. There was also evidence that the car driven by the respondent was first to enter the intersection; that it entered the same at a speed of from 20 to 25 miles per hour; that it struck the appellants' car at the rear door and the rear wheel; and that the collision occurred near the center of the intersection. These facts, taken in connection with her statement that she was stepping on the gas in an effort to cross ahead of the other car, confirm the inference that may reasonably be drawn from the preceding evidence, that she was proceeding at a rate in excess of 15 miles an hour, since she was able to almost clear the path of respondent's car, although he entered the intersection first and at an unlawful speed. Further support is found in the undisputed fact that, when the collision occurred, respondent's car remained at the point of impact, while appellants' car went straight ahead and a little to the right for a distance of 30 feet, where it turned around and tipped over on its side.

[3] The law is well settled that, where there is any substantial evidence to sustain findings of fact by a trial court, they will not be disturbed on appeal. Ricks v. Adorni, 86 Cal. App. 284, 260 P. 815; Angelo American Land Co. v. Heine, 52 Cal. App. 472, 198 P. 1009. The findings here complained of are amply supported by the evidence referred to, with the inferences that may legitimately be drawn therefrom.

The judgment is affirmed.

Application of Sidney E. Forbes for a writ of habeas corpus.

Writ denied.

Albert J. McGuire, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The petition for a writ of habeas corpus herein, in behalf of Sidney E. Forbes, represents to the court that the said Sidney E. Forbes is now illegally detained in the state prison at Folsom by the warden of said prison.

Without following the recitals of the different paragraphs of the petition, the facts may be summarized as follows: On the 6th day of May, 1926, Sidney E. Forbes was received at the state prison, having been sentenced for the crime of burglary. On the 2d day of July, 1927, the term of imprisonment of said Forbes was fixed at five years. On the 17th day of April, 1929, Sidney E. Forbes was released upon parole. On the 28th day of December, 1929, Sidney E. Forbes was arrested on a charge of burglary and violation of section 1, chapter 323, Statutes of 1925, and thereafter sentenced to six months' imprisonment in the county jail in San Francisco. Thereafter, upon these facts being regularly presented to the board of prison directors, said board, on the 25th day of January, 1930, suspended the parole theretofore granted said Sidney E. Forbes and directed that he be retaken and returned to the actual custody of the state prison. On September 2, 1930, upon the expiration of the six months' sentence herein mentioned, Sidney E. Forbes was returned to the state prison at Folsom, and thereafter, upon due notice, all credits theretofore earned and granted, and also all credits which would be possible for him to earn, were forfeited and disallowed by order of the board.

The petitioner's contention for the discharge of Sidney E. Forbes is based upon the theory that the time Sidney E. Forbes was out of the actual confines of the walls of the state prison at Folsom serving his six months' sentence imposed, as heretofore stated, in the county jail at San Francisco should be counted as time served upon his five-year sentence imposed by the state prison board on July 2, 1927. If such time should be counted, then and in that event the writ prayed for should be granted. If not, it should be denied.

[1] Under section 1168 of the Penal Code and the decisions based thereon the time that a paroled prisoner is at large ordinarily counts the same as time served when within the actual inclosure of the state prison. The authorities are quite numerous to the effect that a prisoner serving a sentence of imprisonment in a state prison is, in contemplation of law, a prisoner therein as well when at work outside, under the surveillance of prison guards, as when confined within its walls, and also that a prisoner, while outside the prison walls upon parole, is likewise within the custody and control of the state prison, but need not be cited for the reason that section 1168 of the Penal Code, as amended (St. 1929, p. 1934), reads as follows: "Prisoners on parole shall remain under the legal custody and control of the state board of prison directors and shall be subject at any time to be taken back within the inclosure of the prison." The contention that time shall run in favor of a paroled prisoner while outside the actual inclosure of the walls of prison depends, however, upon the contingency that he is lawfully at large.

[2-4] In the case of Woodward v. Murdock, 124 Ind. 439, 24 N. E. 1047, 1048, the principal case relied upon by the petitioner herein, contains the following significant sentence: "As the appellant was a prisoner absent from the prison by proper authority, under no view of the case, in our opinion, could his imprisonment be continued longer than the period for which he was sentenced, less his credit for good time." The question presented in that case was as to whether the time he was out on parole should be counted in his favor as so many days or months served upon his sentence. It was there held, in support of the prisoner's contention, that he was absent from prison by proper authority. In the case at bar the prisoner was not absent from the inclosure of the state prison at Folsom by or upon proper authority. His parole had been suspended, and during that period of time it cannot be consistently argued that he was absent by proper authority. That he was not brought back to the state prison at Folsom under the order of the prison directors directing that he be returned constitutes no defense. There is no question or dispute as to the sufficiency of the showing that Sidney E. Forbes had violated the terms of his parole, and of the power of the board to revoke or suspend the same, which, so far as the prisoner at large was concerned, constituted one and the same thing, and, having suspended the right of Sidney E. Forbes to remain at large on parole, he was absent from the inclosure of the state prison without leave and without legal authority. The fact that Sidney E. Forbes was confined in the county jail at the county of San Francisco likewise constitutes no defense; neither do we think that section 670 of the Penal Code, relied upon by the state, is applicable here, as Sidney E. Forbes was not taken by any legal process, as contemplated within the terms of that section. Otherwise, no time would run in favor of a paroled prisoner. We think that section refers to time when a prisoner is taken from the actual confines of a state prison to be tried, for instance, on some other charge. Nor do we think that section 105 of the Penal Code, relative to escapes, and the subsequent sections relative to punishment for escapes, applicable to this case.

In the case of Ex parte McGuire, 135 Cal. 339, 67 P. 327, 87 Am. St. Rep. 105, a case involving a sentence to the state prison and a misdemeanor sentence the conclusion must be drawn that, during all the time after the 25th day of January, 1930, Sidney E. Forbes should have been within the actual inclosure of the prison walls at Folsom. That his own wrong in violating his parole prevented his being taken back, whether mistakenly or properly, by the parole officer of the state prison, does not furnish any reason for the granting of the writ herein.

[5, 6] The opinion, In re Collins, 8 Cal. App. 367, 97 P. 188, shows clearly that it was within the power of Sidney E. Forbes to have himself immediately returned to actual custody at Folsom. When a person is under legal compulsion to serve a sentence, execution of that sentence can only be had in one way, and that is by submission to the execution of that sentence. Ex parte Rice (Okla. Cr. App.) 289 P. 360. Immediately upon a revocation or suspension of the parole on July 25, 1930, by the prison board, which, of course, revoked the right of Sidney E. Forbes to be at large or to be outside the actual inclosure of the state prison at Folsom, it became the legal duty of Sidney E. Forbes to surrender himself and again submit to actual custody within the walls of said prison. He could either do it voluntarily, or by legal proceedings, have himself so submitted. That his own wrong prevented such a procedure without legal steps to enforce his surrender and recommencing the undergoing incarceration within the actual walls of the state prison does not entitle him to have the intervening time allowed as a part service of his sentence.

Any holding that time served upon a misdemeanor sentence of a paroled prisoner, after suspension or revocation of parole, should be counted as so much time served upon the previous sentence to state prison, would subvert the very purpose of the provisions of section 1168 of the Penal Code relative to paroles and take away all the restraining influences of the rules and regulations of the state board, having for their purpose the insuring that the person paroled shall not again become a violator of the law.

The writ is denied.

1. Charities ☞11.

Will held to contemplate gift to orphans' home; hence, bequest for charitable purpose authorized by statute (Civ. Code, § 1313).

By residuary clause of will in controversy, testator gave his estate to State Orphans' Home at Carson City, Nev., declaring that board of directors and their successors should hold trust fund as perpetual trust, and each year should expend interest in purchasing useful and pleasing presents at Christmas time for distribution among orphans.

2. Charities ☞20(1).

That Nevada laws authorize directors of Nevada orphans' home to receive bequests referred contention directors were incapable of taking as trustees under will (Civ. Code, § 1313).

3. States ☞119.

Bequest to Nevada orphans' home to purchase "useful" and pleasing Christmas presents held not unenforceable as violating Nevada Constitution forbidding use of public funds for sectarian purposes (Civ. Code, § 1313; Const. Nev. art. 11, § 10).

Will in controversy merely directed distribution of presents among orphans, and did not require observance of Christmas Day as religious festival. Fact that presents were to be "useful" showed that testator's intention was purely charitable.

NOURSE, P. J.

This is a proceeding to determine heirship under section 1664, Code of Civil Procedure, and to void the residuary clause of the will of Henry Wood bequeathing the residue of his estate in trust for the benefit of the inmates of the State Orphans' Home of the state of Nevada. The probate court entered a judgment sustaining the residuary clause of the will, from which the petitioner appeals on a bill of exceptions.

The clause under attack reads in part as follows: "I give * * * all the rest * * * of my estate * * * to the State Orphans Home at Carson City, Nevada. All of the sum total of said property bequeathed, shall constitute a perpetual trust fund. * * * The Board of Directors of the State Orphans Home, and their successors thereof, to have and to hold the said trust fund as a perpetual trust, and each successive year to expend all the interest derived from the said trust fund for that year in purchasing useful and pleasing presents at Christmas time of each year for distribution among the orphans of said State Orphans Home." (Italics ours.)

[1] The probate court found that it was the true intent of the testator to make a gift in trust to the directors of the home for the benefit of the inmates thereof. We are in accord with this finding, as such intent is manifest from the face of the will. As such the bequest was one for a charitable purpose (Estate of Sutro, 155 Cal. 727, 736, 102 P. 920) and one expressly authorized by section 1313, Civil Code. To this extent the judgment is supported by Estate of Upham, 127 Cal. 90, 59 P. 315.

[2] Under the laws of the state of Nevada the directors of the orphans' home are authorized to receive and have control of bequests made to the home and to dispose of the property bequeathed in the manner directed by the donor. This disposes of the objection that the directors are incapable of taking as trustees under the will.

[3] The further argument is made that the trust is unenforceable because the observance of Christmas is a ceremony peculiar to the Christian religion, and hence the use of the funds for the purposes designated would violate the provisions of section 10 of article 11 of the Nevada state Constitution prohibiting the use of public funds for sectarian purposes. There are many answers which could be made to the point, but it is sufficient to say that the will merely directs that the trustees distribute among the orphans in the home useful and pleasing presents at Christmas time. It does not require the observance of Christmas day as a religious festival. In directing that these gifts be useful, the intention of the testator is shown to be purely charitable, and it cannot be said to offend the provisions of the Nevada Constitution, which, it will be noted, relates to "sectarian," as distinguished from religious purposes. Evans v. Selma Union H. S. Dist., 193 Cal. 54, 57, 222 P. 801, 31 A. L. R. 1121.

NOURSE, P. J.

Petitioner seeks by certiorari to review an order of the superior court directing the taking of depositions to perpetuate testimony under section 2083, et seq., of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The steps necessary to enable a party to have a deposition taken to perpetuate testimony are found in section 2084. The proceeding must be initiated by a verified petition of the applicant showing that he expects to be a party to an action in a court in this state, or "that the proof of some fact is necessary to perfect the title to property in which he is interested, or to establish marriage, descent, heirship, or any other matter which may hereafter become material to establish, though no suit may at the time be anticipated." The petitioner's attack upon the proceedings in the superior court is based upon the ground that the applicants have not pleaded any facts which bring them within the terms of this section, and that therefore the superior court was without jurisdiction to make the order.

The application upon which the proceedings were initiated alleges that the applicants are husband and wife, that the husband has executed a will in which he has devised property of considerable value to his son, August Cailleaud, and to his two grandsons, and property of little value to his son, Henry Cailleaud, Jr., the petitioner herein. It is then alleged that the son Henry has expressed displeasure over such disposition of the property and that applicants believe he will at some future date institute a contest or other action for the recovery of a larger portion of the property of applicants.

[1, 2] In so far as the application relates to an anticipated will contest, it is sham. The testator would not be a party to a contest of his own will and the applicants show by their petition that the testator's wife would not be an interested party. The allegations that the son Henry may institute some proceeding for the recovery of some of the property heretofore conveyed to the other son would seem to bring the application within the provisions of the first subdivision of section 2084, Code of Civil Procedure, but it will be noted that the first and second subdivisions of this section are separated by the word "or" and that the second and third subdivisions are separated by the word "and." Thus, it is necessary to allege, in addition to the matters contained in either subdivision 1 or 2, the matters specified in subdivision 3. Under this subdivision it is necessary to state "a general outline of the facts expected to be proved."

[3] To meet this requirement the applicants merely allege that they "expect to establish by their testimony the respective financial circumstances of said Henry Cailleaud, Jr., and August R. Cailleaud, and their reasons for providing more amply for their son August * * * and expect to establish by their testimony many facts and circumstances which would be material in such expected contest, action or other adverse proceedings."

That general allegations of this character are insufficient to support an order to take a deposition has been determined in Irving v. Superior Court, 79 Cal. App. 361, 364, 249 P. 236, 237, where such an order was annulled on certiorari. In that case the District Court cited with approval the general rule from 8 R. C. L. 1148, reading: "The bill should describe a subject of controversy so as to identify it, in order to enable the court * * * to direct the interrogatories or specify the matter as to which the witnesses are to be examined." Many authorities from other jurisdictions are cited to the rule by the court but it is unnecessary to enumerate them here. The reason for the rule is emphasized by the district court in this opinion. After pointing out that if the allegation that applicants "expect to prove" certain facts without alleging that the facts were true and without showing that they were material was sufficient then the requirement of the Code section that the application be "verified by the oath of the applicant" was rendered useless, the court said: "Persons should not be compelled to submit to examinations 'concerning their property or business transactions or methods,' except upon allegations of fact, duly verified, reasonably showing that the evidence sought is material to some present or anticipated controversy."

In what respect the reasons why the applicants gave more of their property to one son would be material to any anticipated litigation does not appear from the application while the allegation that applicants expect to establish "many facts and circumstances" is of no force whatever. If an application of this character is sufficient, we might pertinently ask, why should an application be verified if it merely states that the applicant anticipates some litigation and expects to prove in his deposition facts which may be material thereto? Any one could verify such an application without fear of perjury.

The order is annulled.

1. Sales ⇨52(6).

Evidence held not to show express or implied contract to pay for merchandise billed to defendant on order of third party without defendant's consent and accepted by defendant under justified belief that seller was merely supplying goods at instance of third party.

Defendant ordered box shooks from third party, who contracted to purchase same from plaintiff and without consulting defendant informed plaintiff that it could bill merchandise to defendant directly. Defendant on receiving invoices objected to having goods billed to it directly and told third party that it had never dealt with plaintiff company. Third party was indebted to defendant in amount of cost of merchandise which had been advanced to third party under contract. Plaintiff demanded payment for merchandise from third party, and on third party's bankruptcy sued defendant for merchandise.

TYLER, P. J.

Action to recover the sum of $5,302.68 for certain box shooks alleged to have been sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant. The complaint is in two counts; the first being for the reasonable value of the goods alleged to have been sold and delivered, and the second setting forth an express contract to pay the sum as the purchase price.

Trial was had, and the court found that plaintiff did not sell or deliver to defendant the merchandise in question and that it did not agree to pay for the same. It is here claimed as ground for reversal of the judgment that the findings of the trial court are not supported by the evidence. There is no merit in the contention, as the record contains ample evidence to show that there was no contract, either express or implied, between the parties.

There is little dispute between the parties as to the principal facts established by the evidence. So much of it as supports the findings may be briefly summarized as follows: In May, 1928, defendant entered into an agreement with one Omer Denny, who was engaged in the business of dealing in and manufacturing box shooks as White Pine Products Company, a corporation, by which the latter agreed to deliver to defendant Rosenberg Bros. & Co. two million board feet of box shooks at a price of $37.50 per thousand feet. In November of the same year all of this lumber, except about five carloads, had been delivered and defendant was insisting that delivery be made of the balance. Not being in a position to perform the contract, Denny telephoned to Sacramento Box & Lumber Company, plaintiff herein, to ascertain if it would accept an order for three cars of box shooks to help fill Denny's contract with defendant. Terms were discussed and a price was agreed upon at $39 per thousand feet. The president of plaintiff corporation expressed a preference to bill the lumber direct to defendant as he was uncertain whether he desired to invoice the White Pine Products Company and accept that credit. Denny informed him that he thought this would be satisfactory, but he would have to confer with defendant to confirm such arrangement. Without consulting defendant in the premises, Denny concluded that the matter would be agreeable to it, and he telephoned plaintiff that the plan was satisfactory. Plaintiff never attempted to have defendant confirm this arrangement. Denny thereafter forwarded plaintiff a written order for two cars of shooks. This order was from White Pine Products Company to plaintiff and it directed the merchandise to be delivered and invoiced to defendant. Subsequently three other carloads were ordered by Denny under the same directions. All five cars were at different times shipped by plaintiff. In each car, nailed on the inside of the door, was a manifest on the bill head of plaintiff, Sacramento Box & Lumber Company, which stated that the merchandise was sold and shipped to Rosenberg Bros. & Company for its account. Plaintiff also mailed to defendant a duplicate copy of the manifest of each car, original bills of lading and invoices. On receipt of the invoices of the first shipment, the purchasing agent of defendant company discovering that the merchandise had been billed to his company by plaintiff, immediately took the matter up with Denny and expressed dissatisfaction with the method of the shipment, stating to Denny that he objected to having the merchandise charged by plaintiff to defendant company as he had never dealt with that company. Before Denny placed the order with plaintiff, he was indebted to defendant company in the sum of $5,000, as that sum had been advanced to him under his contract. Denny at this time stated to defendant's agent that the whole matter was a mistake as the merchandise should have been billed to his company and he promised to take the matter up with plaintiff and rebill defendant for the same. The invoices were turned over to Denny, who thereafter sent defendant other invoices on his own bill heads covering the shipments. There is evidence to show that Denny acquainted plaintiff with this fact, and the latter did not protest but merely expressed the thought that it wished to be sure of payment. After all the shipments had been made, defendant settled in full with Denny. Thereafter, plaintiff from time to time demanded payment from Denny and referred to the fact that he had been paid in full for the lumber. Denny promised to make payment, but the promise not being fulfilled, plaintiff brought an action against the White Pine Products Company, through which Denny did business, to recover for goods sold and delivered to it. About this time the White Pine Products Company became insolvent and an involuntary petition in bankruptcy was instituted against it, plaintiff being a petitioning creditor. In its verified petition, plaintiff herein alleged that the White Pine Products Company was indebted to it for the very lumber which forms the subject of this controversy.

[1-3] Under these facts there is no reasonable ground for claiming that defendant was liable to plaintiff on implied assumpsit. Defendant did nothing which could possibly be construed as an implied ratification of the purchase which Denny attempted to make on its behalf. Defendant had the right to select and determine with whom it would contract and could not have another thrust upon it without its consent. As soon as it became familiar with the transaction between Denny and plaintiff, it repudiated the entire matter. Under the facts as narrated, no contract, either express or implied, existed between the parties. They show that plaintiff invoiced and charged to defendant merchandise without inquiring whether or not the arrangement between Denny and plaintiff would be satisfactory to it. When defendant learned of the arrangement it immediately repudiated the same and received and accepted the goods under the justified belief that plaintiff was merely supplying them at the instance of the White Pine Products Company, and that plaintiff would look to that company for payment. There was no express contract between plaintiff and defendant, nor does the conduct and dealings of the parties show in any manner that defendant impliedly assented to any contract whatever with the plaintiff. On the contrary, the evidence shows that it wanted nothing to do with the arrangement between Denny and plaintiff for obvious reasons, and plaintiff was so notified. Counsel have favored us with many authorities upon the subject of what facts do or do not raise an implied contract. A discussion of these cases would answer no useful purpose. Suffice it to say that, as in the case of other contracts, a contract of sale may or may not be implied from facts and circumstances. Here there are facts which negative any obligation on the part of defendant to pay. The rule is elementary that a person has a right to select and determine with whom he will contract, and he cannot have another thrust upon him without his consent.

Respondent raises the further question that the proceedings brought by plaintiff against the White Pine Products Company constitute an election of remedies which precludes plaintiff from now asserting its claim against defendant. Considering the conclusion we have reached, a discussion and determination of this question becomes unnecessary. It may be said, however, that the circumstance affords strong evidence that plaintiff intended to sell the merchandise to White Pine Products Company and not to the defendant.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fletcher Bowron, Judge.

Action by A. E. Hargrove and wife against Harry O. Henderson and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

LUTTRELL, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiffs and appellants, who are husband and wife, brought this action against defendants and respondents to recover damages for fraudulent representations made as to the quantity and boundary lines of a certain tract of land sold by them to plaintiffs in the county of Orange, state of California.

Plaintiff A. E. Hargrove engaged in the real estate business in said county in the year 1919. On March 1, 1920, he entered into a copartnership with defendants Harry O. Henderson and J. Lloyd Moore and a man by the name of Wagner. This copartnership was formed to conduct a real estate business.

At the time of the formation of such copartnership, the defendants Henderson owned a triangular piece of land in said Orange county, across which the Southern Pacific Company owned a right of way two hundred feet wide. This right of way had come to said company through a grant from the United States in 1872. The right of way divided said triangular parcel of land owned by the Hendersons into two separate parcels. The triangular piece, including the right of way, contained 4.78 acres of land. Excluding the right of way, it contained 3.75 acres, the area of the right of way being 1.03 acres.

Some time prior to the formation of such copartnership, the defendants Henderson had contracted to sell said parcel of land, including the 1.03 acres owned by the railroad company, to the defendant Moore, and the Moores had gone into possession of the land under the contract. The Moores were desirous of disposing of their interest in the land, and it was in the hands of such real estate copartnership for sale. Shortly after plaintiff Hargrove became associated with defendants in such real estate business, his associates Henderson and Moore called his attention to this land with a view of interesting him in its purchase. He made several trips to the land and looked it over. On one occasion, defendant Harry O. Henderson took him to the land and showed him the corners and boundaries thereof. The entire tract, including the 1.03-acre right of way owned by the railroad company, was planted to orange trees, the trees on the said right of way being younger and smaller than those on the parcels on either side thereof, owned by the Hendersons. The said right of way was unfenced and had no ties or railroad track of any description upon it. It had, in fact, nothing upon it to indicate that it was a right of way and looked no different from the adjoining land, except that the growing trees upon it were, as heretofore stated, younger and smaller than those on the adjoining land. On the occasion when defendant Harry O. Henderson took plaintiff A. E. Hargrove to the land and showed him the boundaries they went entirely around the triangular tract, and Henderson informed Hargrove that he owned the entire tract, including the 1.03-acre right of way owned by the railroad company. No mention was made at that time of the right of way, but, upon their return to their office, Hargrove asked Henderson if the railroad company had any right of way across the land, and in reply Henderson told him that the railroad company had no right of way there and had no interest in the land.

Later on, during the month of May, 1920, and before the purchase of the land by plaintiffs, as hereinafter noted, defendant Henderson again told Hargrove that the railroad company had no right of way there; that the company never had owned the land and had not used it for eleven years; that he could not get the railroad company to do anything about it and that he finally tore up the railroad ties and rails and planted the land where they had been to orange trees. He further informed Hargrove on such occasion that the railroad company had had him in court three times over the matter, but that his attorney had each time demurred the company out of court, and that the company was through and had no right there and would not come back again.

On May 28, 1920, the defendants Henderson sold the entire triangular tract, including the 1.03 acre right of way owned by the railroad company, to plaintiffs for the sum of $24,000. This was the same amount that the defendants Moore had contracted to pay the Hendersons for the land when they entered into the contract to purchase same. At the time of the sale to the Hargroves the Moores had paid the Hendersons on the purchase price of the land the sum of $11,500 and still owed the sum of $12,500. The Hargroves paid the purchase price of the land by paying to the Moores the $11,500, which they had paid to the Hendersons under their contract and by giving to the Hendersons their notes, secured by a mortgage on the land for $12,500, the balance of the purchase price. Thereupon, and on said May 28, 1920, the Hendersons executed and delivered to the plaintiff a joint-tenancy deed "granting" to them, as joint tenants, the entire triangular tract of land, describing same by metes and bounds, "and containing 4.78 acres."

This deed, after describing the land sought to be conveyed, contained a clause in the following language: "Subject to the conditions, covenants, restrictions and reservations now of record."

Plaintiffs went into possession of the entire 4.78 acres and in due time, paid the notes and mortgage given the Hendersons in the purchase of the land.

In 1924, the Southern Pacific Company brought an action in ejectment against plaintiffs for the 1.03 acres embraced in its right of way and recovered judgment and evicted plaintiffs from said 1.03-acre tract.

Plaintiffs then brought the present action for damages. At the trial of the action plaintiffs proved the facts, as above set forth, and in addition proved that they relied upon the representations of defendant Harry O. Henderson, as to his ownership of the entire tract of land described in their deed, including the 1.03 acres thereof owned at the time by the Southern Pacific Company. They also proved their claimed damage of $12,000, being the difference in value between the triangular tract purchased, including the railroad right of way and its value excluding such right of way.

After plaintiffs had rested their case, defendants moved the trial court for a nonsuit, which motion was granted and judgment thereupon made and entered in favor of defendants for their costs of suit. From this judgment this appeal was taken.

During the trial respondents seemed to lay much stress upon the so-called reservation clause contained in the deed, as above mentioned, talking the position that such clause excepted the railroad right of way from the transfer. Apparently this position has been abandoned on this appeal, as no mention is made of the point in respondents' brief. Anyway, we find no merit in such claim.

In our view of the case the appeal presents but two questions for solution: First: Did the defendant Harry O. Henderson, acting in behalf of himself and his wife in selling the land in question, perpetrate a fraud upon the purchasers in representing to them that he owned the entire tract deeded, and that the railroad company did not then, nor had it ever owned any part of such tract, or did he give the purchasers sufficient information regarding any claim which the railroad company might have to put them upon notice and obligate them to search the records, or make further inquiry as to the condition of the title of the lands involved before purchasing same? Secondly: Under the facts disclosed by the record, was an action for damages for fraud and deceit, growing out of the claimed false representations as to title, quantity, and boundaries of the land deeded, available to the plaintiffs, or were they restricted to an action for rescission of the contract, or an action on the covenants in the deed of sale, if any there be? We will consider these two propositions in the order mentioned.

[1] At the outset we are confronted with the well-settled principle of law that in considering an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit every inference of fact and intentment of law must be liberally construed in favor of sustaining the case made by plaintiffs to the end that the cause may be determined upon its merits. Coakley v. Ajuria (Cal. Sup.) 290 P. 33.

The California Civil Code defines fraud as being either actual or constructive.

Actual fraud is therein defined to consist, among other things, of the following acts committed by a party to the contract, or with his connivance, with intent to deceive another party thereto, or to induce him to enter into the contract:

"1. The suggestion, as a fact, of that which is not true, by one who does not believe it to be true; 2. The positive assertion, in a manner not warranted by the information of the person making it, of that which is not true, though he believes it to be true."

"Constructive fraud consists: 1. In any breach of duty which, without an actually fraudulent intent, gains an advantage to the person in fault, or any one claiming under him, by misleading another to his prejudice, or to the prejudice of any one claiming under him; or, 2. In any such act or omission as the law specially, declares to be fraudulent, without respect to actual fraud." Civ. Code, §§ 1571, 1572, 1573.

Mechem, in his work on Sales, volume 2, at page 730, says: "Fraud is proved when it is shown that a false representation has been made (1) knowingly, or (2) without belief in its truth, or (3) recklessly careless whether it be true or false. If fraud be proved, the motive of the person guilty of it is immaterial. It matters not that there was no intention to cheat or injure the person to whom the statement was made."

Our Supreme Court, in the early case of Alvarez v. Brannan, 7 Cal. 503, 68 Am. Dec. 274, in discussing the question of fraud, used this language: "It is true that 'an evil act, with an evil intent, is a positive fraud, in the true sense of the term.' 1 Story's Eq. J. § 192. But it is equally true that, 'whether a party thus misrepresenting a material fact, knew it to be false, or made the assertion without knowing whether it were true or false, is wholly immaterial.' If a party asserts that as true, which he does not know to be true, it is a false representation. If he intends simply to state his belief upon information, then he should state it in that precise form, so as to apprise the other party of the true grounds upon which his statement is made. A party will always be held to make good his statement in the form in which he makes it. If he states a thing as true in general terms without qualification then he is presumed to do so upon his own knowledge, or at his own peril, and must make good his assertion. But there is another kind of actual fraud, when there is no intention to deceive, actually existing in the mind of the party at the time of the transaction, but there is such an amount of gross carelessness as constitutes conclusive evidence of such fraudulent intent." The same principle was declared in Muller v. Palmer, 144 Cal. 305, 79 P. 954, and in Blake v. Arp, 180 Cal. 144, 179 P. 683.

[2-4] It is also well settled that a vendor is presumed to know the area and boundaries of his own land, and a vendee is entitled to rely upon the representations of the vendor as to the extent and boundaries of his property, and, if the vendee suffers damage by reason of such representations, he has a good cause of action against the vendor. Eichelberger v. Mills Land & Water Co. et al., 9 Cal. App. 628, 100 P. 117; Del Grande v. Castel- hun, 56 Cal. App. 366, 205 P. 18; Harder v. Allred, 61 Cal. App. 394, 214 P. 1017. Furthermore, a vendee, under such circumstances, is not required to investigate the public records, or to make further inquiry as to the area or title or boundaries of the vendor's land. Teague v. Hall, 171 Cal. 668, 154 P. 851; People v. Henninger, 20 Cal. App. 79, 128 P. 352; Peardon v. Markley, 50 Cal. App. 257, 195 P. 70; Loverin v. Kuhne, 94 Conn. 219, 108 A. 554, 33 A. L. R. 848; Backer v. Pyne, 130 Ind. 288, 30 N. E. 21, 30 Am. St. Rep. 231; R. W. Kevil & Sons v. Wilford, Stunston & Co. (Ky.) 104 S. W. 348. The principle is aptly stated in Lynch v. Palmer, 237 Mass. 150, 129 N. E. 374, 375, 33 A. L. R. 842, as follows: "The defendant's contention that the representation that he was the owner of lot 89 is not a material one and cannot be impeached on the ground of fraud cannot be sustained. While the plaintiff could have ascertained the falsity of the statement by an examination of the title in the registry of deeds, she was not bound as matter of law to make such examination but could rely upon the positive assurances of the defendant that he was the owner of lot 89."

[5] Such being the state of the law, and specially in this case where the appeal is one from a judgment of nonsuit, we are constrained to hold that the positive statements made by defendant Harry O. Henderson to plaintiff A. E. Hargrove, as hereinbefore related, to the effect that he owned all of the land within the boundaries pointed out to said plaintiff, and that the railroad company did not have any right of way across said tract and had never owned any portion of said land, when in truth and in fact such railroad company then and ever since the year 1872 had owned a right of way two hundred feet wide and containing 1.03 acres extending entirely through said tract and severing it into two separate parcels, constituted actionable fraud and was at least sufficient evidence upon this point in the case to put the defendants upon their proof. That plaintiffs were damaged in not getting this 1.03 acres of land and by having the land which they did obtain divided into two separate parcels by reason thereof, to the extent of $12,000, is an admitted fact, in so far as this appeal is concerned.

[6] Having reached this conclusion in the premises, we come now to a consideration of the remaining question in the case, namely, whether or not, under the facts and circumstances as disclosed by the record, plaintiffs could maintain an action for fraud and deceit. Respondents earnestly contend that such action does not lie in this state, but that a vendee, under such circumstances, must either sue for a rescission of his contract or resort to an action for breach of the warranties in his deed, if such deed contain warranties. In support of their position in this regard respondents cite and rely upon the decision in the case of Peabody v. Phelps, 9 Cal. 213, decided by our Supreme Court in the year 1858. They assert that the instant case is so analogous to the Peabody v. Phelps Case that the decision therein is controlling in this case. Appellants seem to agree that the case at bar is analogous to the Peabody v. Phelps Case, but they contend that the decision in that case is contrary to reason and sound principles of justice and is against the great weight of authority in this country, and, therefore, should be overruled. We have carefully considered the Peabody v. Phelps decision and find that the case before us is clearly distinguishable from that case. In that case the deed of conveyance to the plaintiff contained express covenants of title, as is evidenced by the following language found on page 225 of the opinion: "The conveyance to the plaintiff included a covenant to warrant and defend the grantee, his heirs and assigns, in the title to the premises from the grantor, his heirs and assigns, forever." In the case before us the deed to the plaintiffs contained no express covenants or warranties of title. As heretofore shown, it was simply a "grant" deed.

From the use of the word "grant" in any conveyance by which an estate of inheritance or fee simple is to be passed, the following covenants, and none other, on the part of the grantor for himself and his heirs to the grantee, his heirs and assigns, are implied, unless restrained by express terms contained in such conveyance:

1. That previous to the time of the execution of such conveyance, the grantor has not conveyed the same estate, or any right, title, or interest therein, to any person other than the grantee.

2. That such estate is at the time of the execution of such conveyance free from incumbrances done, made, or suffered by the grantor, or any person claiming under him. Civ. Code, § 1113; Gaffey v. Welk, 46 Cal. App. 385, 189 P. 300.

The only question upon the point involved in the case of Peabody v. Phelps was whether or not an action for a false and fraudulent representation as to the naked fact of title in the vendor of real estate could be maintained by the purchaser who had taken possession of the premises sold, under a conveyance with express covenants, and it was decided that such action would not lie, but that the purchaser must bring his action for breach of the covenants in his deed. It is true that the learned justice who wrote the opinion in that case, after thus concluding that the purchaser was restricted to an action for breach of the express warranties contained in his deed, took occasion to discuss, at considerable length, the question as to the right of a vendee who had taken a deed without express warranties of title, to maintain an action for fraud and deceit, and concluded that, under such circumstances, such vendee would be without remedy, but, as heretofore noted, such question was not involved in the case, and the discussion of same in the opinion and the conclusion drawn may be regarded as pure dictum. In view of this fact, we do not regard the decision in the Peabody v. Phelps Case as in any way controlling, nor even as authority in the case at bar.

In passing, it may not be out of place here, and may serve some useful purpose, to note that the decision in that case is, as claimed by counsel for appellants, out of harmony with the great weight of authority in this country and has met with severe, and what we deem just, criticism, at the hands of our own Supreme Court and also the courts of other jurisdictions, as well as by very eminent text-writers. It came before the Supreme Court of this state for discussion in the case of Wright v. Carillo, 22 Cal. 595, and, from the language used in that opinion, we are inclined to believe that, had the question involved been squarely before the court so as to have required a decision upon the point, the Peabody v. Phelps Case would have been then and there overruled. Mr. Justice Crocker, in writing the opinion in Wright v. Carillo, commented upon the decision in the Peabody v. Phelps case as follows: "The appellant contends that this decision, in the case of Peabody v. Phelps, is a plain departure from these well-settled principles of law, unjustly affecting the rights of innocent persons, and screening the defrauder and deceiver. There are certainly very strong reasons for contending that a person obtaining money by false and fraudulent representations respecting his title to land should be compelled to repay it, as much so as the seller of a horse or other personal property; and the fact that the vendee has neglected to secure himself by proper covenants of warranty should be no defense. The fraud may have been perpetrated and falsehood employed for the very purpose of inducing the vendee to take the conveyance without any or with insufficient covenants. That fraud has been successful has never been supposed to deprive the party defrauded of all remedy. The power of a Court of Equity, as well as of Law, has heretofore been considered most potent in such cases; but if such be the law, they are powerless in the most aggravated cases of deceit. The ruling upon this point in Peabody v. Phelps is clearly in conflict with the decision in Alvarez v. Brannan, 7 Cal. 503 [68 Am. Dec. 274], and it should be reinvestigated in some case where it can properly be adjudicated, and upon a full argument of the question." Then follows a statement by the writer of the opinion that, because of the fact that the question was indirectly before the court, it was unnecessary to determine it. In the comparatively recent case of Mitchell v. California-Pacific Title Insurance Co., 79 Cal. App. 45, 248 P. 1035, 1037, decided in 1926, reference was made to the Peabody v. Phelps Case, among others, and, while the point under consideration was not directly before the court for decision, it is interesting to note the comment as contained in the following language: "It is contended by respondents Meyerstein and California-Pacific Title Insurance Company that a sale of the character described is analogous to a judicial sale, to which the rule of caveat emptor applies; and that if a party takes a conveyance without covenants he is without remedy in case of failure of title, and if with covenants his remedy upon such failure is confined to the covenants. Such was the view as to conveyances without covenants in the earlier decisions in California, following the rule at common law, fraud or mistake in the transaction being absent."

Turning to the authorities from other jurisdictions, we find that the question under consideration was ably and very thoroughly considered in the annotations to the case of Loverin v. Kuhne, 33 A. L. R. 848. On page 1104 of this volume the conclusion as to the weight of authority upon the question is set forth as follows: "The preponderance of authority is decidedly in favor of the doctrine that the remedy of an action for deceit is available, although the vendor's deed contains a covenant applicable to the subject-matter of his misrepresentation. 'Where the party has been induced, by a fraudulent representation, to pay his money and accept a deed, it is immaterial whether any, or what, covenants are contained in the deed. The purchaser defrauded has a right to treat the deed as a nullity, and may maintain an action on the case for the deceit. The fraud is not merged or extinguished by the covenant, but affords an additional and more complete remedy to the party.' [Citing cases.] There is some judicial support for a contrary doctrine. [Citing Peabody v. Phelps, supra.] But the weight of authority is clearly opposed to it. There is seemingly no satisfactory ground upon which it can be contended that, by accepting a deed containing covenants with regard to certain subject-matters, the vendee precludes himself from maintaining an action of tort on the ground of fraudulent representations concerning those matters. The situation may more reasonably be regarded as being simply one in which two independent remedies are open to the deceived party. The right of the vendee to maintain an action in cases where the vendor's deed contains no covenants of any description has been explicitly affirmed. [Citing cases.] In cases of this type, it is immaterial whether the vendor expressly refused to give the covenants, or the omission arose from any other cause. 'If the purchaser consents to waive the usual covenants, he is none the less entitled to the exercise of good faith and honesty on the part of the vendor.'"

It is interesting to note the criticism of the Peabody Case in the annotations above mentioned. After quoting at length from the Peabody Case the author continues as follows: "The learned judge reviewed the New York decisions, and reached the conclusion that the point under discussion was still unsettled in that state. With all deference, it is submitted that this view was erroneous. That one of the decisions referred to, Ward v. Wiman (1837) 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 193, was a distinct authority for the doctrine impugned by Field, J., is shown by the fact that the actual point decided was that the lower court had properly overruled a demurrer to a plea based on the ground that the vendor's deed contained a covenant applicable to the subject-matter of the alleged misrepresentation. Furthermore, a reference to the report of Whitney v. Allaire [1 N. Y. 305] will show that he was not warranted in treating the language of Gardiner, J., as being expressive merely of a personal opinion, and that the remarks of Bronson, J., on which he laid great stress, embodied a theory which was not concurred in by any of his colleagues. Field, J., cited the judgment of the supreme court in Clarke v. Baird (1849) 7 Barb. (N. Y.) 65, but apparently had no knowledge of the statement made by the court of appeals in that case (see [1853] 9 N. Y. 183), to the effect that it was fully satisfied with the earlier decision in Whitney v. Allaire. So far as the present writer has been able to ascertain, Peabody v. Phelps (Cal.) supra, has never been overruled in California itself. In Wright v. Carillo (1863) 22 Cal. 596, the court was asked to review and overrule this decision, as being in conflict with Alvarez v. Brannan (1857) 7 Cal. 503, 68 Am. Dec. 274; but refused to do so on the ground that the case at bar did not require a determination of the point. That the court was strongly inclined to regard the decision as erroneous is clear from its language. In McLeod v. Barnum (1901) 131 Cal. 608, 63 P. 924, it was cited, strangely enough, as an authority for the rule applicable in cases not involving fraud."

The case of Whitney v. Allaire, supra, referred to in the Peabody Case, is certainly not authority for the conclusion reached in that case. The fact is that the Whitney Case is directly opposed to the Peabody Case. In the Whitney Case, Gardiner, J., in writing the prevailing opinion, said: "For more than thirty years it has been the settled doctrine of the courts of this state, that fraudulent representations in reference to the title of real estate, accompanied with damage, is a good ground of action, and that it is immaterial whether any or what covenants are contained in the deed of conveyance." Seven of his associates on the bench concurred in this conclusion. Only one of them, Bronson, J., differed with him, and he reached no conclusion on the point. Yet, this decision was apparently largely relied upon in deciding the point in the Peabody Case, the quotations in the latter case, however, being largely taken from the opinion of Bronson, J., who, as stated, did not agree with his colleagues in the conclusion reached by them.

In 20 Cyc., at page 89, under the title "Election of Remedies," in discussing the question before us, it is said: "Thus as a general rule an action of deceit may be maintained by a purchaser of real or personal property against his vendor for fraudulent misrepresentations as to title or as to other material facts relating to the property, notwithstanding that the conveyance is by deed or bill of sale containing covenants or warranties which cover the subject matter of the representations." Many cases from various jurisdictions are cited as supporting this statement in the text. The case of Peabody v. Phelps is cited as supporting the contrary doctrine.

The question at issue is quite fully considered in 12 R. C. L. pp. 410-411, where the same conclusion is reached as is found in 20 Cyc., supra. In the footnotes appended to the decision in the case of Bostwick v. Lewis, 2 Am. Dec. 73, the case of Peabody v. Phelps is discussed at some length and the following conclusion reached: "Therefore, it is now well settled that actions for fraud in the sale of real estate will lie notwithstanding the conveyance is made with covenants."

In the well-considered case of Sellards v. Adams, 190 Ky. 723, 228 S. W. 424, 426, the court, after reviewing numerous authorities, said: "It will be observed that none of the above-cited cases confine a vendee to a reliance alone for recoupment upon the covenants of warranty in his deed when the sale and purchase was the result of fraud practiced by the vendor. Where the purchase of the land is the result of false representations as to the title of the land knowingly made by the vendor with the purpose to deceive and to induce the purchase, and relied upon by the vendee, and the sale is induced thereby, and therefore not constructively, but actually, fraudulent, and the vendee suffers injury therefrom, he may maintain an action against the vendor for the damages suffered on account of the fraud and deceit, or he may maintain an action for a rescission of the contract, if he acts promptly when the fraud is discovered. While the greater number of the decisions of this court in such states of case have dealt with the right to maintain actions for rescission and the incidents of such actions, the right to maintain the action for deceit is nearly universally upheld, although there is some authority to the contrary"—citing many cases.

Thompson on Real Property, 1929 Supplement, at page 1248, announces the same principle as follows: "One induced to purchase land by fraudulent misrepresentations may either bring an action for fraud or for the breach of the covenants of his deed. He has an election."

From the authorities thus reviewed it is apparent that the case of Peabody v. Phelps, so much relied upon by respondents in the instant case in justification of the trial court's action in granting a nonsuit, is, as heretofore stated, clearly against the great weight of authority, and, even if same were in point here, could well be disregarded. Indeed, we seriously question whether, in view of the criticism of such case in the Wright v. Carillo decision, same can longer be considered as authority in this state, even upon the point therein decided.

Counsel for respondents in the case before us cite, as supporting the Peabody v. Phelps decision, the case of Gaffey v. Welk, 46 Cal. App. 385, and in their brief quote at length from this decision. The Gaffey v. Welk Case, however, is to be distinguished from the Peabody v. Phelps Case in that no charge or element of fraud or misrepresentation whatsoever was involved therein, and consequently is not authority supporting the Peabody Case. The opinion in the Gaffey v. Welk Case contains quite extensive quotations from that in the case of Bryan v. Swain, 56 Cal. 616, upon the point, but an examination of this latter case discloses that it, too, was a case in which the element of fraud was entirely absent. Respondents also rely upon the case of Choate v. Hyde, 129 Cal. 580, 62 P. 118, as being decisive of the case before us. In this they are in error, for in the Choate v. Hyde Case, unlike the instant case, all of the facts pertaining to the title involved were fully disclosed by the seller to the purchaser before the contract was made, and the seller merely expressed his opinion as to the title. Then, too, a nonsuit was not granted in that case, but the judgment of the trial court was rendered after a trial of the case upon the merits.

It has been quite recently held in the case of Paolini v. Sulprizio, 201 Cal. 683, 258 P. 380, that three remedies are open to a party defrauded in a contract for the purchase of real estate, one being a rescission with claim for damages, another an affirmation of the contract, the purchaser retaining what he has received and suing for his damages in an action for deceit, and, thirdly, the setting up of the seller's fraud as a partial defense or counterclaim, without offer of restitution and the recouping of damages in an action brought by the guilty party to the contract. It was also held in this case that a right of action for damages for fraud arises immediately upon the consummation of the fraud, which may arise in a contract executed or executory, and which may be asserted at once upon discovery of the fraud. It would seem that the plaintiffs in the case before us availed themselves, as in our opinion they had a right to do, of the second remedy mentioned in this case.

[7] In conclusion, we do not understand that appellants make any claim in this appeal that they proved any case against the respondents Moore, or either of them. At any rate, we find no evidence in the record tending to connect either of these two respondents with any fraud or misrepresentation in the transaction. A judgment of nonsuit as to them was therefore proper.

[8] As to the respondent Louisa P. Henderson, the record shows that the title to the land involved, other than the right of way owned by the Southern Pacific Company, stood in her name at the time of the sale, and that she joined with her husband, the respondent Harry O. Henderson, in the conveyance of the property to the appellants. We therefore hold that a prima facie case of agency is shown between her and her said husband, and that she is accountable with him for any damage resulting from his representations in the premises. Quarg v. Scher, 136 Cal. 406, 69 P. 96.

From the views herein expressed, we conclude that the learned trial judge was in error in granting a nonsuit in the case in so far as the defendants Harry O. Henderson and Louisa P. Henderson are concerned, and that the action as to these two defendants should be heard and decided upon its merits.

The judgment is therefore affirmed as to the defendants J. Lloyd Moore and Viola Moore, and is reversed as to the defendants Harry O. Henderson and Louisa P. Henderson.

WEED v. BUTLER.

Civ. 5983.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

Oct. 2, 1930.

Appeal and error ⇐1071(6).

Appellant held not prejudiced by court's failure to make direct finding on issue, where finding, if made, would have been adverse.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by M. J. Hogan, for whom Charles J. Weed was substituted, against O. C. Butler. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Maurice C. Sparling, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Knight & Reynolds and Edward S. Shattuck, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J.

Defendant appeals from a judgment rendered against him in an action brought on a promissory note. The defenses to the action were that no consideration for the note was received by defendant, and that the certificate of certain shares of stock in a corporation, received by defendant at the time when the said promissory note was executed and for which said promissory note was given by defendant to plaintiff, was illegally issued and consequently was void.

Although somewhat varied as to form of statement, the appeal herein is predicated upon the points that the findings of fact are either contrary to, or not supported by, the evidence; also, that the trial court failed to find upon a material issue of fact.

No new rule or new application of any principle of law is either invoked or involved in this appeal; nor would any useful purpose be served either by a statement of facts or by a review of authorities cited by respective counsel appearing herein.

From an examination of the several specifications of error suggested by appellant, it is more or less apparent that some of them are not without seeming merit; but when the pleadings, the evidence, the findings of fact, and the conclusions of law are considered together, it becomes manifest that the ensuing judgment was fully supported by the precedent proceedings in the action. The several criticized findings may be reconciled one with the other. The failure of the trial court to find upon the issue to which appellant has directed attention is not so apparent; but assuming (without conceding) that no direct finding was made by the trial court in that regard, from a consideration of the findings which were made, it is most obvious that had an unexceptionable finding been made on the issue in question it could have been nothing but adverse to the claims of the defendant in the action.

The judgment is affirmed.

Where neither delinquent list nor notice of sale had amount of taxes, penalties, and costs due appearing opposite description of each parcel to be sold, sale held void.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Douglas L. Edmonds, Judge.

Action by Sylvester Kipp against Laura C. Danielson to quiet title. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Superseding opinion in 288 P. 882.

Virgil S. Kipp, of San Diego, for appellant.

Lon A. Brooks, of Los Angeles, and Turrentine & Wright, of San Diego, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is an action to quiet title to lots 39 and 40 in block 42 of University Heights, in the city of San Diego, county of San Diego, state of California. The complaint of appellant is in the usual form and alleges title in himself. The answer of respondent denies title in the appellant and alleges title in herself. Appellant derails his title through an assessment of the property made by the county assessor of the county of San Diego, in the year 1917, and delinquent tax sale of the property under which it was sold to the state on June 25, 1918. It is admitted that the appellant has no title to the property unless he acquired it under the assessment and the following tax sale.

[1] The record before us shows that on the assessment roll the two lots were listed separately after the name of an owner, each lot being given a separate valuation. Thereafter, the valuations were added together and the assessment carried out to one total. This form of assessment has been approved in the case of Gottstein v. Holmes, 89 Cal. App. 145, 264 P. 310, which involved a similar assessment in San Diego county for the same year. It further appears from the record that on the delinquent list for the same year this property was assessed to its owner, whose name appears but once on the assessment. In the next two columns of this delinquent list follows the description of the two parcels of property, described separately. Following in the next column is the valuation of each lot, separately stated. Thereafter, the total valuation of the two lots, the total taxes, the total penalties, and the advertising costs are added together and consolidated and carried forward as a single item under each head. The total tax and penalties, for which the two lots were to be sold, appears on this list as the sum of $5.76.

[2] In the notice of sale of the property each lot is separately described but the taxes, penalties, and costs due do not appear opposite each description, but were consolidated into a single amount, $5.77, for which sum the property was sold to the state. In an addenda it appears that the property was finally sold to appellant for $5.76. It would appear that this difference of 1 cent arose from the dropping of fractions of cents in the computation of the penalties. In the case of Gottstein v. Kelly (Cal. Sup.) 276 P. 347, 349, it was held that such a variance in the amounts was immaterial and would not defeat the validity of the ensuing tax deed.

[3] However, under authority of the same case, we must hold that the sale is void because neither the delinquent list nor the notice had the amounts of the taxes, penalties, and costs due appearing opposite the description of each parcel of the land to be sold. In this case, it was held as follows:

"One of the reasons assigned for upholding the judgment herein is that the notice of sale to the state of the property affected by the judgment was defective. By the provisions of section 3764 of the Political Code, in force at the time the notice of sale was given (Stats. 1913, p. 556), the tax collector was required to 'publish the delinquent list, which must contain the names of the persons and a description of the property delinquent, and the amount of taxes, penalties, and costs due, opposite each name and description.' * * *

"At the time the notice of sale herein was published a further requirement of section 3764 of the Political Code, then in force, was that the delinquent list should contain the 'taxes due on personal property, the delinquent state poll, road, and hospital tax, the taxes due each school, road, or other lesser taxation district, added to the taxes on real estate.' * * * It appears that, as affecting the property here involved, a tax of 71 cents on the $100 of valuation was levied for the school district. With reference to the meaning of the phrase appearing in the statute, 'added to the taxes on real estate,' it was held in California Loan, etc., Co. v. Weis, 118 Cal. 489, 496, 50 P. 697, 700, that 'the word "added," as here used, does not contemplate a mathematical computation. It is employed in the sense of subjoined or appended.' * * *

"In the case of Cordano v. Kelsey, 28 Cal. App. 9, 19, 151 P. 391, 398, among other things, it is held that, in a notice of sale for delinquent taxes, it is necessary that the amount of penalties and costs be separately stated, and that (citing Campbell v. Canty, 12 Cal. App. Dec. 373,¹ and quoting sections 205-207 of Black on Tax Titles), 'the giving of notice in the manner and form prescribed by the statute is an essential jurisdictional fact'; also, that 'not only is the giving of notice of the sale essential, but it must be such notice as the statute prescribes.'

"Assuming the correctness of the conclusion hereinbefore stated to the effect that each lot was separately described and assessed, and reasoning from the rule announced in the case of California Loan, etc., Co. v. Weis, 118 Cal. 489, 496, 50 P. 697, as well as from the case of Cordano v. Kelsey, 28 Cal. App. 9, 19, 151 P. 391, 398, it becomes apparent that the construction which should be placed on the statutory requirement that the amount of 'taxes, penalties, and costs due' should be placed 'opposite each name and description,' is that opposite each description all 'taxes, penalties, and costs' applicable thereto should be placed, rather than that where, as in the instant case, there are several pieces of property separately assessed and described, the total amount due thereon on account of the several charges of 'taxes, penalties, and costs' should be added together and stated in one aggregate amount."

As the proceedings leading up to the sale were fatally defective, no title was conveyed to the state of California, and it had no title to convey to appellant. As his purported title was dependent entirely upon a void tax deed, no title vested in him.

GRAY v. MAGEE et al.

Civ. 445.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Sept. 26, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 20, 1930.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court
Nov. 24, 1930.

1. Judgment ¶256(1).

Waters and water courses ¶152(10).

Conclusions of law and decree in action to establish water rights held not contradictory to findings.

The decree provided that, when there was less than 3.50 miner's inches, the deficiency should come from part allotted to plaintiff, whereas the court merely found that defendants had lost right to one-half of miner's inch during summertime and one and one-half during winter, and the amount to which plaintiff could acquire a right was therefore limited to such amount, with the exception of the additional amount which he was able to save by his intake being further up stream.

2. Trial ¶404(1).

Findings must be read together, and reference may be had to context to ascertain doubtful meaning.

3. Waters and water courses ¶152(11).

Under findings, riparian owner was entitled to only that water to which rights of prior users had been lost.

The court found that for more than forty years the prior users had diverted and used all the water in the stream, except that they had lost the right to, and failed to use a specific quantity for the past five years.

4. Highways ¶17.

Evidence held sufficient to support finding that there was no public road over grantor's land to grantee's land.

5. Easements ¶36(3).

Evidence held insufficient to support finding that grantee's only access to land was over grantor's land, as regards right of way of necessity.

6. Easements ¶18(1).

Right of way of necessity does not arise when only interest of grantor in adjoining land over which grantee claims right is that of cotenant with other parties interested in estate in process of administration.

7. Estoppel ¶118.

Evidence held to show that grantor consented only to grantee's use of road over grantor's land temporarily as regards estoppel by grantee's improvement of road.

8. Executors and administrators ¶114.

Grantor's consent, if any, to grantee's use of road over land of estate of which grantor was executor could not bind estate, as regards claimed estoppel.

9. New trial ¶106.

Refusing new trial for newly discovered evidence, which only added to existing conflict in evidence, held not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Charles C. Haines, Judge.

Action by Coleman M. Gray against Hugh Magee and others. From an unsatisfactory decree for plaintiff, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

George H. Stone, of San Diego, for appellant.

Estudillo & Schwinn, of Riverside, and A. M. Thompson, of San Diego, for respondents.

BARNARD, J.

Victoria P. de Magee died intestate in 1886 and left as part of her estate certain lands in San Diego county which lie on the southwesterly slope of the Agua Tibia mountain, in an elevated valley or bench bordered on all sides, except the southwest, by rapidly rising ground. Hugh Magee, as one of the executors of this estate, has been in personal charge of these lands since about 1913. He has also entered under the law of the United States, as cattle raising homesteads, certain other adjoining tracts of land on the east, the north, and the southwest. Portions of these other lands have been patented and other portions merely entered. For many years water had been diverted by the Magee family from Castro creek, a natural stream running through the property, for the purpose of irrigating parts of said land. In 1924 plaintiff Gray established a camp on certain lands belonging to Hugh Magee under some arrangement with him. In 1925 he built thereon a stone lodge and certain other structures, and began to take a portion of the Castro creek water from the Magee ditch for domestic purposes. A little later he installed his own pipe line, taking water directly from this creek, his intake being at a point farther up the stream than the Magee intake. Plaintiff cleared about an acre of land for his house and garden, and another acre which he set out to orange trees, and continued to use this water both for domestic purposes and for irrigation. All of these improvements were made with the knowledge and consent of said Magee, and it is apparent that at the time the relations between the plaintiff Gray and the defendant Hugh Magee were most friendly. On July 20, 1928, defendants Hugh Magee and Florence M. S. Magee, his wife, conveyed to the plaintiff by deed the tract of land which he had been improving, consisting of about twenty-five acres, together with an easement over certain homestead lands of the grantors, for the purpose of repairing and maintaining a pipe line thereon. Castro creek runs through plaintiff's land, and his whole twenty-five acres are riparian thereto.

This action was begun by the plaintiff for the purpose of establishing his right to take water from Castro creek, and also for the purpose of enjoining the defendants from interfering with the plaintiff's use of a certain road, which, it is claimed, constitutes his only means of access to his property.

In his first cause of action, after alleging his ownership of the property and his improvements thereon, plaintiff alleges that he has used domestic water from Castro creek for three years and irrigation was for one and one-half years, and that he needs for these purposes a total of 24,000 gallons of water per day in the irrigation season; that more than thirty years ago the estate of Victoria P. de Magee attempted to appropriate one hundred miner's inches of water from Castro creek, and during that period of time has maintained a diversion ditch, taking said water over the land now belonging to plaintiff to lands belonging to the estate, which are not riparian to the creek; that for the past five years the said estate has not put said water to beneficial use to its full extent, but has at all times during the past ten years left unused and abandoned and wasted water to the extent of more than 24,000 gallons of water per day; that with the consent of the defendants, plaintiff completed in May, 1927, a dam and pipe line capable of carrying about 24,000 gallons of water per day, and that such water as he does not use is returned to the estate's diversion ditch as it crosses plaintiff's land; that plaintiff has used 24,000 gallons of water per day and is entitled thereto by reason of his riparian rights and his use thereof, and by reason of the nonuse and abandonment of a part of the water of Castro creek by defendants; and that plaintiff has made application to the state division of water rights for the appropriation of that amount of water. Plaintiff asks that the defendants be enjoined from interfering with his right to take said water, and that title thereto be quieted. In their answers defendants allege that for more than fifty years they have diverted and put to beneficial use all of the waters of Castro creek, and deny any nonuser or abandonment of any of said water. Cross-complaints were filed in which the defendants asked that they be declared the owners of and entitled to all of the waters of said creek, and that the plaintiff be enjoined from the use of any of said water.

Among other things, the court found the plaintiff's land was wholly riparian to Castro creek, and that the lands of the defendant estate were not riparian to said stream; that plaintiff acquired title to his property on July 20, 1928, together with the right of ingress and egress over certain property belonging to Hugh Magee and his wife for repairing and maintaining a pipe line thereon, and to take domestic and irrigation water therefrom; that the plaintiff occupied his land prior to the date of his deed as a licensee of the grantors therein, and with their consent established, at some time prior to May 4, 1927, his own diversion system, with an intake above that of defendants; and that such water as is not used by the plaintiff is diverted back into the defendants' diversion system. The court also found that the plaintiff has put to beneficial use not less than the amount of water he claimed in his complaint, namely, 24,000 gallons per day; that the defendant estate more than forty years ago appropriated all of the water of Castro creek, diverting the same at a point on unpatented government land, and for a long time applied all of said water to a beneficial use on the estate land; that for more than five years next before the commencement of this action, the defendants have not put said water to beneficial use to the fullest extent, in that during the past five years they "have failed at all seasons of each year to devote to any beneficial use one-half of one statutory miner's inch of water out of the quantity that under natural conditions flows in said stream at the estate's intake"; that for more than five years, in addition to the one-half inch of water mentioned, they have at all times between the 1st of November of each year and the 1st of May next following, out of the increased flow during that period "wholly failed and neglected to devote to beneficial use a further quantity" of "not less than one statutory miner's inch of water"; and that there was at the time of the commencement of the action an aggregate of not less than one and one-half statutory miner's inch of water between the 1st of November of each year and the 1st of May following, and at all other times of each year there was one-half of a statutory miner's inch of water, which had ceased to have the status of a flow of water appropriated by the defendants. The court further found that, in addition to said one-half inch in the summer and one and one-half inches in the winter that had not been put to beneficial use by the defendants during the preceding five years, the plaintiff, by locating his intake farther up stream than the estate intake, had saved further water, not theretofore used, in the amount of one-quarter of a statutory miner's inch between May 1st and November 1st of each year, and had put such saving to beneficial use upon his land. The court also found that in the dry half of each year there is sufficient water in the stream over and above that put to beneficial use by the Magee estate, so that plaintiff may take not to exceed three-fourths of a statutory miner's inch of water without infringing on any right of the estate; and, further, that "seldom, if ever, even in the driest season of the year, is the flow at plaintiff's intake less than three and one-half statutory miner's inches." As conclusions of law, the court found that the plaintiff was entitled to take three-fourths of a statutory miner's inch, equal to 12,117.60 gallons of water per day, during the period from May 1st to November 1st of each year; to take double that amount during the remainder of each year; and to a decree quieting his title to said amount of water. The conclusion of law then contains the following: "That plaintiff's right to such water is fixed and determined upon the basis of a flow of said stream at plaintiff's intake at no time less than three and one-half (3.50) miner's inches, and that when, if ever, the flow of the water at that point shall in fact fall below that quantum * * * defendants are entitled to have the amount of water used by the plaintiff from his diversion and not returned into defendants' ditch diminished to the same extent that the flow of said stream at the location of plaintiff's intake shall fall below said minimum of three and one-half (3.50) miner's inches;" and, further, that the plaintiff should be required "at his own expense to install and maintain immediately above his intake proper measuring devices, so as to ascertain whether or not at any particular time the minimum flow of three and one-half (3.50) miner's inches is being maintained."

The decree followed these findings and conclusions of law. The plaintiff has appealed, particularly stating, however, that he takes no appeal as to the quantity of water allotted to him. As to the water issue, he asks that the case be not reversed, but that the conclusions of law and the decree of the court be amended to conform to the findings and be limited to the extent of the facts found.

[1] The gist of appellant's contentions in this regard is that the findings of the court amount to a positive finding that respondents have a prior right to 2.75 inches of water and no more; that this prior right of respondents should not be enlarged, and appellant, as a riparian owner, is entitled to all water that he can put to beneficial use over and above the 2.75 inches to which respondents are found to have priority; and that those provisions found in the conclusions of law and the decree, which provide that when there is less than 3.50 miner's inches of water in the stream the deficiency shall come from that part allotted to the appellant, are contradictory to the findings that the appellant was entitled to three-fourths of an inch in the summertime, and the respondents to two and three-fourths inches. Appellant argues that the findings that the flow in the summertime was seldom, if ever, below 3.50 inches, and the appellant is entitled to three-fourths of an inch in the summertime and respondents to 2.75 inches, but that, if the flow falls below 3.50 inches, the reduction is taken from the appellant, amount to a positive finding that respondents have a right to 2.75 inches of water and no more. As we understand it, this entire argument is based upon the supposition that the court had positively found that respondents had a prior right to 2.75 inches of water and no more. We are unable to follow appellant in this contention. The court did not affirmatively find that respondents had a prior right to 2.75 inches only, although appellant attempts to arrive at that conclusion by mathematical computation. Instead of finding as to the quantity of water which the estate had used and to which they had priority, the court approached the problem from the other direction, and, after finding that they had theretofore taken all of the water at the point of their intake, the court found that during more than five years they had so far failed to make a beneficial use of all of this water, that they had lost the right to one-half of one statutory miner's inch during the summer and one and one-half inches during the winter. The amount of water to which appellant could acquire a right was therefore limited to this amount, with the exception of the additional amount which he was able to save by reason of his intake being farther upstream.

[2] Furthermore, the court found that, in the dry season of the year, appellant could take "not to exceed three-fourths of one statutory miner's inch of water," without infringing on the rights of the defendant estate. What is here referred to by the words "not to exceed" is explained by another provision wherein it is stated that plaintiff's right to such water is determined upon the basis of a flow at his intake of not less than 3.50 miner's inches, and that in the event the flow at that point should fall below that amount, the reduced amount should be taken from the appellant's allotment. Both the findings and the so-called conclusions of law are all contained in one document which is headed "Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law." While the statement just referred to appears under a subheading labeled "Conclusions of Law as to Water," it cannot be doubted that it is more in the nature of a finding of fact than a conclusion of law. It relates to and explains the basis upon which appellant's rights have been determined in the findings, and it explains what was meant by the use of the words "not to exceed" in the finding that the plaintiff could take not to exceed three-fourths of an inch of water, without infringing upon respondents' rights. Nor do we think it can be held to contradict the findings of fact, because this provision happens to have been inserted in that part of the instrument which was headed "Conclusions of Law." It is a general rule of law that all of the findings should be read together, and not taken piecemeal. And that reference may be had to the context to ascertain any doubtful meaning. Akley v. Bassett, 68 Cal. App. 270, 228 P. 1057; J. M. Brown, Inc., v. W. P. Fuller & Co., 28 Cal. App. 676, 153 P. 960. If appellant's reasoning that the court had limited respondents' rights to 2.75 inches were adopted, this finding would, on the other hand, contradict the other findings that the defendant estate had for many years made a beneficial use of all of the waters of said Castro creek which reached the estate's intake, and that they had later lost, through nonuse, the right to only one-half inch in summer and one and one-half inches in winter. The evidence shows that there was a greatly increased flow of water in this creek in the winter season, and that the defendant estate had made use of this increased flow by storing it in a reservoir for use in the dry season. To find that the respondents had a prior right to 2.75 inches only, and that any amount in excess thereof could be taken by the plaintiff, would not only contradict the other findings of the court, but would be contrary to all of the evidence introduced. We think it sufficiently appears from the findings of fact and the conclusions of law that the court found, not that the respondents had a prior right only to 2.75 inches of water, but that through the respondents' partial nonuse and the saving effected by appellant there had become available for his appropriation and use, not to exceed three-fourths of a miner's inch in the summer season, and one and one-half inches in the winter season; that this three-fourths inch in the summer season was determined upon the basis of there being at all times 3.50 inches of water in the stream at appellant's point of intake; and that the amount of water, the right to the use of which the defendant estate had not lost, was such that when the flow in the stream was less than 3.50 inches, the deficiency must be taken from the amount otherwise available to appellant. The decree follows the actual findings of the court and the conclusions of law, and the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings has not been attacked.

[3] The only other point in regard to water urged by appellant, is that, as riparian owner, he is entitled to all of the waters of Castro creek that he can put to beneficial use, over and above the 2.75 inches to which respondents were found by the court to have priority. As we have seen, the court did not find the respondents were entitled only to a priority of 2.75 inches. The court found that for more than forty years respondents had diverted and used all of the water in the stream, except that they had lost the right to and failed to use a specific quantity for the past five years. The respondent estate was entitled to all of the water it had previously used with the exception of the portion as to which its right had been lost. Joerger v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 207 Cal. 8, 276 P. 1017. Under the findings of the court, only that portion of the water theretofore taken by respondents, to which their right had been lost, was available to appellant.

In his second cause of action the plaintiff alleges that his only means of access to his land is by an existing road over the land of his grantors, Hugh Magee and Florence M. S. Magee, and the lands owned by the defendant estate as described in the complaint; that such road was openly and publicly used for more than forty years as a public highway, with the full knowledge, consent, and acquiescence of the defendants; that during the last two years he improved this road at an expense of $200, at the request of and with the consent of defendants Florence M. S. Magee and Hugh Magee, individually, and as executor of the estate; and that during said time he has continuously used the road. He alleges that the defendants have threatened to fence off the road and destroy his only means of access to his property, and asks that they be enjoined from so doing. The defendants deny that the road has been openly and publicly used by the public for forty years, or for any other time; that it has ever been used as a public road; and that it is plaintiff's only means of access to his property. The court found that plaintiff's only access to his land is by an existing road over the land belonging to Hugh Magee, Florence M. S. Magee, and the estate of Victoria P. de Magee, deceased; and that this road is substantially in the same location as an old road that formerly ran over a portion of this land to an old house that formerly stood near the center of the land, and an old trail which formerly proceeded from this old house on across the land in question. The court further found that said road was used more than forty years ago as a private driveway by the family, friends, and relatives of the party who formerly owned the old house referred to; that said road has then and since been occasionally passed over by others, but had largely been abandoned for many years prior to September, 1926; that it was never at any time dedicated to public use; that it had not at any time been used under claim of right by the public for any period of five years; and that it never was and is not now a public road or highway. The court decreed that said road is not a public road and that the plaintiff was not entitled to the use thereof without permission.

Appellant, in insisting that this portion of the decree be reversed, first urges that these findings are not supported by the evidence. It is neither possible nor necessary to review all of the voluminous evidence upon this question shown by the record. It cannot be questioned that there is some evidence showing the existence of an old road going as far as the old house mentioned in the findings, and that at certain points its location coincided with the road opened up and claimed by the appellant. This evidence consists both of testimony as to physical remains of such a road at certain points, and testimony as to travel over the same at various times for a number of purposes. There was also evidence of an old trail extending from that point on over the hills to Agua Tibia. This evidence is not only fragmentary, but its value is greatly reduced by the facts abundantly shown by the record that, at the time the new road was opened up by the appellant, physical evidence of the old road did not exist for all of the distance; that evidence is lacking that the new road followed the line of the alleged old road, except in spots; and that even those permanent marks in certain spots, which are especially relied on by appellant as conclusively showing the existence of an old road, are such as to indicate not only age but long disuse. On the other hand, the record is replete with evidence that the land over which the road is supposed to have gone was farmed and fenced for years. There is also evidence that any road that ever existed there was not a public road. Also that Hugh Magee had given appellant temporary permission to open up and use the road across his land and the land of the estate, upon his agreement to put in a gate.

Even the appellant testified about what he first found there, as follows:

"The Court: Describe just what you saw.

"A. Yes. The road laid midway between these two low hills and then debouched on to open mesa land. After leaving the olive trees, the road at that time was almost impossible to follow. It could have been anywhere—two years previous to my visit another road had been used by the Magees."

He further testified that when he first went over the location of the road there was brush growing upon it, bee sage and deer weed, but that it could be distinguished from the heavy chaparral growing along the sides. He admitted that when he started work in the road there were pieces of fence over the road, although he did not remember whether there were two or three wires thereon. He testified that he had to move three posts off of the road in order, as he says, to make it more convenient; that these posts did not look like new fence; that he was using the road at the suggestion of Magee, and that he had permission to do so; that for a time he maintained a gate on the road and at Hugh Magee's request kept the same locked; and that both executors of the estate had keys, but no one else except, apparently, himself.

Hugh Magee testified that the fence across this road has been there a good many years; that it was there in 1914 and has been there since; that there was no gate where the claimed road is located, previous to 1927; that in that year he permitted appellant to cut the fence so that he could drive through, and the gate was built to keep the stock from bothering; and that there was no road there from 1913 to the time in 1927 when the appellant fixed one.

Mrs. Florence Magee testified there was no road there when she came there in 1913; that there has been a fence crossing what is now the road, since 1913; that she heard her husband tell appellant in 1927 that he might use this for a road temporarily, and that later, because hunters bothered, her husband told appellant he must maintain a gate and keep it locked. Will Magee testified that there has always been a fence there to separate the agricultural lands from the grazing lands; that he personally saw this fence in 1913 and again in 1923, and that it was there each year thereafter until 1928. Fred Sickler testified that an old road over a portion of the route of the new road had washed out about 1890, and that it had never been repaired or used again, although he had gone over it on horseback while hunting since that time; that from 1890 on a person would never know there had ever been a road there, except that in one place it was evident that there had been one graded down a hillside; and that the fences above referred to had been there a great many years. M. M. Sickler testified there has been no traveled road across this property subsequent to 1914, but that a fence had been built around the property in 1914, which the witness thought was there until 1926. In reference to the supposed road which was testified to by certain witnesses as proceeding from the old house above mentioned on over the hill to Agua Tibia, most of the evidence is to the effect that there had been an old trail there used by the Indians; and while there was some evidence of its occasional use in more recent years, one witness testified that there has never been a traveled or wagon road in that location, and another witness testified that there had never been a usable wagon road there.

[4] The evidence, taken in the light most favorable to appellant, goes no further than to show there was formerly some sort of road which in some places followed the route of the new road to which he lays claim; that such road as there was was used mostly by the occupants of the lands and their occasional visitors, with a little evidence of occasional use by others, such as Indians and hunters; and that, except for the road to the old house, there had been no real wagon road over any part of the way. On the other hand, there is positive evidence that there had never been a public road there; that such road as there was had been long unused; that the property over which the road is now claimed had for years been fenced and farmed; and that for the last year or two prior to the trial of this action appellant had been using and improving a road across this property with the permission of Hugh Magee, one of the defendants. At best, nothing more than a conflict in the evidence is here presented, and we think there is sufficient evidence to sustain the findings of the trial court that no road over the route now claimed as a road by appellant had at any time been dedicated to public use, nor has such a road at any time for a period of five years been used under hostile claim of right by the appellant, and that the same never was and is not now a public road or highway. See Clarke v. Clarke, 133 Cal. 667, 66 P. 10; Thomas v. England, 71 Cal. 456, 12 P. 491; People v. Rindge, 174 Cal. 743, 164 P. 633.

[5] The appellant next urges that, if not otherwise, he is still entitled to the use of the road in question under the law of way of necessity. The court found that plaintiff's only access to his land is over the road in question. This does not seem to be supported by the evidence, as the appellant went upon the land in 1924 and built a permanent house in 1925, while he himself testified that the first time he went over the road in question was in September, 1926; and, also, that during the earlier years he was there it was his custom to use the longer road around by Hugh Magee's house. Appellant relies upon the rule laid down in Mesmer v. Uharriet, 174 Cal. 110, 162 P. 104, 106, as follows: "When a grantor conveys land shut off from access to a road by the grantor's remaining land, or partly by his land and partly by that of a stranger, a way of necessity arises over the adjoining land of the grantor."

[6] Not only does it not sufficiently appear that appellant's land is entirely shut off from access to any road, but it does appear that he is claiming this way of necessity not over lands belonging to his grantor, which adjoin the land conveyed to him, but over the intervening land of the Magee estate, in which appellant's grantor has only a partial interest as one of the heirs, and then over land owned by his grantor. Such a right does not arise when the only interest of the grantor in the adjoining land over which a right of way is claimed is that of a cotenant with other parties interested in the estate, which estate is in the process of administration. McDonald v. McElroy, 60 Cal. 484.

[7, 8] Appellant next insists that the respondents should be estopped to deny him the right to use the road in question by reason of their consent and approval of his previous use thereof, and by reason of his improving the road and spending money on the strength of his right to use the same. Not only does the evidence show such consent as was given by respondent Hugh Magee to have been a consent to use of the road temporarily, but the greater part of the road claimed is across the lands belonging to the Magee estate. Not only is the evidence not sufficient to sustain appellant's contention in this regard, but Hugh Magee, as one of the executors of the estate, was without authority to bind the estate in any such manner. See City of Eureka v. Fay, 107 Cal. 166, 40 P. 235.

[9] Appellant's final contention is that the court erred in denying his motion for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence, it being contended that the court is required to review such an order under section 956, Code of Civil Procedure. It is sufficient to say we have read the affidavits setting forth the newly discovered evidence, and the most that can be said for them is that they only add to the already existing conflict in the evidence.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

5. Physicians and surgeons ⇨18(8).

In action against osteopathic surgeon for negligent tonsillotomy, evidence held to support verdict for plaintiff.

The alleged negligence consisted in leaving a portion of a tonsil in patient's throat and cutting the pillars of the throat so that they grew together over the piece of tonsil remaining, causing patient to suffer from aseptic absorption of the infected portion of such tonsil and resulting in swollen glands and rheumatism. Further alleged negligence was defendants' subsequent failure to diagnose swelling in neck as being caused by the absorption of poisons from the remaining portion of the tonsil.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; J. T. B. Warne, Judge.

Action by Margaret Ingamells and husband against Jack Goodfellow and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Griffith Jones, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Griffith & Thornburgh, of Santa Barbara, for respondents.

LUTTRELL, Justice pro tem.

This is an action for damages for alleged malpractice.

Plaintiffs are husband and wife, residing at Santa Maria, in Santa Barbara county, Cal. Defendants are duly licensed osteopathic physicians and surgeons practicing their profession together, as copartners, at said place. On May 1, 1926, plaintiff Margaret Ingamells consulted defendants professionally and was advised by them to have her tonsils removed. On June 10th of that year such operation was performed upon her by defendants, Dr. Goodfellow doing the actual operating and Dr. Bell administering the anæsthetic. For a time after the operation Mrs. Ingamells ran a temperature and her throat did not heal as it ought, and defendant Dr. Bell prescribed a gargle for the trouble. In about three months she began to suffer from rheumatism and neuritis in her arms, legs, and back. She consulted the defendants regarding same and they advised an X-ray of her teeth. They X-rayed one of her teeth, and her dentist, Dr. Dart, X-rayed some of them. Defendants advised the extraction of one of her teeth and she had this done, but her condition did not improve. In about six months' time after the tonsil operation a large swelling appeared on the right side of her neck, and defendant Dr. Bell, being called and after examining her throat, prescribed a gargle. On this occasion he advised her that a certain tooth was causing this swelling and the rheumatism and advised her to have this tooth extracted. Defendant Dr. Goodfellow also looked at her throat about this time and prescribed hot applications. Her dentist, Dr. Dart, examined the tooth in question and pronounced it a good tooth, but under the advice of defendants same was, on January 4, 1927, extracted and found to be a good, live tooth. The hot applications gave temporary relief, but in about three weeks' time the swelling on her neck grew worse and Mrs. Ingamells consulted a Dr. Coblenz, who advised that the right tonsil was bad and should be removed immediately. Plaintiffs then went to San Luis and consulted Dr. Proudfoot, a specialist. On the following day they again called upon defendant Dr. Goodfellow, who, at their request, examined Mrs. Ingamells' throat and offered to operate again, if plaintiffs desired him to do so, and upon their refusal to have him operate again, he offered to pay their expenses to Los Angeles to have his brother, a specialist, operate, provided he should find that his said brother was not coming to Santa Maria. After waiting several days and learning that Dr. Goodfellow's brother could not come from Los Angeles for at least two weeks' time, plaintiffs again consulted Drs. Coblenz and Proudfoot, who advised an immediate operation. After waiting for about two weeks, and Dr. Goodfellow's brother not having come to Santa Maria, plaintiffs went to Santa Barbara and consulted one Dr. Wells, an ear, nose, and throat specialist. He examined Mrs. Ingamells' throat and neck and found pieces of tonsil on either side of her throat. The piece on the right side contained pus and was bound in by adhesions from a partially removed tonsil. The pillars of the tonsil had been cut and segregated and were partially covered over. He also found an enlarged lymphatic gland on the right side of the neck. He diagnosed her rheumatism and the swollen condition of the neck as being caused by absorption from this remnant of tonsil, and advised an operation at once. The following day, February 12, 1927, at St. Francis Hospital, he operated and removed the remnant of the right tonsil. About two days after this operation the temperature which the patient had been running since the swelling in her neck had first appeared, subsided. Dr. Wells treated the swollen neck for a time, and on March 14, 1927, operated on same by lancing it. This operation left a permanent scar on the neck. Shortly after the operation on the neck the swelling began to go down, the rheumatism to disappear, and the patient began to recover her health. Mrs. Ingamells was confined to her bed a considerable portion of the time between the operation performed by the defendants and the ones performed by Dr. Wells. She suffered much pain, and was unable to perform her usual household duties.

[1] On June 9, 1927, the present action was instituted, the basis of plaintiffs' claim being alleged negligence of defendants in the operation performed, and in the treatment following same. Defendants denied any negligence upon their part. The cause went to trial before the court sitting with a jury and a verdict was rendered awarding damages in the sum of $2,304. Judgment was thereupon entered in plaintiffs' favor for this amount, with costs. A motion for a new trial was made and denied, and this appeal was then taken, in the alternative method, from such order denying a new trial and from the judgment. Inasmuch as no appeal lies from an order refusing a new trial, we will proceed to consider the appeal as being from the judgment only.

Appellants rely for a reversal of the judgment upon the refusal of the trial court to give a certain requested instruction, herein-after noted; error of the court in the rejection of evidence, and also upon the claim that the verdict was contrary to the evidence and against law.

The history of the case, as hereinabove narrated, is in accordance with the facts as given by the witnesses called by the respective parties. In fact, there is not much dispute between the parties as to the facts of the case.

Appellants, in effect, admit that in operating they left a portion of the right tonsil in Mrs. Ingamells' throat, but take the position that this does not constitute negligence, as they claim that it is a thing that frequently happens with physicians and surgeons engaged in general practice, in tonsil operations, and even with throat specialists, and further that in the removal of diseased tonsils the supporting walls of the throat are often unavoidably injured. In addition to this defense they assert, and at the trial attempted to prove, that Mrs. Ingamells' condition was caused by poison from diseased teeth, rather than from the portion of the diseased tonsil which they left in her throat.

[2-4] The law pertaining to the care and skill required of physicians and surgeons in operating upon and treating patients is well settled. In the case of Pike v. Honsinger, 155 N. Y. 209, 49 N. E. 760, 762, 63 Am. St. Rep. 655, cited with approval by our own Supreme Court in the case of Hesler v. California Hospital Co. et al., 178 Cal. 764, 174 P. 654, the law was stated in the following language: "A physician and surgeon, by taking charge of a case, impliedly represents that he possesses, and the law places upon him the duty of possessing, that reasonable degree of learning and skill that is ordinarily possessed by physicians and surgeons in the locality where he practices, and which is ordinarily regarded by those conversant with the employment as necessary to qualify him to engage in the business of practicing medicine and surgery. Upon consenting to treat a patient, it becomes his duty to use reasonable care and diligence in the exercise of his skill and the application of his learning to accomplish the purpose for which he was employed. He is under the further obligation to use his best judgment in exercising his skill and applying his knowledge." Numerous other authorities might be cited in support of this proposition. Negligence on the part of a physician has been defined as consisting of his doing something which he should not have done, or in omitting to do something which he should have done. Perkins v. Trueblood, 180 Cal. 437, 181 P. 642; Houghton v. Dickson, 29 Cal. App. 321, 155 P. 128; McGraw v. Kerr, 23 Colo. App. 163, 128 P. 870. As to what is or is not proper practice by a physician and surgeon in the examination and treatment of a patient, or what is or is not the usual practice and treatment, is a question for experts and can be established only by their testimony. Houghton v. Dickson, McGraw v. Kerr and Perkins v. Trueblood, supra.

[5] Applying these rules of law to the case before us, the question presents itself as to whether or not the defendants possessed that degree of learning and skill ordinarily possessed by physicians and surgeons practicing in the locality where this operation and subsequent treatment occurred, and whether or not they exercised such required reasonable and ordinary care and diligence in operating upon and subsequently treating the plaintiff Mrs. Ingamells. Did these physicians and surgeons do something which they should not have done or omit to do something which they should have done? The record shows that in addition to presenting to the court and jury their own testimony in support of their complaint, plaintiffs called as witnesses in the case Dr. Charles S. Stevens, a duly licensed physician and surgeon, of Santa Barbara, who had at that time been practicing his profession there for fourteen years, and also Dr. George S. Wells, the specialist of Santa Barbara, who performed the last operation upon Mrs. Ingamells' right tonsil and also operated upon her neck, as hereinbefore noted. They also called Dr. E. K. Dart, the dentist who X-rayed and extracted two of her teeth. Dr. Stevens testified that he was a graduate of the medical department of the University of Minnesota and in his practice had removed tonsils and knew the technique involved therein, and that he also knew the standard set by physicians and surgeons in the community where the operation in question was performed. He further testified that a physician and surgeon, in the exercise of ordinary care and skill, at the time and place when and where the defendants operated upon Mrs. Ingamells' throat, should remove tonsils cleanly and without damage to the neighboring tissues. In other words, that the leaving of a portion of a tonsil in the throat and the cutting of the pillars of the throat in operating was not the exercise of that degree of skill and learning ordinarily possessed by physicians and surgeons in that locality. He also stated that the leaving of a portion of a tonsil in the throat and the cutting and lacerating of the pillars of the throat, so that they would grow together over the piece of tonsil left in, would cause the patient to suffer from aseptic absorption of the infected portion of such tonsil left in and might result in swollen glands, rheumatism, and heart trouble. He further testified that a physician, who has performed an operation for the removal of tonsils and has left a portion of a tonsil in the throat, would be able, either in a week, in three months, or in six months after such operation to determine whether or not, in operating, he had failed to remove all of the tonsil, and further that such physician would not, in the exercise of ordinary care and skill, diagnose a swelling occurring in the neck of the patient subsequent to such operation, on the same side thereof as that in which the portion of the tonsil was left, as being caused by a bad tooth, but that in the exercise of ordinary care and skill he would diagnose the swollen neck as being caused by the absorption of poison from the portion of the tonsil remaining in the throat. Dr. Wells, the ear, nose, and throat specialist, who was a graduate of Cincinnati Medical College, and who had been practicing in Santa Barbara since 1911, and who, as heretofore stated, performed the last operation upon Mrs. Ingamells' tonsil and lanced her neck, testified to the same effect in these regards as did Dr. Stevens. He was positive that her trouble and suffering had been caused by poison from the portion of the infected right tonsil which had been left in by defendants when they operated, and not by any bad teeth. Dr. Dart, the dentist, testified that neither of the two teeth which he extracted, under defendants' direction, contained pus sacs. The defendants, in attempting to justify their acts in leaving a portion of the tonsil in Mrs. Ingamells' throat, called Dr. Louis C. Chandler, who is a graduate in medicine and osteopathy of the University of California and who had been for fourteen years connected with the public school clinic of Los Angeles. Dr. Chandler testified that in from 15 to 25 per cent. of the cases in which tonsils have been removed by general practitioners, portions of the tonsils are left in the throat and are visible after the operation. He further testified that teeth with pus sacs at their roots frequently cause rheumatism and neuritis, and that it is not possible to tell whether rheumatism is caused by ulcerated teeth or bad tonsils when one has both such teeth and tonsils. He also stated that glandular infection can be caused by infected teeth. This witness admitted that he had not operated upon any one's tonsils for fourteen years, or since he was a student.

From this review of the principal evidence given at the trial we think that it is demonstrated that the jury's verdict in plaintiffs' favor was justified by the evidence and is not contrary to the law.

[6] We will now consider the claimed errors of the court in the refusal of an offered instruction and in the rejection of evidence. Defendants offered and the court refused to give the following instruction: "You are instructed that unless the plaintiff proves by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendants knew, or ought to have known, that the consequences complained of would result from their acts or treatment, you must find for the defendants." In contending in their brief that the court erred in refusing this instruction, counsel for appellants content themselves with a mere citation of two California cases and a citation from California Jurisprudence, together with a brief quotation from one of the cases cited. The cases cited are: Perkins v. Trueblood, 180 Cal. 437, 181 P. 642, and Houghton v. Dickson, 29 Cal. App. 321, 155 P. 128, and the citation from California Jurisprudence is found in volume 20 of that work on pages 1074 and 1075. No argument is made by them upon the point, and no effort whatever has been made to show wherein the error, if error it be, was prejudicial to appellants. Under these circumstances we perhaps could with propriety disregard the point; however, we have given same due consideration and have concluded that the court was right in rejecting the instruction. Neither of the cases cited as supporting this instruction can be fairly construed as sustaining any such proposition as is therein contained. Had the court given the proffered instruction, it would have been tantamount to the court saying to the jury that a verdict should be returned in favor of the defendants, unless the plaintiffs had proven by a preponderance of the evidence that defendants knew, or ought to have known, when they performed the operation and left a portion of a tonsil in the throat and cut some of the pillars of the throat, or when they failed to discover what they had done in this regard after the operation, or failed to properly diagnose and treat the ailments of their patient following the operation, that, for example, the patient would subsequently have to submit to another operation which would leave a permanent scar upon her neck or would have to subsequently lose two good teeth. Had the infection from the part of the diseased tonsil left in by reason of the negligence of defendants caused the loss of an eye or a foot, we will say, instead of a scar upon the neck, is it possible that the law is such that no recovery could have been had unless the proof on plaintiffs' part showed that defendants, at the time of the negligent acts and treatment complained of, knew, or ought to have known, that such dire consequences would be the result of such acts and treatment? If such should be held to be the law, then in many cases such an instruction would, in effect, be an instruction for a directed verdict. It is true that the text in volume of California Jurisprudence cited supports the instruction in question. The learned writer of this text has cited several California cases as supporting the proposition of law set forth in the text. A careful reading of these cases, however, shows that this proposition of law, as stated in this text, finds no support in any of such cases. Nor have we found any authority, in this or any other jurisdiction, in accord with the doctrine set forth in California Jurisprudence and contended for by appellants. We therefore conclude that such contention is against reason and is not the law. In passing, we might say that had such offered instruction been modified to the extent of only requiring plaintiffs to prove that the defendants knew, or ought to have known, that serious consequences would result from their acts or treatment, instead of "the consequences complained of," same would then have been a proper instruction. At any rate, we find from an examination of the instructions given by the court that the jury was fully and fairly instructed in the law governing a case of this character.

[7] As to the only remaining point involved in this appeal, we feel that same hardly merits consideration. Counsel for plaintiffs introduced, without objection, a letter written to them by defendants under date of May 21, 1927. In this letter the following statement, among others, appears: "Also we offered to correct free of charge any error of technique in the removal of Mrs. Ingamells' tonsils, even offering also free of charge, the services of a Los Angeles specialist who Mr. and Mrs. Ingamells' desire to do the work." The letter was identified and put in evidence while the defendant Dr. Goodfellow was on the witness stand and under examination by plaintiffs' counsel, who first stated when offering the letter that same was offered for impeachment purposes, but later in the discussion which followed stated that same was offered for the purpose of showing an admission of an error in technique. Upon taking the witness for examination, counsel for appellants then sought to have him explain the various statements contained in the letter, claiming that he had the right to have each and every word and line contained therein explained and interpreted by the writer of the letter. The court, under objection by counsel for plaintiffs, refused to allow this to be done, and properly so. However, we find that later on when Dr. Goodfellow was upon the witness stand in behalf of the defendants, and under examination by his own counsel, he did, without objection, explain what he meant by writing the above-mentioned passage. We are satisfied that no prejudice resulted from his not having been given the opportunity to explain the other passages contained in the letter.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal and error ⇨882(3).

Plaintiff suing on notes cannot complain on appeal of insufficiency of answer to raise failure of consideration, where case was tried on that issue.

Plaintiff for first time on appeal contended that answer did not raise issue of failure of consideration for notes sued on. Record disclosed that parties as well as judge of trial court understood allegations of answer were sufficient to raise defense of failure of consideration, and case was tried on issue of fact thereby presented.

District Court of Appeal, First District,

Action by Mary L. Daly against Rex Reginald Cruse, also known as Reginald Rex Cruse. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Leo M. Daly and Earl L. Wisdom, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. Russell Morton, of Pasadena, for respondent.

HOUSER, J.

The action upon which this appeal is predicated was brought by plaintiff against defendant on two promissory notes. The defense as to each of such notes was that "said note was given to plaintiff's assignor upon the express condition that plaintiff's assignor should pay to defendant, or for his account, the full face value thereof, to-wit, the sum of $600 ($1,000); that plaintiff's assignor then and there agreed to pay to defendant, or for his account, said sum of $600 ($1,000), and that plaintiff's assignor failed, and has ever since failed, to pay to defendant, or for his account, said sum of $600 ($1,000), or any part thereof, and that the consideration for said note has completely and totally failed." Judgment was rendered in favor of defendant, and plaintiff appeals therefrom.

It is first urged by appellant that the answer interposed by defendant "did not raise an issue of failure of consideration." But whatever objection may be made regarding the form of the answer presented by defendant, its obvious meaning is that, although admitting the execution of the note in question, defendant never received any consideration whatsoever therefor. In any event, the record discloses that the parties to the litigation, as well as the judge of the trial court, so understood the allegation of defendant, and the case was tried on the issue of fact presented thereby. In such circumstances plaintiff is in no position to now complain for the first time.

Appellant's further complaint, to the effect that the evidence was insufficient to support the finding and ensuing judgment of the trial court, is likewise unavailing. Although the testimony given by the several witnesses regarding what consideration, if any, was received by defendant for the notes upon which the action was based, was somewhat conflicting one with the other, the record discloses ample evidence to support the conclusion reached by the trial court.

The judgment is affirmed.

NOURSE, P. J.

John P. Escover died testate December 27, 1927. His will was offered for probate December 31 of the same year. Certain heirs filed a written opposition to probate on grounds of undue influence and lack of testamentary capacity. This contest was tried before the court without a jury and judgment was entered against contestants. The will was thereafter admitted to probate, and on April 15, 1929, three heirs filed a petition to revoke probate on the same grounds. This was heard before the court without a jury, and at the close of petitioners' case the court granted proponents a nonsuit. The appeal is from the judgment following the nonsuit and is taken on typewritten transcripts.

[1,2] Two points are raised by appellants: First, that the probate court erred in denying their motion for a trial by jury. The denial was based upon the express provisions of section 1330, Code of Civil Procedure, which reads in part: "In all cases of petitions to revoke the probate of a will wherein the original probate was granted without a contest, * * * a trial by jury must be had." As the original probate was granted after a contest wherein the contestants might have had the issues tried by a jury if they had so demanded, it is evident that, so far as our statutory law is concerned, they did not have that right on the second trial. Hence, the only question remaining is whether our statutory law is valid in view of section 7 of article 1 of the Constitution, which secures the right of trial by jury "in civil actions." This was determined adversely to appellants in Estate of Dolbeer, 153 Cal. 652, 657, 96 P. 266, 15 Ann. Cas. 207. This "right" was secured only in those cases where it existed in the common law. It was not recognized as a right in probate matters in the common law because such matters belonged to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, where trial by jury was not a right.

[3] If the point be put on the question of discretion, the appellants likewise fail to show error. The issue of undue influence is one which is primarily addressed to the equity side of the court, and when it arises in a probate court, after having previously been fully heard and determined, we see no error in a denial of a demand for a jury, with its consequent delays and expense. Estate of Dorn, 69 Cal. App. 413, 415, 231 P. 346.

[4] Second, that the probate court erred in granting a nonsuit. On the issue of lack of testamentary capacity there was no evidence except the evidence that the testator was of sound mind. On the issue of undue influence the evidence showed nothing more than that testator's brother complained that he had not been given a greater portion of the estate in a former will, and that the testator then called in an attorney who prepared the will under attack which gave the brother a larger share. There is no evidence tending to show that any pressure was brought to bear directly upon the testamentary act. From appellants' own case it is shown that the will was not made in the presence of or at the connivance of any person benefited by it, but that it was the free and voluntary act of the testator. Estate of Presho, 196 Cal. 639, 651, 238 P. 944, and cases there cited. Upon contestants' whole case there is no evidence that would have justified a judgment in their favor, and hence the trial court did not err in granting the nonsuit.

Difficulty of measuring damage for non-completion of oil well, causing property to be drained by surrounding wells, did not warrant sustaining demurrer to complaint, without leave to amend.

Complaint alleged, especially with reference to one cause of action, that leased property was in proved oil territory; that drilling of well to depth of 5,200 feet, as contemplated by lease, would have resulted in oil and gas in large quantities; that negligent failure to drill to depth mentioned caused property to be drained of oil, and gas pressure reduced by wells on adjacent property; and that, by reason thereof, lessors were damaged in sum of $67,500. It was also alleged that lessee knew that prolific oil and gas producing sands underlay leased property.

By a contract dated February 26, 1925, the appellants leased to the defendant Courtney Petroleum Company for a period of five years certain real property upon which the latter agreed to drill to a depth of 5,200 feet for oil, gas, and other allied products, and to pay as rental $2,500 from the first production and one-sixth of all other production. The lessee drilled to a depth of 4,158 feet, whereupon by written assignment and a collateral contract, it delivered possession to respondent Julian Petroleum Corporation. The lessors do not appear to have consented to the assignment. On December 20, 1926, the lessors commenced this action against their original lessee and its assignee by a complaint consisting of three causes of action, embracing said lease and contemporaneous agreements, alleging that the Julian Corporation had not drilled to a depth exceeding 4,162 feet, that both companies had ceased operations, and that through their negligent and unworkmanlike conduct of the project production had failed. The original lease provided that "the terms and conditions hereof shall be binding upon, and accrue to the benefit of the heirs, executors, successors and assigns of the respective parties hereto, and an acceptance of an assignment hereof, by any person, shall be construed as a promise on his part to be bound by and perform all of the lessee's covenants herein contained. Time is of the essence of this lease." By the assignment it was agreed that the Courtney Company sold and conveyed to the Julian Corporation "all of the right, title and interest of the original lessee and present owner in and to said lease and all rights thereunder." The collateral agreement recited that said assignment was made upon conditions and covenants not contained therein, but which were contained in the collateral contract; that, if the well be put on production at a depth less than 4,600 feet, but should make less than 350 barrels, it should be deepened to a specified horizon located approximately 5,000 feet to 5,100 feet; that the assignee "does not undertake to complete said well as a producing oil well at said depth, but does agree to properly drill the same to said depth and there endeavor in the usual and customary manner to place the same on production." By the terms of the original lease, it was recited that it was impossible to determine from current developments as to the necessary depth of the well, but that at a later date the parties would confer regarding the progress of other wells in that vicinity, and "determine what is the best to do for their mutual interests," and the lessors reserved the right to determine the lease for failure to perform any of its terms or conditions upon ten days' notice of election so to do. Neither of these two provisions appears to have been observed by the parties. The plaintiffs alleged that, "had a well been drilled on said leased property as so required by said lease to a depth of fifty-two hundred (5,200) feet, or production at a lesser depth, a well producing oil and gas in large and commercial quantities would have resulted"; that one-sixth of the production would have been worth $65,000; that the Julian Corporation failed to continue drilling to a depth of 5,200 feet, or to a lesser depth at which mineral in paying quantities might be found; and that it had not paid the $2,500 nor placed the well on production by diligent or continuous operation in good faith.

The respondent Julian Corporation interposed a demurrer to the complaint, upon general grounds, and specifically urging that it failed to allege any obligation of said corporation to drill to a depth of 5,200 feet, what, if any, would have been the initial production, how long the well would have produced, or at what rate, or the price of oil over any period of production, or upon what basis the plaintiffs computed the amount of $67,500 for which they prayed judgment. The demurrer was sustained without leave to amend as to the Julian Corporation, and the plaintiffs appealed.

The first point advanced by appellants is well taken. While the respondent, by accepting an assignment of the lease, became liable only to the lessee, its entry into possession created the relation of landlord and tenant between the original lessor and the assignee, and its holding created a privity of estate. Bonetti v. Treat, 91 Cal. 223, 27 P. 612, 14 L. R. A. 151; Webb v. Jones, 88 Cal. App. 20, 263 P. 538.

It is observed that the sublessee did not agree with the lessee to drill below 5,100 feet, nor to complete a producing well, and that the original parties did not confer regarding surrounding developments as to means or methods contributing to their mutual benefit. However, regardless of these omissions, without some knowledge as to the necessary depth, the probable regularity or volume of flow, if any, or the market price of such production, the amount of damages or rentals is wholly unascertainable. While, as argued by appellants, a demurrer admits the pleaded facts, the allegations and constituent contracts concede that respondent's sole neglect or evasion consisted of a failure to drill to a depth of 5,200 feet, that it agreed to pay no rental except from production, and that it did not contract to furnish a producing well. Respondent agreed to drill but 5,100 feet, and its experienced drillers may have determined at a depth of 4,162 feet that further expenditures for that purpose would be futile. Damages for the breach of covenants, such as are here presented, may be agreed upon in advance, and an amount so fixed will be presumed as adequate compensation for losses incurred by a lessor through failure of performance by the lessee. Civ. Code, §§ 1670, 1671. When profits are wholly prospective and speculative or conjectural, and the success or failure of such an experiment is of mutual interest, neither party is the arbiter of the extent to which or the diligence with which operations shall proceed. Brewster v. Lanyon Zinc Co., 140 F. 801, 72 C. C. A. 213. Hence, if the compensation or penalty be not specified by the parties, or if it be impracticable or extremely difficult of estimation, they are relegated to proper proceedings in equity for relief. Hanlon Drydock, etc., Co. v. McNear, 70 Cal. App. 204, 232 P. 1002; Brewster v. Lanyon Zinc Co., supra; Craig v. Wade, 159 Cal. 172, 112 P. 891. "No damages can be recovered for a breach of contract which are not clearly ascertainable in both their nature and origin." Civ. Code, § 3301.

In the instant case even the initial payment of \$2,500 is dependent only upon a mere venture, and is wholly contingent upon uncertainties, the extent of which cannot be estimated or determined judicially in dollars and cents. It is a matter of common knowledge that the success or failure of such enterprises, and the casualties and incidental effort and expense of production, if any result, are matters ever held in suspense until mineral is found or the project is abandoned. By the most favorable reading of the complaint and the contract of the parties, this fact appears to have been recognized. It was expressly stated that "the lessee agrees as a further consideration to pay the lessor one-fourth ($\frac{1}{4}$) of the entire production from the lease, of all oils or other hydro-carbons"; "said twenty-five hundred dollars (\$2,500) oil bonus to be paid out of twenty-five per cent. (25%) of the gross production of oil, gas and other hydro-carbons;" "a one-sixth royalty and the twenty-five hundred dollars (\$2,500) provided for in said lease to be paid out of twenty-five per cent. (25%) of the first oil."

The principles above announced were aptly applied in the case last cited (Craig v. Wade, supra), wherein the plaintiff sought to recover upon alleged misrepresentations as to the value of certain oil properties. Our Supreme Court there said: "Twenty thousand dollars may have been expended in sinking a well which has not yet reached oil sands, and which may never reach them. To a sanguine man in the expectation of soon striking oil, the well may have a value of many hundreds of thousands of dollars. To the pessimistic man, who believes oil will never be struck, the $20,000 expended is money lost, and the well is valueless. So, too, if oil be in fact found, the duration of its flow is entirely uncertain, and the flow itself may increase or decrease without apparent reason. If the well yields 100 barrels of oil today, it may yield 1,000 barrels, or none at all, tomorrow. To place a value in terms of money upon such a flowing well must therefore itself of necessity be a matter of opinion merely, since it is not within human knowledge to foresee the contingencies which may result in greatly enhancing or utterly destroying its output."

There are other decisions in this state of like import. Escondido Oil Co. v. Glaser, 144 Cal. 494, 77 P. 1040; Burrows v. Petroleum Dev. Co., 181 Cal. 253, 184 P. 5; Sledge v. Stolz, 41 Cal. App. 209, 182 P. 340.

Numerous decisions from other jurisdictions expressly detail evidence of proximate locality of adjacent wells, and the quantity of their production, as a basis for calculating damages, from which it may be inferred that the pleadings were so framed as to permit of its introduction. Likewise, in Julian Petroleum Corp. v. Courtney Petroleum Co. (C. C. A.) 22 F.(2d) 360, 362, wherein the same lease here in controversy was involved, it is recited that witnesses testified "that they were familiar with the Athens field, and the location and the production of other wells in that field; that the well in question was favorably located; that, if drilled to the Miley sand, the well would, in their opinion, have produced oil; that the estimated cost of drilling the well to the Miley sand would be a certain amount; that the production of oil would be a certain quantity; that the cost of operation would be a certain amount; and that the oil would sell for a certain price." However, we are of opinion that it was error to sustain the demurrer without leave to amend. The plaintiffs should be permitted to proceed further in the premises as they may be advised.

Authorities upon which the appellants rely in support of their theory of recovery are not persuasive, since they either sound in tort or arise from facts furnishing fixed bases for the estimation of damages, such as the known production of other wells in the immediate locality, as was the case in Wheeland v. Fredonia Gas Co., 92 Kan. 50, 139 P. 1010. We think the rules applicable to the instant case are so well established that to confuse them with distinctions would serve no good purpose.

The judgment is reversed.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J. (concurring).

I concur in the judgment, but deem it proper to set forth my views therefor.

The third cause of action in particular alleges that the leased premises were in proven oil territory; that the drilling of a well to the required depth of 5,200 feet in a workmanlike and careful manner and with due diligence would have resulted in the production of oil and gas in large quantities; that, by reason of the negligent failure to drill to the depth mentioned, the property was drained of its oil, and its gas pressure reduced by wells on adjacent and surrounding property; that, by reason thereof, plaintiffs have been damaged in the sum of $67,500. There is also an allegation that the defendants well knew that "highly prolific oil and gas producing sands underlay said property" at the time of the execution of the lease and prior to the assignment to the defendant. The last averment is tantamount to an allegation that the parties had in contemplation the possibility of the property being drained of its mineral substance by the surrounding wells, or at least it is readily amendable to state that ultimate fact. I do not find the California authorities relied upon by respondents to be in point. Concededly they establish the rule of law that in similar instances liquidated damages are permissible on account of the extreme difficulty of fixing damages arising from the breach of such a contract.

The language of Parkinson v. Langdon, 36 Cal. App. 80, 171 P. 710, 712, indicates, however, that the difficulty of measuring the damage does not of necessity mean that he who is wronged by the breach of a solemn obligation shall be remediless. It is there said: "The line of distinction between profits which are remote, consequential, or not within the contemplation of the parties, and those which are proximate and absolute and certain, and within the contemplation of the parties, 'seems to rest in the question whether they are to arise directly out of the contract in question or its subject-matter, and to constitute the immediate fruits of the contract, or whether they are to result from collateral engagements or enterprises. Where the profit to be made was the inducement to the contract, such profit is the measure of damages. So a recovery may be had for the loss of profits which are the direct and immediate fruits of the contract itself. Such profits are not to be regarded as consequential, remote, or speculative in character, but are regarded as part and parcel of the contract itself, entering into and constituting a portion of its very elements, something stipulated for, and the right to the enjoyment of which is just as clear and plain as to the fulfillment of any other stipulation.' Id. The foregoing is about as satisfactory an explanation of the philosophy of the rule as we can find in the books, and, it seems to us, furnishes a safe guide to a solution of the question here. The contract plainly shows that the land was to be planted to a specific crop, and none other. Both parties understood this and contracted with reference to that understanding. Plaintiff's compensation was to be measured by an agreed percentum of this specific crop, and not otherwise. Given, land suitable for growing beans; condition of soil, climate, moisture, etc., favorable to the production of a profitable crop, and nothing supervening to prevent such result except the failure of the contracting party to do what his contract required of him, it seems to us we have a clear case where the loss to the lessor 'is such as might naturally be expected to follow from the breach,' and that he would be entitled to the 'profits which would ordinarily and naturally, and in the usual course of things, have been derived from performance,' and furnishes an instance where 'the loss flows directly and naturally from the breach of the contract itself,' and is recoverable, since the loss is 'naturally incident to the contract, and may be fairly supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties when it was made.'" To the same general effect reference may be had to Sanford v. East Riverside Irr. Dist., 101 Cal. 275, 35 P. 865, and Meer v. Cerati, 53 Cal. App. 497, 200 P. 501.

I am convinced that the court should have permitted the plaintiffs to make proof, if such they could, of the allegation that they had been damaged by the draining of their property by surrounding wells. A few quotations from persuasive authorities in other jurisdictions will indicate the reasons I entertain for such opinion. In Blair v. Creek Oil & Gas Co., 148 Ark. 301, 230 S. W. 286, 288, 19 A. L. R. 430, we find two pertinent expressions of the court as follows:

"The record shows that drilling wells is very expensive and is only undertaken where the lessee has a large area of acreage in a block. It is a matter of common knowledge that the landowner is not equipped with machinery for drilling and could not purchase such machinery on short notice, if able to do so. Hence, when he leases his land to another with the exclusive right to drill for oil and gas on it for a stipulated period of time, there is an implied covenant on the part of the lessee to protect the land at least from wells drilled by him on adjoining property which will necessarily draw the gas from the lessor's land. If there had been no lease on his land, the lessor could have had all the time during which the wells were drilled on adjoining land to have arranged for the drilling of an offset well on his land and in case a producing well was brought in on the adjoining land which would draw the gas off his own land. Of course, if he failed to make such an arrangement, the loss would fall upon himself. In case, however, he has leased his land to another and has given the lessee the exclusive right to drill on his land for gas, it is obvious that the mere right of forfeiture in case the lessee would not drill a protection well would not afford him adequate relief. * * *

"It appears from the record that expert witnesses acquainted with the gas field may testify with reasonable accuracy as to the number of wells which should have been drilled on the leased land for protection from drainage. Such witnesses might also testify with reasonable accuracy as to the quantity of gas obtained from the wells. They did say that the sand in which the gas was found was sufficiently porous that a well would draw from underneath the ground gas for a distance of a quarter of a mile in all directions. The record in the case also shows that the three wells operated by appellee on the adjacent tract will in due course of time draw all the gas from underneath the land of appellants. The lessee under the facts disclosed by the record is liable to the lessors for their proportionate share of the gas taken by the wells drilled so near their boundary lines as to draw off the gas underneath their land. There is no reason why it cannot be ascertained with reasonable certainty what quantity and quality of gas has been and will be taken from appellants' land through the wells drilled and operated by appellee on the adjoining land. Culbertson v. Iola Portland Cement Co., 87 Kan. 529, 125 P. 81, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 610."

And on rehearing it was also said: "From the evidence already taken it would seem that the gas-producing on the leased premises and the land adjacent thereto is of uniform character, and that expert witnesses can with a reasonable amount of certainty tell the amount of gas that will be drawn from the leased premises by the wells dug near the boundary line by the lessee on the adjacent premises. When the amount of gas that will be drawn from the leased premises is ascertained, the amount of damages to be recovered can be readily fixed by the royalty that the lessor was to receive."

In Daughetee v. Ohio Oil Co., 263 Ill. 518, 105 N. E. 308, 310, in which case the plaintiff sought to recover damages for the breach of a covenant requiring the lessee to drill additional wells after the first one had proved the territory, the opinion reads in part as follows: "Plaintiff in error contends that, even if a right of action exists, no recovery can be had because the damages are uncertain, remote, and speculative. This point is preserved by an exception to the refusal of the trial court to hold as law a proposition embodying plaintiff in error's view upon this point. It is undoubtedly the law that, where speculation or conjecture must be resorted to for the purpose of determining whether the injury results from the wrongful act charged or from some other cause, then the law denies the injured party his action for damages. This is only another way of stating the familiar rule that damages must be the proximate result of the injury complained of. This rule was announced by this court in Indianapolis, Bloomington & Western Ry. Co. v. Birney, 71 Ill. 391, which is relied on by plaintiff in error in support of this contention. The right of recovery being assumed, plaintiff in error cannot escape liability because the damages are difficult of exact ascertainment. The nature of the inquiry here is such that it is practically impossible to ascertain with mathematical certainty the exact amount of defendant in error's damages. This, however, affords no answer to a cause of action resulting from the breach of contract or a duty imposed by law. The unliquidated damages growing either out of breach of contract or the commission of a tort are seldom susceptible of exact measurement. If such exactness were required, the law of damages would be of little practical value. The rule is that, while the law will not permit witnesses to speculate or conjecture as to possible or probable damages, still the best evidence of which the subject will admit is receivable, and this is often nothing better than the opinion of well-informed persons upon the subject under investigation. Chamberlayne on Evidence, § 2332. Plaintiff in error does not contend that the court allowed improper and irrelevant evidence to be introduced in regard to the damages."

In Culbertson v. Iola Portland Cement Co., 87 Kan. 529, 125 P. 81, 83, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 610, we read: "Since the number of wells to be drilled on the land was not specified, there was an implied obligation on appellants to fully develop the land and put down as many wells as were necessary to secure to appellee his proportionate share of the pool of gas. Kleppner v. Lemon, 176 Pa. 502, 35 A. 109; Thornton on Oil and Gas, § 91. According to the findings, appellants failed to develop the land in such a way as to give appellee his proportionate share of the gas produced from the pool, and that to have done so would have required the sinking of at least another well. Having failed in this respect, the appellee is entitled to recover his share of the gas actually taken from his land, without regard to which side of the line the wells through which it was taken were sunk. The quantity so taken appears to have been fairly well established by the evidence. In Howerton v. Gas Co., 82 Kan. 367, 369, 108 P. 813, 814, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 46, it was said that: 'No reason is seen why witnesses of experience, acquainted with the gas field, may not testify with reasonable accuracy as to the number of wells which should have been drilled on the leased land, both for protection from drainage by neighboring leaseholds and to obtain the gas underneath the land.'"

"This action was brought for failure to develop the land, a trial was had, and evidence was produced. Under these conditions, it was impossible for the appellees, there being no further development of the land, to prove the actual amount of damages they had suffered. The nature of the case is such that it is impossible to tell what a well will develop until it is sunk, and yet experts in oil territory are able to furnish reasonably accurate estimates of what a certain territory will produce, estimating from producing wells in the locality. This the appellants did in this case. The appellee demurred to their evidence, and the court sustained the demurrer. There was evidence tending to show that the one well was not sufficient development to protect the land from the gas being drawn from it by wells on adjacent lands. * * *

"The plaintiff in this action followed the procedure indicated by these decisions and offered the only evidence possible to establish a claim for damages, to wit, the opinions of experts. To say that the evidence in this case did not furnish a reasonable basis for estimating damages is to override the reasoning of all these cases. All the business of leasing lands for development is based upon the opinions of men engaged in the business as to the value of the tracts leased for that purpose, and it is competent evidence; although it is impossible thereby in a particular case to show the exact amount of damage which has been suffered, it is sufficient to enable a jury to estimate the damages and to find accordingly."

Likewise the case of Julian Petroleum Corp. v. Courtney Petroleum Co. (C. C. A.) 22 F.(2d) 360, supports the view I entertain.

SCHMITT v. NORTHERN COUNTIES LAND & CATTLE CO. et al.
Civ. 7403.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.
Sept. 30, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1001(1).

Finding of jury supported by competent evidence is conclusive on appeal.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1002.

Finding, in action for commission for purchase of cattle, that there was no secret agreement between broker and purchaser's foreman, held conclusive where evidence was conflicting.

3. Corporations ⇨1.

Rule justifying court in disregarding separate corporate entity, stated.

To justify court in treating a corporation and the individual owning all of its stock as a single legal entity, it must not only appear that there is such a unity of interest that the individuality of the corporation is merged in that of the individual, but also that the facts are such that an adherence to the fiction of the separate existence of the corporation, would under the particular circumstances, sanction a fraud or promote injustice.

4. Corporations ⇨522.

That two separate corporations, purchasing separate lots of cattle under agreement of their agent to pay 50 cents per head to broker, were entirely owned by one individual, did not justify court in rendering joint judgment against corporations.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by H. H. Schmitt against the Northern Counties Land & Cattle Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Charles Josef Carey and William Clark Crittenden, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

George A. Clough, of San Francisco, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

In this action plaintiff and respondent Schmitt sued to recover commissions aggregating $2,608.50 for the purchase of cattle at 50 cents per head. He joined as defendants Northern Counties Land & Cattle Company and William Clark Crittenden, Inc., both corporations, which are the appellants herein, and William Clark Crittenden and Richard Meyer, individuals. At the close of plaintiff's case a nonsuit was granted as to William Clark Crittenden and plaintiff voluntarily dismissed Meyer. The jury brought in a verdict against the two appellants jointly for $2,636.50. The appeal is from the judgment entered pursuant to this verdict.

The evidence showed without contradiction that Richard Meyer was employed under contract by appellant Northern Counties Land & Cattle Company as ranch foreman and that he also performed services at various times when called upon by appellant William Clark Crittenden, Inc., and other corporations owned and controlled by William Clark Crittenden. The cattle here in question were purchased by Meyer through arrangements with respondent Schmitt, and were delivered partly to one appellant and partly to the other. It is not disputed that Meyer agreed to pay Schmitt 50 cents per head for his services, nor is it questioned that Meyer had authority to bind either appellant by such agreement.

[1, 2] It was claimed by appellants on the trial that respondent could not recover these commissions because of a secret agreement with Meyer to split the commissions with him. This issue was presented to the jury under instructions offered by appellants and given by the court, and the jury must have found that no such agreement existed. If there is any competent evidence to support this finding, the question is not open to appellants here. Appellants introduced in evidence a letter from Schmitt to Meyer written some time before the transactions here in question which read in part:

"So I have this offer to make on the stock I help get for you I will expect you to pay me a \$1.00 * * * and I would want you to know that you get the cattle cheap enough so you could well afford to pay the commission on your own cattle but I always would try to make the other fellow pay $\frac{1}{2}$ of the commission after I get him cut down if I could.

"And on all cattle you could send me buyers for I will get my dollar some way and I would split it in $\frac{1}{2}$ with you and glad to do so."

As to this letter, Schmitt testified that at the time it was written he believed Crittenden and Meyer were partners, and in the first sentence above quoted he was referring to cattle bought by Meyer and Crittenden and expected to receive and retain the full commission; and that the agreement to split commissions with Meyer referred to certain "outside" buyers that Meyer had informed Schmitt he might secure to buy cattle through him. The language on its face would seem to support this construction. The first sentence refers to "the stock I help get for you I will expect you to pay me a $1.00," etc. The second sentence, on the other hand, refers to "cattle you could send me buyers for." At the very least the language was ambiguous and so would admit of oral testimony to explain its meaning. This and other testimony, not necessary to recite, did no more than create a conflict which was resolved in favor of respondent by the jury.

[3, 4] Appellants further contend that the evidence disclosed a several liability upon each defendant and did not warrant a joint judgment against both for the full amount. Meyer's dealings with respondent were chiefly oral. He testified that in buying the cattle he was acting for Crittenden and both corporations appellants. But the evidence showed a sale of 1,433 cattle by one Anderson under a written contract to William Clark Crittenden, Inc., and a sale of about 4,000 cattle (the number was not definitely established) by Reid-Cashion Land & Cattle Company to Northern Counties Land & Cattle Company under a written contract. It also showed delivery of another lot of 184 cattle to one Beckley through Crittenden personally.

Respondent seeks to justify the joint verdict for the full amount on the theory that both corporations are entirely owned and controlled by William Clark Crittenden and are, therefore, "one-man corporations." However, the rule was recently reiterated in Continental Securities, etc., Co. v. Rawson, 208 Cal. 228, 238, 230 P. 954, 958, and is thoroughly settled, that in order to justify a court in treating a corporation and the individual owning all of its stock as a single legal entity, it must not only appear that there is such a unity of interest that the individuality of the corporation is merged in that of the individual, but also "that the facts are such that an adherence to the fiction of the separate existence of the corporation would, under the particular circumstances, sanction a fraud or promote injustice." Respondent has not attempted to point out nor can we discover in this case any facts which would justify us in holding that to recognize the separate entities of the two corporations appealing herein would sanction any fraud or in any wise promote injustice.

Here we have simply the case of two separate corporations purchasing separate lots of cattle under the agreement of their agent to pay 50 cents per head to respondent. We can find no legal justification for requiring either corporation to pay the commission on the cattle purchased by the other. In our opinion the joint judgment against both cannot stand. It will only be necessary on a new trial, however, to try the single question of the amount of liability of each defendant, since the jury in the former trial has found against the defense of a secret agreement to share commissions with appellants' agent and the authority of the agent to bind the appellants to pay the commissions is not disputed. Morris v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 468, 473, 474, 205 P. 1073.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial solely upon the issue of the several amounts which plaintiff is entitled to recover from each defendant, with directions to the trial court, upon the settlement of such amounts, to render judgment for plaintiff and against each defendant respectively for the amounts so found.

SHEEHAN et al. v. VEDDER et al.
Civ. 222.District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Sept. 23, 1930.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court
Nov. 20, 1930.1. Evidence ⇨48.

Appellate court took judicial notice of terms of prospecting permit by General Land Office of United States Department of Interior, extension thereof, and letter by commissioner to permittee (Code Civ. Proc. § 1875).

2. Pleading ⇨350(3).

Allegations in pleading contrary to facts of which judicial notice is taken are not considered as true in determining sufficiency of pleading.

3. Mines and minerals ⇨78(2).

Where defendant defaulted on contract granting right to prospect for, drill, and develop oil, quieting title in plaintiffs held not inequitable.

In his contract, defendant had agreed to install on the lands a substantial and adequate drilling outfit and commence actual drilling operations at least 60 days prior to the time when required by the terms of a prospecting permit issued by the Land Office of the Department of the Interior of the United States to plaintiff. This defendant failed to do, and plaintiff might have forfeited his rights under the prospecting permit had he not entered into a similar contract with coplaintiff, who began operations three days before the permit, as extended in time, would have expired.

4. Quieting title ⇨15.

Contract not specifically enforceable is no defense in quiet title action (Civ. Code, §§ 3386, 3390).

5. Specific performance ⇨6.

Contract is not specifically enforceable unless remedy is mutual to both parties.

6. Specific performance ⇨73.

Contract involving performance of number of successive acts or personal services will not be specifically enforced (Civ. Code, § 3390).

7. Specific performance ⇨32(3).

Contract granting right to prospect for, drill, and develop oil and gas, giving prospective driller right to quitclaim, held not mutual and not specifically enforceable.

8. Mines and minerals ⇨78(7).

Contract granting right to prospect for, drill, and develop oil and gas held not sufficient defense in quiet title action, because not specifically enforceable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Action by Harry Sheehan, sometimes known as Harry F. Sheehan, and another, against Dwight G. Vedder, sometimes known as D. G. Vedder, and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs on the pleadings, defendants appeal.

Superseding opinion in 285 P. 724.

Robert M. Pease and Roy P. Dolley, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Emmons & Aldrich, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

MARKS, J.

This appeal comes before us for the second time after a rehearing granted by this court from its decision rendered on February 19, 1930.

In the original opinion (285 P. 724), written by the late Mr. Presiding Justice Sloane, there is a clear and distinct statement of the facts as they then appeared from the record before this court. The portions of such statement material to this appeal are as follows:

"This action was brought by the plaintiffs, Harry Sheehan and Elbe Oil Land Development Company, a corporation, to quiet title to a tract of land in the county of Kern, described as the S. W. ¼ of section 18, township 28 S., R. 29 E., M. D. B. & M.

"It is alleged in the complaint as the basis of plaintiffs' right of action: That plaintiffs have, and are entitled to have, the exclusive right to prospect for oil or gas, and to drill for oil or gas in and upon said premises.

"Dwight G. Vedder, sometimes known as D. G. Vedder, R. D. Vedder, and Vedder Brothers, Inc., a corporation, hereinafter referred to as defendant Vedder, answered to the complaint by setting up and alleging an adverse interest in this property under a drilling contract entered into by and between the plaintiff Harry Sheehan, as party of the first part and the defendant Vedder as party of the second part, on the 3d day of June, 1926, about a year prior to the beginning of this action, the terms of which contract will be later considered.

"The exclusive right to prospect for, drill, and develop oil on this land claimed by plaintiffs was acquired by the plaintiff Sheehan under United States prospecting permit serial No. 010684 in the United States Land Office at Visalia, California, under and pursuant to the Act of Congress approved February 25, 1920, * * * and it is undisputed that this permit was in full force and effect on June 3d, 1926, and that Sheehan was empowered thereunder to enter into the agreement of that date, with defendant Vedder. The substance of such agreement is as follows:

"Said party of the first part does hereby grant and give unto said party of the second part the right to drill and prospect for oil and gas upon some portion of the land embraced in said permit, as above described, and said party of the second part does hereby covenant and agree that he will commence the actual drilling of a well thereon, on or before six months after oil has been discovered in paying quantities in a well which is to be drilled by said party of the second part on either section in the above township and range they may elect. Said party of the second part is to commence operations for the drilling of said well on or before three years and the drilling thereof is to be conducted with diligence until oil or gas is encountered in commercial quantities on said land or until such time as said party of the second part is satisfied that no oil or gas exists under said land. * * *

"Said party of the second part, in addition to the foregoing, agrees to comply with all the drilling requirements of said Permit and the drilling requirements of any and all leases which may hereafter be granted for said land by the United States, at least sixty days prior to the time when such drilling is required by the terms of said Permit and leases.

"Said party of the first part agrees, in the event the Secretary of the Interior so requires, to assign to the party of the second part, the area covered by this contract; said assignment, if made, shall not change or alter the royalties to be paid said party of the first part as hereinafter set forth.

"After the discovery of oil on said land in paying quantities the parties of the first part agree to make application for a lease thereof to the United States, and thereafter, and subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to sublet to the party of the second part or his successors in interest, the portion of the Permit area covered by this contract. * * *

"After the discovery of oil in paying quantities, the party of the second part, in addition to satisfying the requirements as to royalties due the United States, agrees to pay to the parties of the first part the equivalent of five per cent. (5%) of all oil and gas marketed from that portion of the said land upon which the royalty due the Government is five per cent. (5%), in cash at the prevailing market price. * * *

"Time is hereby declared to be the essence of this contract, and in the event the party of the second part for any reason fails to comply with the terms hereof, or with any extension hereof in writing, signed by the parties hereto, this contract may be at the option of the party of the first part, terminated and forfeited by giving the party of the second part thirty days' (30) written notice thereof by registered mail at his address at 551 Chamber of Commerce Building, Los Angeles, California, and said party of the second part covenants, promises and agrees that should such notice of forfeiture be given, he will, if the Permit issued to said Harry F. Sheehan has been assigned to him, reassign the same to the said party of the first part within ten days after receiving such notice. * * *

"The party of the second part at any time before or after the discovery of oil on said premises may quitclaim said property or any part thereof to the parties of the first part, their successors or assigns, and thereupon all rights and obligations of the parties hereto, one to the other, shall thereupon cease and determine as to the premises quitclaimed.

"This contract shall inure to the benefit of, and be binding upon the heirs, assigns and successors in interest of the respective parties hereto.

"In witness whereof, the parties hereto have set their hands the day and year hereinabove first written.

"Harry F. Sheehan,

"Justine Sheehan,

"Parties of the First Part.

"D. G. Vedder,

"Party of the Second Part."

"Defendant Vedder, by amended answer, after setting up this contract, alleges that on or about June 5, 1927, he, in writing, notified the plaintiffs that he then was ready, able, and willing to perform said contract and to commence and prosecute the work of prospecting and drilling for oil and gas, as provided in the contract, but that plaintiffs failed and refused, and have ever since failed and refused, to give defendant possession for said purposes, and then and ever since, have denied the validity and effect of said contract although defendant at all times was and still is ready, able, and willing to perform on his part.

"The amended answer further alleges that the only claim of right or interest in said premises of the plaintiff Elbe Oil Land Development Company, is by virtue of a contract practically identical in its terms with the Vedder contract entered into between the plaintiff Sheehan and one L. S. Barnes, of date April 7, 1927. That Barnes was, at the date of said contract, and ever since has been, the Secretary and a member of the board of directors of the plaintiff Elbe Oil Land Development Company, and that the said Barnes took and received said contract as the agent of, and for the benefit of said corporation, and has transferred and assigned said contract to said corporation.

"That although said contract is dated April 7, 1927, it was not executed until long after that date, namely on or about June 1, 1927. And that said Barnes and said Elbe Corporation, at the time of execution of the latter contract, were informed and knew of the contract of defendant Vedder.

"On this alleged state of facts plaintiffs demanded judgment on the pleadings, which was granted, and it is from such judgment that this appeal is taken."

On the petition for rehearing the following facts were presented to this court, which we deemed sufficient foundation for the order granting a rehearing in this case:

A copy of the oil and gas prospecting permit of the United States of America, Department of the Interior, General Land Office, serial 010684, whereby Harry Sheehan was granted the exclusive right to prospect for oil and gas upon the property in question for a period of two years from and after the 31st day of October, 1924, was for the first time presented to us. By the terms of this permit it was provided that Sheehan must, within six months from the last-mentioned date, install upon some portion of said lands a substantial and adequate drilling outfit, and to commence actual drilling operations thereon; that within one year from such date he was required to drill one or more wells thereon, not less than six inches in diameter, to a depth of at least five hundred feet; and within two years to drill one or more wells to a depth of at least two thousand feet, unless in each instance valuable deposits of oil or gas should be discovered at a lesser depth. The right to cancel such permit for a failure to comply with any of such conditions was reserved to the Secretary of the Interior. On December 22, 1925, an extension of time of such permit was granted to Sheehan until June 30, 1926, and on July 27, 1926, a further extension was granted him until April 30, 1927, within which time he was required to install the drilling outfit upon some portion of the property and commence actual drilling operations thereon. Copies of these extensions were also furnished us. The last paragraph of the last extension was as follows: "You will notify the parties in interest hereof and advise them also that during the time as extended, it is expected that substantial progress will be made toward development and that unless diligence is shown in that respect, this office will not feel justified in sanctioning any further extension of time." Under date of May 12, 1927, Sheehan was advised by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in part, as follows: "There has been received in this office application for further extension of time. Filed with the record is an affidavit by L. S. Barnes showing that drilling was commenced on this permit prior to April 27, 1927. As compliance with Paragraph 2 of the permit has been made, the permittee has until October 31, 1927, in which to drill to a depth of five hundred feet, and a further extension of time is not necessary." Certified copies of the original permit, the extensions, and the letter of May 12, 1927, are now before this court.

[1,2] Section 1875 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides, in part, as follows: "Courts take judicial notice of the following facts: * * * Public and private official acts of the legislative, executive and judicial departments of this state and of the United States. * * * In all these cases the court may resort for its aid to appropriate books or documents of reference." This section has been construed to permit a court to take judicial notice of a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the United States (Southern Pacific Co. v. Lipman, 148 Cal. 480, 83 P. 445; Southern Pacific Land Co. v. Meserve, 186 Cal. 157, 198 P. 1055); of the withdrawal of indemnity lands by the Secretary of the Interior (Southern Pacific Railroad Co. v. Wood, 124 Cal. 475, 57 P. 388); of the regulations of the Department of the Interior requiring the issuance of a receiver's receipt and entry of homestead location (Whittaker v. Pendola, 78 Cal. 296, 20 P. 680); and of government surveys (Rogers v. Cady, 104 Cal. 288, 38 P. 81, 43 Am. St. Rep. 100). In the case of French v. Senate of California, 146 Cal. 604, 80 P. 1031, 69 L. R. A. 556, 2 Ann. Cas. 756, it was held that this judicial notice comes to the aid of the sufficiency of a pleading where necessary. Ohm v. City and County of San Francisco, 92 Cal. 437, 28 P. 580; Mullan v. State, 114 Cal. 578, 46 P. 670, 34 L. R. A. 262; Fey v. Rossi Improvement Co., 23 Cal. App. 766, 139 P. 908. With these authorities before us, we are of the opinion that we should take judicial notice of the records and documents of the Land Office relating to the issues on this appeal. Allegations in a pleading of a fact contrary to facts of which judicial notice is taken are not considered as true. 21 R. C. L. 506-509; 21 Cal. Jur. 96-97; Fey v. Rossi Improvement Co., supra; French v. Senate of California, supra.

[3] We therefore have before us the following important facts which were not considered on the original decision of this case: That the original oil and gas prospecting permit under which all of the parties derive their rights, expired by the terms of its last extension, on April 30, 1927; that appellant Vedder agreed to move onto "the lands a substantial and adequate drilling outfit and to commence actual drilling operations" at least sixty days prior to April 30, 1927; that he did not do this and did not offer to perform this obligation of his contract until on or about June 5, 1927; that L. S. Barnes, the predecessor in interest of the Elbe Oil Land Development Company, commenced actual drilling operations upon the property on or prior to April 27, 1927, and thereby prevented the forfeiture of the rights of all parties under the terms of the oil and gas prospecting permit and its extensions.

The former decision of the court was largely based upon the familiar doctrine of equity that he who asks equity must do equity. The members of this court were of the opinion at that time that respondents should show to the court below that their hands were clean before they be given the relief they asked. It now appears that although Sheehan had not notified Vedder in writing of his failure to perform the obligations of his contract, Vedder was in actual default at the time Barnes started his drilling operations, and that if these operations had not been so started all rights under the drilling permit might have been forfeited to the government. Vedder had been in actual default in the performance of his contract for more than three months when he offered to perform. Except for Barnes' performance of the drilling requirements of the permit, Vedder's offer to perform on June 5, 1927, might have been worse than an idle gesture, as there then might have been no land upon which he could have drilled and no contract which he might have performed. His contract with Sheehan would have ended with the termination of the drilling permit by the government. We think these facts sufficient to change the equities of the case.

[4] It is well-settled law in California that a contract which cannot be specifically enforced is not a defense in an action to quiet title. Hedden v. Waldeck, 89 Cal. App. 494, 265 P. 344; Jolliffe v. Steele, 9 Cal. App. 212, 98 P. 544; Crane v. Roach, 29 Cal. App. 584, 156 P. 375; Archer v. Miller, 73 Cal. App. 678, 239 P. 92.

[5] In order to enable the courts to specifically enforce a contract, the remedy must be mutual to both its parties. As was said in the case of O'Brien v. O'Brien, 197 Cal. 577, 241 P. 861, 865:

"In the present situation of the parties a remedy by way of specific performance is not available to the defendant, for the reason that such a remedy would not be mutual, in that the defendant could not be compelled specifically to perform his part of the contract, to wit, to assist in the care and management of the plaintiff's property, a purely personal service. Equity will not require the specific performance of a contract, where the party seeking its enforcement cannot, from the nature of the contract, be compelled specifically to perform on his part. Civ. Code, §§ 3386, 3390; Cooper v. Pena, 21 Cal. 403; O'Brien v. Perry, 130 Cal. 526, 62 P. 927; Berry v. Moulie, 180 Cal. 137, 179 P. 686; Poultry Producers, etc., v. Barlow, 189 Cal. 278, 208 P. 93."

[6] Nor will the courts of equity decree the specific performance of a number of successive acts and one involving the performance of personal services. Poultry Producers Association v. Barlow, supra; Crane v. Roach, supra; Archer v. Miller, supra. The mere reading of the drilling permit and the Sheehan-Vedder contract shows that the performance of the obligations of these instruments involve both the performance of personal services and the performance of successive acts extending over a number of years, for if oil were found in paying quantities, the contract provided that one well must be drilled on each ten acres of the land. Even if oil were not found, the drilling of a test well usually takes many months and sometimes years of time.

[7] It has been held that an oil-drilling contract which gives to the prospective driller the right to quitclaim the property to his lessor before the discovery of oil, and thereby relieve himself from the obligations of his contract (which proviso appears in the Sheehan-Vedder contract), is not mutual and therefore cannot be specifically enforced. In the case of Dabney v. Key, 57 Cal. App. 762, 207 P. 921, 922, it was held as follows:

"In the case of Sturgis v. Galindo, 59 Cal. 28, 43 Am. Rep. 239, the Supreme Court was considering a case in specific performance. The instrument before the court purported to be a contract of sale of lands supposed to be valuable as a coal mine. The purported contract contained a surrender clause as follows: If defendant's assignors 'should at any time before the expiration of the time hereinbefore fixed for the completion of this contract, to wit, the 14th day of December, A. D. 1867, becomes satisfied that it was useless to further prospect said lands agreed to be conveyed for coal, then upon giving thirty days' notice to said party of the first part, in writing, of their intention to abandon said contract, then and thereafter this agreement shall be void, and of no binding force or effect between the said parties or either of them.' The trial court had entered a judgment specifically enforcing the contract. The Supreme Court reversed that judgment and in doing so said: 'It is, moreover, perfectly clear that a specific performance of the contract could not have been performed at the suit of Pacheco; for besides the difficulty of enforcing the performance of personal services, the agreement contained the express stipulation that if, at any time prior to the period fixed for the completion of the contract, Bromley and Jones should become satisfied that it was useless further to prospect the land, they should have the right, upon giving thirty days' notice to Pacheco of their intention so to do, to abandon the contract. "It is a general principle," says Mr. Fry at section 286 of his work on Specific Performance, "that when, from personal incapacity, the nature of the contract, or any other cause, a contract is incapable of being enforced against one party, that party is equally incapable of enforcing it specifically against the other, though its execution in the latter way might, in itself, be free from difficulty attending its execution in the former." "

[8] As the Sheehan-Vedder contract cannot be specifically enforced, it can furnish no defense to an action to quiet title, and the judgment of the lower court cannot be disturbed.

Judgment affirmed.

CHASE et al. v. VAN CAMP SEA FOOD
CO., Inc.
Civ. 138.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Oct. 10, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 5, 1930.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 9, 1930.

1. Evidence ⇨265(8).

Evidence may not be received to contradict admissions on pleadings.

2. Pleading ⇨36(1).

In action on contract for fishing and cleaning fish, pleadings held not to admit such contract as would exclude proof of actual agreement.

The answer, instead of admitting the allegations of the complaint that plaintiffs were to be paid $1.50 per ton for any and all fish cleaned by them, purported to admit an agreement, not alleged in the complaint, to pay $1.50 per ton for hauling any fish cleaned. The allegations in complaint as to a bonus and as to the price agreed on for fish delivered by plaintiff to defendant were denied by the answer.

3. Parties ⇨7(2).

Where contract for fishing and cleaning fish was in father's name, father could maintain action alone under statute, even if son was to have 50 per cent. of earnings (Code Civ. Proc. § 369).

4. Judgment ⇨570(16).

Where, in action by father and son on fishing contract in father's name, case was dismissed as to son on his counsel's motion, dismissal was "retraxit," estopping son from commencing action against defendant anew.

A "retraxit" occurred at common law when plaintiff came into court in person and voluntarily renounced his suit or cause of action; and when this was done and a judgment was entered, in favor of defendant, plaintiff's cause of action was forever gone.

5. Attorney and client ⇨89.

Attorney of record may make retraxit.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1170(3).

That allegation that employment contract was with both plaintiffs was not amended after dismissal of one plaintiff held not to require reversal (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

It appeared that the dismissal of the one plaintiff was treated by both counsel for plaintiff and by trial court as substantially amounting to an amendment of pleading so as to allege that employment arrangements were made with the remaining plaintiff only, and the trial proceeded on that basis.

7. Evidence ⇨242(5).

In action on contract for cleaning fish, admitting quantity statements of discharged employees on theory that they were authorized to compile them and furnish them to plaintiff held not error under evidence.

8. Contracts ⇨234.

In action on contract for cleaning fish, court's failure to make deductions for fish cooked whole was not error under circumstances.

The circumstances disclosed that plaintiff was ready as contemplated by contract to split all the fish and gained nothing from the circumstances that some were not split. The plaintiff was told that no deductions would be made from compensation because of the fact that for reasons of its own defendant saw fit to cook some of the fish without having them cleaned.

9. Appeal and error ⇨907(4).

Where plaintiff's book offered to show quantity of fish delivered was not in record, appellate court presumed that it supported finding for plaintiff.

10. Sales ~~359~~(2).

In action for fish delivered to defendant, finding as to aggregate price of fish delivered held supported by evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by W. O. Chase and O. W. Chase against the Van Camp Sea Food Company, Incorporated. Plaintiffs' counsel, with leave of court, dismissed as to O. W. Chase. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

Modified and, as so modified, affirmed.

William H. Wylie and E. P. Sample, both of San Diego, for appellant.

J. J. Brennan, of San Diego, and W. J. Collard, for respondent.

HAINES, Justice pro tem.

The complaint in this cause alleges that on or about June 10, 1927, appellant Van Camp Sea Food Company, Inc., entered into an agreement with respondent W. O. Chase and one O. W. Chase, both of whom were originally plaintiffs, whereby they were to work for appellant in fishing and cleaning fish; that between June 10, 1927, and November 1, 1927, the said W. O. Chase and O. W. Chase did work for appellant in fishing and cleaning fish for it; that, as consideration for such work to be performed by the Chases, appellant agreed to pay them $1.50 per ton for all fish which they should clean for it and "an additional 10% on all fish caught and delivered to defendant (appellant) company from July 15, 1927, to October 27, 1927, amounting to One Thousand Six Hundred Seventy Two Dollars and Seventy Cents ($1672.70)." This latter allegation is, in itself, unintelligible, but other averments follow which, construed in the light of the evidence, seem to show its meaning to have been that appellant agreed to pay the Chases for such fish as they should catch and deliver to it, at the same rates at which packers in the region should from time to time be buying fish from other fishermen, and, in addition thereto, a bonus of 10 per cent, computed thereon, and that on that basis the aggregate price of the fish which the Chases caught and delivered to appellant in pursuance of the agreement, figured without the bonus, came to $1,672.70, and therefore that, in addition to that sum, the Chases became, under the arrangement, entitled to a bonus of $167.27. There is no allegation in terms either of the quantity of fish delivered under the agreement or of the price per ton to be paid for all or any of it nor of the quantity of fish cleaned by the Chases or either of them. Performance of the agreement by the Chases is alleged, and part payment of the agreed compensation, but a balance, inclusive of the $167.25 bonus, aggregating $2,469.54 of money earned under the contract is claimed as still due, owing, and unpaid from appellant to respondent W. O. Chase and the said O. W. Chase.

The answer admits an agreement entered into on or about June 10, 1927, between appellant and the two Chases whereby the Chases were to work for appellant in fishing and cleaning fish, states that the period of employment was to be from July 10, 1927, to November 1, 1927, and admits appellant's agreement to pay $1.50 per ton "for hauling any fish cleaned" by the Chases (it being claimed in appellant's closing brief that the use of the word "hauling" is a typographical error, the intention having been to admit the agreement to pay at said rate "for all or any fish" so cleaned). The answer, however, denies the bonus arrangement and denies any indebtedness to the Chases, by which it is apparent that the intention is to deny that anything payable to them under the terms of the contract remains unpaid, and denies all other allegations of the complaint not specifically admitted.

On the trial it appeared from the testimony of respondent W. O. Chase, who is the father of the said O. W. Chase, that a contract which was placed in evidence, consisting of a written offer by W. O. Chase, accepted in writing by appellant, was made on April 1, 1926, whereby the elder Chase agreed to fish for appellant exclusively for five years beginning June 1, 1926, and to "split," which in the parlance of the trade means to "clean," all appellant's "round tunas" during the life of the agreement, for which it was agreed that the said W. O. Chase should be paid on demand "the regular prices for fish as obtained between the fishermen and the canneries on the date of delivery," with 10 per cent. additional as a bonus, and also $1.50 per ton of fish "split" for doing the "splitting." The contract provided that either party might terminate it by a notice in writing given to the other between May 1 and June 1 of any year of its life, but at no other time. It also undertook to provide, in the event of its breach by either party, for $1,000 liquidated damages to the other.

Respecting this contract, respondent W. O. Chase testified as follows:

"Q. * * * Is this the one you claim to have been working under all that time,—this agreement of April 1, 1926? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. There never was any new one made? A. No, sir."

He goes on to say that a new arrangement was twice discussed, but never made. On another occasion during the examination of this respondent the court remarked: "There is another complication. This suit is 'W. O.

Chase and O. W. Chase.' This contract seems to be only 'W. O. Chase.'"

The witness responded: "W. O. Chase and O. W. Chase were partners. We were both the same thing."

Elsewhere, however, he said: "I hired O. W. Chase to help me split the fish and paid him one-half of what we received out of it, and still owe him for the balance of his half of what's coming."

O. W. Chase, the son, testified with respect to his arrangements with his father: "We agreed to work on a 50-50 basis and split this money between us 50-50 for all the fish that we cleaned."

And again: "Q. Do you claim any part of this money that your father is suing for yourself? A. Half of it should be mine. It is supposed to be mine—50 per cent. That is the way we worked."

At the close of the plaintiffs' case in chief and while a motion for nonsuit was pending, plaintiffs' counsel, with leave of the court, dismissed as to the son, O. W. Chase, leaving as the only plaintiff the respondent W. O. Chase. No leave to amend the complaint so as to make the date alleged as that of the contract conform to the date of the writing nor to allege that appellant contracted with W. O. Chase alone, was asked, or granted and no amendment made. On the completion of the trial the court made findings to the effect that, on or about June 10, 1927, appellant employed respondent W. O. Chase (the father) for the period extending from June 10, 1927, to November 1, 1927, to clean, catch, and deliver fish to it at appellant's place of business at San Diego and agreed to pay him $1.50 per ton for all fish cleaned by him there, and agreed, also, to pay him a bonus of 10 per cent. on the purchase price of all fish caught by him and delivered to appellant there between July 15, 1927, and October 27, 1927; that between June 10, 1927, and November 1, 1927, respondent under said contract cleaned there for appellant 3227.9 tons of fish, and between July 15, 1927, and October 15, 1927, delivered there to appellant "a quantity of fish the purchase price of which amounted to" $1,672.70. The court further found that there became due under the contract from appellant to respondent W. O. Chase for such cleaning of fish $4,840.85 (there being an error of $1 in the computation, since, on the basis adopted, it would figure $4,841.85), and for fish delivered, $1,672.70, and for the bonus on the latter sum $167.27; making in the aggregate $6,681.82 (this being $1 more than the footing of the three items as given in the findings, which error corrects the other error in computation just referred to). It was further found that on said sum there had been paid all together $4,411.05, leaving a balance due from appellant to respondent O. W. Chase of $2,- 270.77. Judgment against appellant and in favor of respondent W. O. Chase was entered for that sum accordingly and it is from that that the present appeal is taken.

[1-3] Appellant contends that respondent W. O. Chase was not the real party in interest in respect of the entire claim set out in the complaint, nor in respect of the whole amount for which judgment was rendered, and therefore that such judgment, running in favor of him alone, was erroneous. There is no substantial evidence in the record that appellant made any contract with the Chases or either of them other than the written contract of April, 1926, to which, on its face, appellant and respondent W. O. Chase were the only parties. While, however, there is no evidence of any other contract, the answer undertakes to admit that some contract was made on or about June 10, 1927, whereby appellant employed both respondent W. O. Chase and said O. W. Chase to "work for defendant in the occupation of fishing and cleaning fish." Undoubtedly it is true, as urged by appellant, that evidence may not be received to contradict an admission on the pleadings. Burke v. Table Mountain Water Co., 12 Cal. 403, 407; Blankman v. Vallejo, 15 Cal. 639; Mulford v. Estudillo, 32 Cal. 131, 138; Hellman v. Howard, 44 Cal. 100, 103; Howard v. Throckmorton, 48 Cal. 482, 490; People v. Stockton & C. R. R. Co., 49 Cal. 414; Malone v. Roy, 118 Cal. 512, 514, 50 P. 542; Adams v. Wallace, 119 Cal. 67, 51 P. 14; Murphy v. Coppieters, 136 Cal. 317, 319, 68 P. 970; Gabriel v. Tonner, 138 Cal. 63, 67, 70 P. 1021. It is also true that findings in contravention of admissions on the pleadings must be disregarded. Hendy Mach. Works v. Pac., etc., Co., 99 Cal. 421, 424, 33 P. 1084; Gamache v. South School Dist., 133 Cal. 145, 147, 65 P. 301; Welch v. Alcott, 185 Cal. 731, 198 P. 626. But, in this case, when the supposed admissions are analyzed, it appears that they are largely without content. Instead of admitting the allegations of the complaint that the Chases were to be paid "$1.50 per ton for any and all fish cleaned by them," the agreement admitted in the answer is to pay $1.50 per ton for "hauling any fish cleaned," which admits nothing that is alleged. Appellant may be right in saying that the use of the word "hauling" was a clerical error, but the pleadings supply us with no means of correcting it, and, there being in the answer a denial of whatever is not in terms admitted, the allegation regarding the price to be paid for the cleaning stands denied. Again, if, as distinguished from what is said about the agreed price for fish cleaned, we construe the complaint as undertaking to allege that a price was agreed on for fish delivered in substantially the terms suggested, such allegation, by virtue of the general denial of whatever is not admitted, stands denied, and we just saw that the allegations about the bonus are expressly denied. Moreover, as respects the period of the employment, we saw that the complaint alleges that the work was done between June 10 and November 1, and that the bonus was applicable to fish caught and delivered from July 15 to October 27, whereas the answer undertakes to admit what is not alleged, namely that the period during which it was agreed that the work generally should be done was from July 10 to November 1. In fine, when the allegations are compared with the admissions, the discrepancies are so apparent that, taking them all together, we cannot say that there is admitted on the pleadings a contract to which we can attach any meaning, or such a contract as should exclude proof that the actual agreement was that embodied in the writing of April 1, 1926. On the other hand, if we are permitted to look beyond the pleadings on the subject to the evidence, it cannot be doubted that that writing was the contract and the only contract under which the work here in question was done. Again, if we are permitted to look beyond the pleadings to the evidence, there is no actual doubt regarding the respective relations of the two Chases to the enterprise in so far as their relation to it concerned the appellant. Though the elder Chase testified, as we saw, that he and his son were "partners," he also testified that he "employed" his son. It is, of course, apparent that he had the vaguest ideas about what the relations between himself and his son really amounted to. So far as appellant was concerned with the contract, however, it was that of the father, and that remains true whatever may have been the actual arrangements of father and son with each other. Beyond doubt, therefore, it would have been competent for the elder Chase to have originally brought this action in his own name alone, for, under section 369, Code of Civil Procedure, a trustee of an express trust may sue without joining with him the persons for whose benefit the action is prosecuted and a person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another is, by the express terms of the statute, declared, within its meaning, to be the trustee of an express trust. As the rule is put in 47 C. J. 64: "A person contracting in his own name with another may sue the other party to the contract without joining with him as coplaintiffs persons who may have an interest in the contract as against plaintiff."

To this point are Brown v. Salisbury (C. C.) 123 F. 203; Beekman Lumber Co. v. Kittrell, 80 Ark. 228, 96 S. W. 988; Hall v. Allen, 46 Colo. 355, 104 P. 489; Halliday v. White, 66 Hun, 635, 21 N. Y. S. 878; Murchison v. W. U. Tel. Co. (Tex. App.) 15 S. W. 416.

[4] While, however, this action might, thus, have been brought by the father Chase, it was in fact brought by father and son, and therefore appellant was confronted with a claim made by both jointly against it. Evidently if notwithstanding the fact that on motion of plaintiffs' counsel the case was dismissed as to the son, the latter could commence a new action for the same cause, it would prejudice appellant's rights were judgment rendered in favor of the father in the son's absence. We think, however, that the trial court was right in regarding the dismissal by the son as a retraxit which would estop him as against appellant from suing anew.

"A retraxit occurred at common law when a plaintiff came into court in person, and voluntarily renounced his suit or cause of action; and when this was done, and a judgment was entered in favor of defendant, the plaintiff's cause of action was forever gone." Westbay v. Gray, 116 Cal. 660, 666, 48 P. 800, 802.

[5] It is, in this state, held that the authority to make a retraxit is vested in an attorney of record. Westbay v. Gray, supra, page 666 of 116 Cal., 48 P. 800, citing Board of Commissioners v. Younger, 29 Cal. 147, 87 Am. Dec. 164; Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 542.

It has, indeed, been held (Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 542, supra, 547) that "a mere dismissal of an action by the plaintiff under the statute, and without any agreement upon his part to do so," will not ordinarily constitute a bar to its renewal, nor will a nonsuit, though entered by consent, and in Pyle v. Piercy, 122 Cal. 383, 385, 55 P. 141, the Supreme Court said that it was not inclined to extend the doctrine of retraxit as recognized in Merritt v. Campbell. In the present case, however, though the dismissal was without any agreement with appellant, it was in the circumstances done with the manifest purpose on the part of the son, acting through the counsel who represented both himself and his father, to enable his father to prosecute the action to judgment without being embarrassed by his presence as a party. In these circumstances every consideration of justice to appellant demands that the son's conduct be treated as a retraxit and we do not hesitate to say that it must be given that effect.

[6] Upon the dismissal of the action so far as O. W. Chase, the son, was concerned, then, there remained no other obstacle to its proceeding to judgment on the basis of the contract of April 1, 1926, than the circumstance that no leave to amend the complaint was actually sought or given so as to allege the employment of W. O. Chase alone instead of the employment of both O. W. Chase and W. O. Chase. Undoubtedly, so far as the formal pleading was concerned, the allegation of an arrangement made with the two original plaintiffs remained unaltered, and there is some ground for the contention that the proof of an obligation to one of them only was a variance. Weinreich v. Johnston, 78 Cal. 254, 20 P. 556. Yet it seems clear that the dismissal as to O. W. Chase was treated both by counsel for respondent and by the trial court as substantially amounting to an amendment of respondent's pleadings so as to allege that appellant's arrangements were made with W. O. Chase only, and that the trial proceeded on that basis, though over the protest of appellant. Appellant's objection, however, was not directed to any amendment, for none was offered, but was to the fact of dismissal itself. In effect, this was a claim that the court had no right to permit a change in the complaint as it then stood. As a matter of fact, the trial proceeded as though the complaint had been amended. The dismissal as to the one plaintiff went further than removing his name from the title of the case, and the case proceeded upon the basis that this plaintiff had been eliminated from the cause of action. This having operated as a retraxit as far as that plaintiff's rights are concerned, the answer having denied all that remained of the complaint, and the trial having proceeded upon that theory, no substantial right of the appellant was affected by treating the complaint as so amended, which, in effect, is what the trial court did. No miscarriage of justice appearing, we think the case should not be reversed for this wholly technical error, the practical effect of which was nil. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

The evidence is far from direct about the quantities of fish cleaned. It appeared without conflict that for fish cleaned between June 10, 1927, and August 26, 1927, respondent W. O. Chase was, in two checks, paid an aggregate of $529.35. There is in the record nothing else to show the weight of fish cleaned by him during that time; but, at the rate of $1.50 per ton, that would account for 352.9 tons. The main effort was directed to showing the quantity cleaned between August 26, 1927, and October 27, 1927, which respondent claims to have been 2875 tons. This figure, added to the said 352.9 tons, makes the aggregate of 3,227.9 tons mentioned in the findings as the aggregate quantity of fish cleaned. Appellant, however, vigorously attacks the proposition that respondent W. O. Chase has established 2,875 tons or any definite quantity of fish as actually cleaned by him between August 26 and November 1, and it is therefore necessary to notice the evidence relied on to establish the quantity. Respondent claims that in person, or through his son and another helper employed by him, he cleaned all the fish that were cleaned at all at appellant's establishment during the period in question, whether bought from him or other fishermen. The method employed to fix the quantities of fish cleaned was to endeavor to determine the aggregate quantity of fish delivered, during the time, from the various boats engaged in the fishing, by whomsoever owned. Appellant's practice was to have each boatload of fish weighed as received and to issue what was known as a "fish ticket" for the quantity delivered. The person ordinarily charged with doing the weighing and issuing the "fish tickets" was one Walter Oliver, an employee of appellant, apparently serving as a subforeman, general utility man, and more or less as a bookkeeper as well as a fisherman. He was not always there, however, and when he was not, other employees would weigh fish received and issue tickets. The evidence tends to show that such tickets, or copies of them, were preserved on appellant's files, though to some extent they seem to have temporarily remained in Oliver's possession. During the times with which we are concerned, up to October 25, 1927, one John Sieverling was manager of appellant's San Diego establishment. On that day he was superseded as manager by one Johnson and one Quamma, who were, thence forth, joint managers for appellant at San Diego. On the same day W. O. Chase was discharged, but was allowed to go on and clean fish for two days more. Just then Oliver was in Mexican waters fishing for appellant, and, on returning, he also left appellant's employ. The evidence tends to show that despite his discharge as manager, Sieverling remained at appellant's establishment at least part of the time for some days thereafter, apparently engaged in cleaning up the accounting for the period of his management. According to respondent he had, for some time prior to Sieverling's discharge, been trying to get from the latter a settlement of respondent's account to date. From October 25, 1927, on, according to respondent, he made daily demands on Johnson for appellant's figures as to the fish he had cleaned for it, and demanded his money. The following is excerpted from his testimony on the subject: "I told him, I says: 'You have got the books' and so on. 'Well now,' he says, 'wait a minute,' he says: 'We are not concerned; we do not know anything about this business; we have just come in; we are all strangers,' and so on. 'Well,' I says, 'you have got the books. Why can't you pay me?' 'Well, Walter (Oliver) is going to be back in a few days; and John (Sieverling) is straightening these things up as fast as he can.'

Elsewhere respondent testified: "Mr. Sieverling was going to stay there two weeks after he was discharged and settle up all this business."

Questioned about this phase of the matter, he further testified:

"Q. You have told us here that there was some arrangement by which Mr. Sieverling was to stay there and look after things for two weeks after he was discharged? A. Yes, it would take him about two weeks to straighten everything up.

"Q. Did he do that? Did he go on looking after things for two weeks? A. Yes."

Elsewhere he testified: "I went down to Mr. Johnson and Mr. Quamma and demanded my money; and they told me that Mr. Sieverling would settle. So I went to Mr. Sie-verling. He said that he would have to wait until Walter got back—Walter Oliver got back; he was down in Turtle bay, in the employ of the Van Camp Company. And he did come back; and then they had him go to work on the books and make out the statement so we could settle how many fish was brought in."

Both appellant's present managers, Johnson and Quamma, testify that Sieverling had no authority to transact any business for appellant after October 25, 1927, and that Oliver had none after he returned from Mexican waters, but the effect of this is considerably weakened by other testimony given by Johnson. Being asked whether he ever authorized Oliver or anyone else to submit statements of fish received by appellant, he, after some hesitation, said:

"I may have—I will say that I have asked them, believing everything had been carried on previous to my taking that job as it should have been. I do not know whether there is any objection to that or not if my statement is qualified in that manner. I may be wrong too. * * * I may have asked him to, believing * * *

"Q. Asked who? A. Either Sieverling or Oliver, to have—I question very much, however, that it was Oliver. I may have asked Sieverling because I have known this man for years.

"Q. Asked Sieverling what? A. To help formulate the figures. As soon as I took this job, Mr. Chase came and wanted a settlement, wanted the money for the cleaning of these fish. * * *

Respecting his request to Sieverling, he says further: "I didn't make the statement that I did ask him. I may have asked him."

Oliver returned at some time, which the evidence does not precisely fix, after November 1. After his return a boy delivered to respondent W. O. Chase an envelope addressed to respondent, in Sieverling's hand, containing three sheets of the printed form used by appellant to summarize the data compiled from "fish tickets" on which were filled out in Oliver's hand what purported to be a statement compiled from the fish tickets of the weights of fish delivered to appellant by the boats of the several fishermen between August 26, 1927, and November 7 of that year; the date, name of boat, and number of pounds delivered being specified in the case of each delivery. These three sheets were admitted in evidence over appellant's objections and are, together, known as Exhibit 2. Respondent W. O. Chase kept a rough record of fish cleaned, with which he compared the quantities given on this Exhibit 2, and by which he testifies that he was able to verify them as correct. He says that by experience he has found that there is about one can of offal for every two tons of fish cleaned, and that he was in this way able to tell pretty closely how many tons he had cleaned and that this was the basis of his own record. Having received this quantity statement and checked it with his own record, after having Oliver at his residence checking it over with him, respondent says that he agreed with Sieverling on what was due him. "Yes; we settled on the amount of tonnage and the amount of money that was due me." Elsewhere he says that the tonnage for which it was so agreed that he was entitled to pay for cleaning after August 26, 1927, was the 2,875 tons already referred to. Referring to Sieverling, he testified that: "As soon as he got this (i. e. the statement compiled by Oliver)—he sent me up this statement and asked me to compare it with my book. And I * * * compared it and found it was correct." He says that on one occasion he went to the cannery; that Johnson and Quamma were there, but without speaking to him went into another room with Sieverling and Oliver and engaged in a prolonged conference; that finally Oliver came out and said they had not reached respondent yet, but to come back that afternoon. He says that he did come back on the Saturday following, taking the statement (Exhibit 2) to Sieverling. He described the situation there as follows: "They was busy down there. And I says: 'Well John, let's get busy now; I want my money.' 'All right Billy,' he says, 'We are awful busy.' Sieverling was there at the desk with Mr. Quamma and Mr. Johnson, the new manager; and he says: 'It will be a special favor to me if you will wait until Monday. You can come down Monday and we will make you out a check for these various items and there is no question about the amount.'"

All this respondent says, occurred in the presence of Johnson and Quamma, and he says, further, that he showed the statement to Johnson, who did not, however, read it. He places this occurrence on the next Saturday after November 4. According to the calendar this would make it November 5. That cannot be the right Saturday, because, as we saw, the last item in Oliver's statement was dated November 7. The trial court may have believed that respondent mistook the date and that this conference really occurred a week later. At all events, respondent says that he called at the cannery the Monday after this, but that Sieverling failed to appear and that he never saw him afterward. Sieverling, in fact, seems shortly afterward to have undergone an operation and has since died.

The settlement was never made. Respondent did get a $300 check dated, and cashed by him, on November 4. This, he says, was handed to him as a payment, pending a settlement of his full account, though there is some confusion in his statements about the particular connection in which this occurred. There is much vagueness and some contradiction in respondents' testimony both about what was done and the dates of the occurrences, but perhaps not more than must be expected from a somewhat unlettered man trying to recall what occurred long before he was testifying.

[7] In view of the evidence that we have in part recited, we cannot say that the court erred in admitting the quantity statement (Exhibit 2) on the theory that Oliver and Sieverling were authorized by appellant to compile it and to furnish it to respondent.

It is still objected that this statement, even if properly received, proves nothing. There are several boatloads of fish shown on it, for cleaning which respondent concedes that he has no right to charge. He has, as he claims in collaboration with Sieberling, calculated these out by his own figures on the face of the several pages of the statement itself. It seems that numerous boatloads of fish were, for convenience, delivered at appellant's cannery, but immediately turned over to another concern. These are distinctly indicated on the statement by the initials "C. P. C." and have been calculated out except in one instance where the testimony indicates that 72 tons of one boatload is so designated by error, and really belonged to the Van Camp Company. Such 72 tons are therefore retained. An inspection of these pages, making up Exhibit 2, discloses certain errors in calculation apparent on its face. The addition of quantities in the last column of its first page, footed as 1,356,760 pounds, is wrong, the correct footing of the column being 1,467,480 pounds. The addition of the quantities in the first column of its second page, footed as 1,749,937 pounds, is wrong, and should actually foot 1,749,918 pounds. The addition of the quantities in the first column of the third page, to wit, 2,343,441 pounds, is right. The aggregate of the figures in those three columns, plus 300,000 pounds for fish caught in local waters, was relied on by respondent as totaling 5,750,138 pounds or, when reduced to tons, the 2,875 tons charged for as cleaned between August 26 and October 27. With the corrections noted, this aggregate should be 5,860,839 pounds. Apparently, however, there were included in the total for which respondent charged, an aggregate of 79,318 pounds delivered in the first week of November after respondent had quit work, which he attempted to deduct without carrying out the deduction, and 62,984 pounds delivered by the boat "Uncle Sam" on October 29, which was also after he had quit work and which he omitted to deduct. The aggregate of the last two items is 142,302 pounds. If that is deducted from the said 5,860,839 pounds, there is left 5,718,537 pounds, or 2,859.2 tons, which is less than the tonnage charged for by 15.8 tons, which, at the rate of $1.50 per ton, would call for a reduction of the judgment by $23.70.

[8] The point is made that some of the fish which respondent is by the judgment given the credit for "splitting" were not split at all, but cooked whole, a practice referred to in the evidence as unlawful. According to the respondent the Chases were there ready, as contemplated by the contract, to split all the fish, gained nothing from the circumstance that some were not split, and were told that no deduction would be made from the compensation because of the fact that for reasons of its own, appellant saw fit to cook some of the fish without having them cleaned. In these circumstances we cannot say that the court erred in failing to make a deduction on that account. Appellant claims that the trial court found that respondent was not entitled to credit for cleaning the fish that appellant cooked whole. We do not so construe its finding.

[9] We have next to deal with the fish of respondents' own catch, delivered to appellant during the time in question; for, though respondent cleaned fish for appellant regardless of who delivered them, he delivered only those caught by his own boat. Appellant claims that the record is "absolutely bare of any finding, allegation, claim or evidence of the quantity of fish that W. O. Chase and O. W. Chase delivered to appellant." That the complaint is lamentably vague on the subject we have seen, and it is true that the findings state neither the quantities of fish delivered nor the prices that prevailed when the several deliveries were made. What they do state is that respondent W. O. Chase, between July 15, 1927, and October 27, 1927, delivered fish for which the purchase price was $1,672.70, from which it would follow that the bonus, computed at 10 per cent. of that figure, would amount to $167.27 as found. We cannot agree that the record shows these figures to have been reached without evidence. Respondent W. O. Chase produced a memorandum book which, according to his testimony, he kept in his own hand, regarding these matters. It is claimed that this book was not in evidence, but the record shows that it was. It was distinctly offered and counsel for both parties had questioned the witness about the way that it was kept, and the court, having expressed its opinion that sufficient foundation for its use had been laid, the following colloquy occurred:

"Mr. Wylie, (Appellant's counsel) 'All right Your Honor; if you feel that way I will withdraw my objection. That is I have the general objection in there.'"

"The Court: 'Objection overruled.'"

No copy of this book, or of any of the entries in it, appears in the reporter's transcript, but, as it indubitably appears that it was before the trial court, and appellant has not brought it up as part of the record for our inspection, we must presume that it supports the court's finding.

Respecting the operations of his boat respondent W. O. Chase testified:

"Q. * * * We will take up the $167. What is that? A. During the season I caught $1672 worth of fish. You see we had a tremendously poor season. * * *

"This is for fish I caught in my own boat."

"We got 10% of that as a bonus in addition."

[10] Of the $1,672.70, sometimes referred to by him as "$1,672," the witness testified that there remained unpaid to him $91.56, and, in course of the trial, appellant's counsel repeatedly conceded that, on account of fish delivered, there remained due and unpaid that much of a balance. The method followed in the findings was not to determine the balance due for each of the respective items claimed, i. e., the original price of the fish delivered, the bonus thereon, and the compensation for fish cleaned, but, rather, to add together the total amounts earned on each of the three accounts, and to add separately the payments made, without distinguishing the items to which these were attributable, and then to subtract the second total from the first, to arrive at the aggregate balance remaining unpaid. As respects the fish caught by respondent W. O. Chase and delivered, we are unable, from the record, to say that the court's finding as to its aggregate price, at what we must assume that it determined to be the agreed valuations as deliveries were made, was not supported by the evidence. If the finding on that subject is right, then, as we just saw, it follows that the finding about the amount of the bonus is right also.

There are other rulings on the admission of evidence assigned by appellants as errors. Suffice it to state that, after examining them all, we are unable to say that any such errors in admitting evidence have been made as to result in any miscarriage of justice. Appellant introduced no evidence at the trial to establish what were the actual quantities of fish delivered to it by respondent, or to establish what in fact were the quantities of fish cleaned for it by respondent. It chose to stand on its legal rights and devote its efforts to attacking the showing made by respondent. Doubtless it had the right to take this course, and, doubtless, notwithstanding that it took this course respondent was legally obligated to make a prima facie case before he could be entitled to any judgment. But we do not, in the circumstances, feel called upon to hold that the case made was insufficient to sustain in substance the action of the trial court.

The judgment is reduced by $23.70, that is to the sum of $2,247.07 and costs, and, as so reduced, is affirmed. Respondent is to recover his costs on appeal.

SHEETS v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al.*

Civ. 7215.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 30, 1930.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Sept. 30, 1930.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing Oct. 30, 1930.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court
Nov. 24, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨933(4).

Order granting new trial without specifying ground therefor is presumed not based on insufficiency of evidence, which cannot be considered on appeal unless evidence is insufficient as matter of law (Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subds. 5-7).

2. Railroads ⇨335(1).

Railroad crossing is warning of danger, and failure to exercise ordinary care in crossing will not be excused by railroad's negligent omission to exercise care.

3. Railroads ⇨330(2).

Safety appliances at crossing does not absolve travelers from duty of exercising care for own safety.

4. Railroads ⇨330(2).

Railroad cannot encourage relaxation of vigilance and hold persons to same quantum of care as if no safety measures had been adopted.

5. Railroads ⇨350(13).

Whether driver of truck struck by freight car at crossing exercised ordinary care for own safety held for jury.

Driver of truck after sunset testified that before starting to cross railroad track he looked through isinglass panels in side curtains in truck in direction of approaching freight car, but did not see or hear it, and that he did not notice whether warning signal at opposite side of crossing was operating at time. Testimony disclosed that when locomotive passed crossing, brakeman, who signaled driver to stop, left crossing and walked in direction of locomotive, and that driver thereafter moved truck forward in reliance on brakeman's conduct.

6. Appeal and error ⇨994(2).

Where visibility was poor, appellate court could not say that truck driver's testimony that he looked and could not see approaching freight car was false, nor that, if driver looked around curtain, he would have discovered danger.

7. Appeal and error ⇨996.

Court could not say flagman's action in leaving crossing and locomotive's crossing would not reasonably justify conclusion that danger from train was past.

8. Damages ⇨132(7).

$7,500 damages for fractured hip bone and bruises suffered by truck driver, who might not completely recover, held not result of prejudice.

9. Appeal and error ⇨933(4).

Order granting new trial, not specifying ground therefor, is assumed not based on excessive damages, where involving sufficiency of evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subs. 5-7).

10. Negligence ⇨122(1).

Charge that plaintiff is presumed, in absence of evidence, to have done all that reasonably prudent man would do for own safety, held proper (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 4).

11. Negligence ⇨122(1).

Presumption that person does all that reasonably prudent man would do for own safety should be given weight only in absence of evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 4).

12. Trial ⇨234(1).

Charge authorizing recovery, if jury believed plaintiff used care and believed defendants were negligent, did not authorize verdict on jury's belief without reference to evidence.

13. Pleading ⇨127(1).

Plea of contributory negligence does not admit defendant's negligence so as to dispense with proof thereof.

14. Negligence ⇨141(1).

Charge that defendant, urging defense of contributory negligence, submits own negligence, but claims plaintiff was also negligent, held not error.

15. Trial ⇨256(1).

Defendant, if believing instruction deficient for generality, must request more specific charge.

16. Appeal and error ⇨901.

Appellant has burden of proving order granting or denying new trial was error, presumption being in favor of order.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by George L. Sheets against the Southern Pacific Company and others. Verdict for plaintiff, defendant's motion for new trial was granted, and plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

George C. Hadley and J. Horton Beeman, both of San Francisco, and Franklin Swart, of Redwood City, for appellant.

Dozier & Kimball and Christian F. Kimball, all of San Francisco, and Kincaid & Fitzpatrick, of Redwood City, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

This action is one for damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff through the alleged negligence of defendant corporation. The latter denied the negligence alleged, and as a defense alleged contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. The case was submitted to a jury which returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $7,500. Defendants moved for a new trial, which was granted, and plaintiff has appealed from the order.

The accident occurred shortly after 5 o'clock p. m. on November 30, 1928, at the intersection of the Middlefield road, a public highway, and the tracks of the defendant company in the outskirts of Redwood City. The plaintiff, who was familiar with the crossing, was driving a motor truck north along the highway, which runs approximately north and south. The railroad tracks cross the highway obliquely at an angle of about 35 per cent., and extend in a general northwesterly and southeasterly direction. The truck which plaintiff was operating was struck at the crossing by a single freight car, moving in a northwesterly direction under the momentum previously imparted to it by a locomotive in the course of making a flying switch. Previous to the approach of the locomotive, the truck arrived at the crossing and stopped on the southerly side thereof upon the signal of a brakeman stationed at the crossing to protect traffic. When some distance from the crossing the locomotive was detached from the freight car while both were in motion and continued on across the highway. After the locomotive had crossed the brakeman turned and left the crossing in the direction the locomotive was traveling, whereupon the plaintiff started to cross, and the truck was struck by the oncoming freight car, causing the injuries complained of.

[1] The motion for a new trial was based upon the fifth, sixth, and seventh subdivisions of section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and was granted without specifying upon which the order was made. Under the above section it must be presumed that the order was not based upon the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and the plaintiff claims that the record discloses no other ground for making the order. Under the circumstances we are precluded from considering the question of the insufficiency of the evidence unless it was insufficient as a matter of law. Yoakam v. Hogan, 198 Cal. 16, 243 P. 21; Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269, 29 P. 481, 18 L. R. A. 124; Read v. Pacific Electric Ry., 185 Cal. 520, 197 P. 791. But defendant claims that plaintiff was shown to have been guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law; also that certain instructions were prejudicially erroneous, and that the amount awarded as damages raises the presumption that the jury was influenced by passion and prejudice.

[2-7] It was stipulated that on the evening of the accident the sun set at 4:40 o'clock p. m., and, according to the testimony, the accident happened at about 5:15 o'clock p. m. At each end of the truck seat curtains were placed, through each of which an aperture 10 inches square had been cut and covered with a transparent sheet of isinglass. Although it was dusk, the plaintiff testified that he could see ahead 300 feet and objects distinctly 50 feet, but that objects were less visible through the isinglass. He further testified that before starting to cross he looked through the curtain in the direction of the approaching freight car, but did not see or hear it. He admitted that by leaning forward he might have looked around the curtain, but failed to do so. He also admitted that on the opposite side of the crossing was placed a signal which gave warning by means of a bell and a moving arm, called a wigwag, but that he did not notice whether this signal was operating at the time he attempted to cross. As stated, the testimony also shows that, when the locomotive had passed, the brakeman or flagman who signaled plaintiff to stop left the crossing and walked in the direction of the locomotive, and it was then that the plaintiff moved his truck forward. The latter in this connection testified, in substance, that he depended to a certain extent upon the flagman and would not have attempted to cross had the latter remained upon the crossing. It was also testified that a brakeman with a lighted lantern was standing upon the forward end of the approaching freight car, but according to the plaintiff he did not see either the brakeman or the lantern. Other witnesses testified to the unsuccessful efforts of the trainman and others to direct plaintiff's attention to the approaching car. As has often been held, a railroad crossing is itself an effectual warning of danger which must always be heeded, and the failure to exercise ordinary care in passing over such a place will not be excused by the negligent omission of the railroad company to exercise such care. Green v. Southern California Ry. Co., 138 Cal. 1, 70 P. 926. Nor is it the law that, where a railroad adopts safety appliances or other methods of warning or protection, the crossing travelers are absolved from the duty of exercising ordinary care for their own safety (Koch v. Southern California Ry. Co., 148 Cal. 677, 84 P. 176, 4 L. R. A. [N. S.]

521, 113 Am. St. Rep. 332, 7 Ann. Cas. 795), but a railroad company will not be permitted to encourage a relaxation of vigilance by assurances that the danger has been minimized and at the same time hold persons to the same quantum of care as if no safety measures had been adopted (Gregg v. Western Pacific Ry. Co., 193 Cal. 212, 223 P. 553). Again, it has been held in numerous decisions that the practice of making flying switches is inherently dangerous [Elliott on Railroads (3d Ed.) § 1813], and, where it appears that the injury complained of was so occasioned, the inferences drawn from the facts are not the same as those arising from the circumstances of the ordinary collision, as it usually appears that the injured person had not the same opportunity to discover the danger (22 Cal. Jur., Railroads, § 65, p. 312). While the cases hold that, when to look is to see, testimony that one did look and could not see will be disregarded (Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 242, 116 P. 513), we cannot say, in view of the conditions as to visibility at the time of the accident, that plaintiff's testimony that he looked and could not see the approaching freight car is not true, nor that, had he looked around the curtain instead of through the isinglass, he would have discovered the danger. Neither can we say that the action of the flagman in leaving the crossing, taken in connection with the fact that the locomotive had crossed the highway, was not a fact which would reasonably justify the conclusion that the danger was past. Following the case of Gregg v. Western Pacific Ry. Co., supra, wherein the facts were analogous, we are of the opinion that the question whether plaintiff under all the circumstances exercised ordinary care for his own safety was one for the jury.

[8, 9] According to the testimony of a physician who treated the plaintiff for a period of about two and a half months after the accident, he suffered a fracture of the hip bone extending down toward the hip joint and of the second and third left lumbar vertebrae in the transverse process, and also of the socket in which the hip bone sets. He also received extensive bruises, from all of which he suffered pain, and the physician was unable to state whether he would completely recover from his injuries. In view of this testimony, the amount of the verdict was not such as to necessarily lead to the conclusion that the jury was influenced by passion or prejudice. Moreover, the question involves a sufficiency of the evidence to justify the amount of the verdict (Doolin v. Omnibus Cable Co., 125 Cal. 144, 57 P. 774; Graybill v. De Young, 140 Cal. 327, 73 P. 1067; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., supra), and, the order not having declared that it was based upon the ground of excessive damages, we are bound to assume that such was not the fact (Griffey v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 58 Cal. App. 509, 209

P. 45; Meinberg v. Jordan, 29 Cal. App. 760, 157 P. 1005, 1007; Tasker v. Cochrane, 94 Cal. App. 361, 271 P. 503).

[10-15] Defendant complains of the following instructions which were given at the request of plaintiff. On the question of contributory negligence the jury was instructed that it was to be presumed in the absence of evidence that plaintiff did all that a reasonably prudent man would do for his own safety. While it has been held that this presumption should be given weight only in the absence of evidence (Larrabee v. Western Pacific Ry. Co., 173 Cal. 743, 747, 161 P. 750), the instruction was nevertheless proper. It was not in conflict with others given by the court, and was a correct statement of the law (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 4). The following instruction was also given: "If you believe that plaintiff used that degree of care and caution for the protection of his own safety which a reasonably prudent person under similar circumstances would have exercised, I instruct you that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, and if you further believe that the defendants were guilty of negligence which proximately caused the collision, then your verdict should be in favor of plaintiff." Defendant contends that here the jury was erroneously instructed that they might base their verdict upon their belief as to the facts without reference to the evidence. While it is the duty of the jury to confine their deliberations to the evidence, we are of the opinion that they would, being reasonable men, understand from this, together with other instructions, that the court referred to their belief based upon the evidence, and such was the view respecting a similar instruction in Wood v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 1 Cal. App. 474, 82 P. 547. The jury was further instructed that: "There is a doctrine in law known as contributory negligence. When a defendant charged with negligence urges this defense for the purpose of defense he admits his own negligence, but urges that the plaintiff was also negligent and that the negligence of the plaintiff so charged was a contributing cause of the accident. To sustain such defense it is not enough that plaintiff happen to have been negligent, but it must appear as well that his negligence was a proximate cause of the accident." It is well established that a plea of contributory negligence does not admit the negligence charged in the complaint so as to dispense with proof of such negligence by plaintiff. Hoffman v. Southern Pacific Co., 84 Cal. App. 337, 258 P. 397. The defense is nevertheless predicated upon the existence of negligence on the part of the defendant, the responsibility for which he avoids by showing concurrent and contributing negligence upon the part of the person injured. Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel Gold Mining Co., 168 Cal. 500, 143 P. 714.

This, we think, was the plain meaning of the instruction, the jury being told that the admission upon which the plea was predicated was made only "for the purpose of defense." This was a correct statement of the law, and, if the instruction was deficient by reason of its generality, it was defendant's duty to request that the charge in this particular be made more specific. No such request was made.

[16] While all presumptions are in favor of an order granting or denying a new trial, and the burden is upon appellant to show that the order was erroneous (2 Cal. Jur., Appeal and Error, § 522, p. 887), in the present case there appears no support for the order on the ground of errors of law at the trial or that the plaintiff was guilty as a matter of law of negligence contributing to his injury. Although different conclusions on the issues of fact might reasonably have been drawn from the evidence, and an order specifying the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict would have been supported, no order on that ground having been made, no reason is disclosed by the record for granting a new trial, and under the circumstances we are forced to the conclusion that the order was erroneous and should be reversed.

The order is reversed.

YOUNG v. HOAGLAND et al.*

Civ. 7312.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Oct. 3, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 1, 1930.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court
Nov. 28, 1930.

1. Payment ☞84(1).

Moneys voluntarily paid on claim of right cannot be recovered merely because payer was ignorant of or misunderstood law affecting liability.

2. Payment ☞82(1).

That demand, voluntarily paid, was illegal, is insufficient for recovery, unless compulsion or "coercion" controls payer's conduct.

To constitute "coercion," there must generally be some actual or threatened exercise of power possessed or supposed to be possessed by person exacting payment over person or property of payer, from which the latter has no means of immediate relief other than by advancing money.

3. Payment $\S$ 82(3).

Money paid to prevent superseded directors from selling stock for assessments, canceled by lawful successors, held involuntarily paid, respecting recovery as money had and received.

4. Money received $\S$ 15.

Action for money had and received is equitable in nature, and generally lies where defendant possesses money belonging in equity and good conscience to plaintiff.

5. Corporations $\S$ 320(1).

Stockholder could not recover, as money had and received, money paid under canceled assessment, if directors expended money in paying corporate debts.

If money was used in paying corporate debts, stockholder got legal benefit of his payments, either as credit on stockholder's liability, or in canceling debts of corporation, thus increasing value of its tangible assets, and hence increasing value of stock.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by George H. Young against William Hoagland and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals.

Reversed and remanded.

William Kehoe, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Corbet & Selby, of San Francisco, for respondent.

JORGENSEN, Justice pro tem.

This is an action by plaintiff, as assignee of certain stockholders of the Humboldt Oil Company, against defendant Hoagland, a former president and director of the company, and two former directors, to collect money theretofore paid by himself and others on a canceled assessment of a corporation. The complaint is in twenty counts, and seeks to recover the sums paid as money had and received. The court, sitting without a jury, rendered judgment for plaintiff for $1,031.20, and defendant Hoagland appeals.

Plaintiff and each of plaintiff's assignors were stockholders in Humboldt Oil Company in December, 1923, at the time the payments were made. The three defendants had been, up to November 30, 1923, members of the board of directors of said company, consisting of five persons. On November 30, 1923, a meeting of the stockholders was held, at which meeting the old board of directors were removed and a new board appointed. These defendants claimed they had not been legally removed, and kept the books, seal, papers, and records and other property of the company, and retained possession of its offices for more than one year thereafter, until they were compelled by writ of mandate, sustained on appeal, to turn the same over to the lawful officers.

An "assessment No. 3," levied by the old board prior to their removal on November 30, 1923, which would have become delinquent by its terms on December 3, 1923, was canceled at the first meeting of the new board on November 30, 1923.

Notices of this assessment had been delivered to all the stockholders, and notice had been regularly published that any stock on which the assessment was not paid on or before December 27, 1923, would be sold. The former directors purported to sell all stock on which the assessment was unpaid on said December 27.

The record shows that the defendants threatened to sell all of the stock on which assessments were not paid to them as officers of the company.

The findings are, and the evidence establishes, that all of the payments for which judgment was rendered were either paid directly to defendant Hoagland or to the other defendants, who were purporting to act as secretary and treasurer, respectively, and turned over to Hoagland and deposited in the bank in his name because the account of the company had been attached, except as to payments set forth in counts 2, 3, 4, and 13, aggregating $93.50, which latter payments never came into the personal possession of defendant Hoagland.

None of the payments were made under a protest, but were made by the respective stockholders with knowledge of all the facts, to prevent the sale of their stock by defendants, claiming to be officers of the company, the stockholders so paying not knowing the validity of defendants' claim that they were the lawful officers of the company, and, being in doubt, paid the assessment to protect their interest, and in one case one of the defendants, Wilde, told the stockholder Lassegues that, if it was determined that the new board had rescinded the assessment, his money would be returned to him. There is nothing in the record to even tend to prove that defendants' claim to office was not made in good faith.

Defendant Hoagland offered to prove that he expended all the money received by him in payment of legitimate bills of the company. The trial court sustained an objection to this proffered testimony.

Issues:

(1) Was the money paid under such circumstances that the law will compel repayment?

(2) Did the court err in refusing defendant's offer to show that all money received had been used in paying legitimate bills against the company?

[1, 2] The rule is well settled that moneys voluntarily paid upon a claim of right cannot be recovered back merely because the party at the time of payment was ignorant of or mistook the law as to the liability. The illegality of the demand paid constitutes of itself no ground for relief. There must be, in addition, some compulsion or coercion attending its assertion, which controls the conduct of the party making the payment. What shall constitute the coercion which the law will recognize as sufficient to render payments involuntary may often be a question of difficulty. It may be said in general that there must be some actual or threatened exercise of power possessed or supposed to be possessed by the party exacting or receiving the payment over the person or property of the party making the payment, from which the latter has no other means of immediate relief than by advancing the money. Brumagim v. Tillinghast, 18 Cal. 265, 79 Am. Dec. 176.

The rule at common law was very strict, but has been tempered throughout the years. As is said: "The rule of the common law worked hardship and injustice in many instances, and this ancient doctrine of duress of person and later of goods has been much relaxed through the influence of equity and extended so as to admit of compulsion of business and circumstances." 21 R. C. L. at page 147.

"The general rule with regard to duress of this character is that where by reason of the peculiar facts a reasonably prudent man finds that in order to preserve his property or protect his business interests it is necessary to make a payment of money which he does not owe and which in equity and good conscience the receiver should not retain, he may recover it." 21 R. C. L. at page 155.

See Kilpatrick v. Germania Life Insurance Co., 183 N. Y. 163, 75 N. E. 1124, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 574, 111 Am. St. Rep. 722, where mortgagee paid an illegal bonus after foreclosure proceeding had begun, and was allowed to recover such payment.

Each case, of course, must rest upon its own peculiar facts. Counsel have not cited any cases involving the question of the return of money paid on illegal assessments of corporations.

In the case of Duke v. Force, 120 Wash. 599, 208 P. 67, at page 74, 23 A. L. R. 1354, involving an illegal assessment, the court assumed that such payments were involuntarily made and came within the above rule, but decided the case on other grounds. The same is true in the case of Gillett v. Moore, 74 Colo. 484, 223 P. 21.

[3] We think that, under modern conditions of business, where a man is constantly obliged to keep his credit good and unimpaired, and where stock is universally used for collateral for loans, etc., money paid on illegal assessments is involuntarily paid, and is payment which under modern conditions a reasonably prudent man finds that it is necessary to pay in order to preserve his property and protect his business interests, and under such conditions he should be entitled to recover.

In this case, however, the defendant Hoagland offered to prove that he did not have in his possession any of the payments, for the reason that he used all moneys received in paying legitimate bills of the company, which offer of proof the court, on objection, refused. Now these payments were not made to the defendants for their own personal use; they were made for the use and benefit of the corporation.

[4] The basis for an action for money had and received is that the defendant has money which in equity and good conscience he ought to pay to the plaintiff, and, generally speaking, the action lies in all cases where one person has in his possession money which in equity and good conscience he ought to pay over to another. The action is in the nature of an equitable one. Hillwig v. Boyer, 81 Cal. App. 763, at page 771, 254 P. 662. See Sacramento County v. Southern Pacific Co., 127 Cal. 221, 59 P. 568, 825, where the Supreme Court held that an action cannot be maintained by a county to recover back money paid under contract entered into in good faith for the construction of a railroad bridge across a river with a separate overhead roadway to be kept in order by the railroad company for free public highway purposes, the construction of which was completed and enjoyed by the public, notwithstanding the contract may be invalid for want of compliance with the requirements of the law, because in equity and good conscience the defendant had no money which belonged to the plaintiff.

It has been held that, where money is paid to an agent for the purpose of being paid over to his principal, and has been actually so paid over, an action for money had and received will not lie against the agent to recover the same, on the ground of such payment to the agent having been induced by false and fraudulent representations made by him. Butler v. Livermore, 52 Barb. (N. Y.) 570.

Likewise, where the amount of a stock subscription is paid to the treasurer of a corporation and certificates are not issued to the person so paying, an action for money had and received will not lie against the treasurer of the corporation to recover money paid on the subscription; the remedy being against the corporation. Loring v. Frue, 104 U. S. 223, 26 L. Ed. 713. See, also, Tuttle v. Everett, 51 Miss. 27, 24 Am. Rep. 622; Meacham v. Newport, 70 Vt. 264, 40 A. 729.

[5] Assuming that the money collected was used in paying the debts of the corporation, the payers got the legal benefit of their payments, either as a credit upon their stockholders' liability, or in canceling debts of the corporation, and thus increasing the value of its tangible assets and hence increasing the value of their stock,

The defendants were ostensibly acting in good faith for the corporation, and the payments were in effect made to and for the benefit of the corporation, and the corporation received the benefit, assuming the money was used in paying legitimate bills of the corporation, and the defendants are not liable, as they would have no money in their hands belonging to plaintiff.

The action of the court in sustaining the objection to the proffered evidence as above set forth was error.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; CASHIN, J.

WARD v. DE MARTINI.
Civ. 7208.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.
Oct. 4, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 3, 1930.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court
Nov. 28, 1930.

1. Assault and battery ⇨35.

Evidence showed that plaintiff, employed by company of which defendant was secretary, was willfully injured, probably permanently, when preventing defendant from assaulting manager.

2. Assault and battery ⇨43(6).

Evidence warranted instruction assaulted plaintiff, to prevent public offense, had right to offer assistance and use force necessary in preventing assault.

3. Trial ⇨296(11).

Instruction authorizing recovery for inability to pursue employment caused by assault held not objectionable as not specifically restricting damages to injuries, restriction being emphasized elsewhere.

4. Assault and battery ⇨43(5).

Evidence showing assault was wanton, malicious, and without justification, warranted instructions on exemplary damages.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1171(2).

Maxim de minimis non curat lex applied where jury, under allegedly erroneous instructions on exemplary damages, awarded $6,000 as compensatory, and $1 as punitive damages for assault.

6. Trial ⇨296(11).

Instruction jury must be "practically" certain of future suffering caused by assault held not misleading because not using "reasonably," "reasonably" appearing elsewhere in instruction.

7. Assault and battery ⇨33.

Where plaintiff claiming exemplary damages, alleged and proved wanton and malicious assault, evidence on defendant's financial condition was proper.

8. Assault and battery ⇨40.

$6,000 held proper for probably permanent injuries caused by assault, producing contusions, paralysis of femoral nerve, and numbness and partial paralysis of leg.

9. Trial ⇨29(3).

Trial judge's expressing opinion that witness is respectable person, or lives reputable life, is improper.

10. Trial ⇨31.

Aggrieved party must promptly call court's attention to improper remarks, to allow opportunity to correct prejudicial effect by instruction.

11. Appeal and error ⇨1170(6).

In absence of exception, judge's remark that plaintiff in assault case "lived respectable life" held not reversible error; prejudicial effect possibly being correctible by timely instruction (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Irene Ward against Paul De Martini. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Waldo F. Postel, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Walter E. Hettman and Chauncey F. Eldridge, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

An action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been maliciously inflicted upon the plaintiff by the defendant. A jury returned a verdict against defendant for $6,000 as compensatory, and $1 as punitive damages. A motion for a new trial was denied, and defendant has appealed from the judgment.

The grounds of appeal are that the verdict is unsupported; that the court instructed the jury erroneously and also erred in admitting certain testimony; further, that remarks by the trial judge in the presence of the jury were prejudicial to defendant, and that excessive damages, appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice, were awarded against him.

[1] The plaintiff was employed by the City Garbage Removal Company. Her duties consisted in procuring contracts for the removal of garbage, and in addition she rendered clerical services. The defendant was the secretary of the company, which maintained offices in the Clunie building in San Francisco. It was testified that on November 10, 1927, an altercation occurred at the office of the company between the defendant and one Guido Braccini, the manager of the concern. Plaintiff, with another employee, was in an adjoining room when the altercation began. Hearing the noise she opened the door between the rooms and found the defendant beating Braccini with his fists. Braccini was the smaller man, and plaintiff attempted to separate the parties, whereupon the defendant attacked her. He pushed her back and struck her in the left groin with his knee. In addition to pain, the blow caused severe contusions, a paralysis of the femoral nerve, and a numbness and partial paralysis of the left leg. According to one physician her injuries will probably be permanent. Another testified that she may recover with proper treatment but that her recovery will be slow. The defendant denied that he struck or otherwise injured the plaintiff, and the evidence as to what occurred is conflicting. It was amply sufficient, nevertheless, to support the conclusion that plaintiff was willfully injured by the defendant in the manner claimed and that her injuries are likely to be permanent.

[2] The court instructed the jury that if the plaintiff went to the assistance of one being assaulted by another, and used no more force than was necessary to prevent the assault, she was acting within her legal right in preventing the commission of a public offense. Defendant claims that there was no evidence that a public offense was being committed and that the instruction was consequently erroneous. We think the evidence sufficiently shows that an offense was being committed by defendant at the time plaintiff intervened, and the instruction was proper.

The court also instructed that the jury might include in their verdict all costs reasonably incurred by the plaintiff in the treatment of any injuries she might have suffered, including medical and surgical charges; also, what they found she had lost by reason of her inability to pursue her employment, and the amount which she would be reasonably certain to lose in the future. Contrary to defendant's contention, the instruction was in effect that plaintiff could recover only such expenses as were reasonable.

[3] It is also urged that the instruction fails to state that damages allowed for loss due to her inability to pursue her employment must be those caused by her injuries. While plaintiff's injuries are not directly referred to in connection with her loss due to inability to pursue her employment, the court throughout was careful to confine the damage to the loss due to such injuries; and in concluding his instructions as to this character of damages said: "The damages thus far discussed with you are what is known to the law as compensatory damages. The word 'compensatory' may be said to be damages that will compensate the plaintiff for what she suffered as the result of her injury." We are of the opinion that there is no reasonable ground for believing that the jury was misled by the above or that the defendant was prejudiced.

[4, 5] It is claimed that there was no evidence to support a verdict for exemplary damages, and that consequently the court's instructions as to the facts which would justify such a verdict were erroneous. According to defendant's account of the occurrence there was no justification whatever for an assault upon the plaintiff, and under the circumstances shown the conclusion that the same was wanton and malicious would be fully supported. In view of the evidence the instructions were proper. St. Ores v. McGlashen, 74 Cal. 148, 15 P. 452; Badostain v. Grazide, 115 Cal. 425, 47 P. 118; Bloomberg v. Laventhal, 179 Cal. 616, 178 P. 496. Moreover, the case is one where the maxim de minimis non curat lex applies. Moore v. Boyd, 74 Cal. 167, 15 P. 670.

[6] There is no merit in the further claim that by reason of the insufficiency of the evidence instructions as to compensatory damages were also erroneous. In a general instruction on the subject of damages the jury was told that before awarding plaintiff damages on account of future physical or mental suffering they must be practically certain that she would so suffer as a result of the injury. It is claimed that a jury must be reasonably certain in such cases, and the instruction was consequently erroneous. In another part of the same instruction, however, in referring to future loss the jury was charged that they must be reasonably certain. It is manifest that the words were used in the same sense, and there is no reason to conclude that the jury was misled.

[7] The court admitted evidence of defendant's financial condition. The complaint alleged and the evidence tended to show that the assault was wanton and malicious, and exemplary damages were claimed. Under such circumstances the evidence was properly admitted. Marriott v. Williams, 152 Cal. 705, 93 P. 875, 125 Am. St. Rep. 87.

[8] Likewise we find no merit in the claim that the damages awarded were excessive and appear to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice, as the amount allowed was fully justified by the character of plaintiff's injuries.

[9-11] Finally it is urged that remarks by the court were prejudicial to defendant. The plaintiff testified that in her work as a solicitor of contracts for the garbage company she called on many persons each day; and the court remarked, "I have no doubt that being engaged in the work of soliciting involves a great deal of walking." Again, she testified that with two exceptions she had no occupation since the alleged assault, and that since 1927 she had been living with her sister, whereupon the court remarked: "She stated at the time she had been with her sister. I know she lived a respectable and reputable life wherever she lived." It has been held error for the trial court to express an opinion that the witness is a person of respectability, and such irregularities have been repeatedly disapproved. McMinn v. Whelan, 27 Cal. 300; Estate of Blake, 136 Cal. 306, 311, 68 P. 827, 89 Am. St. Rep. 135; Abbott v. Coronado Beach Co., 55 Cal. App. 179, 203 P. 145. Nevertheless, as held in the following cases, it was the duty of the defendant to promptly call attention to the impropriety of the remarks in order to give the court an opportunity to prevent, by a proper instruction, any prejudicial effect upon the jury; and where there is a failure to do so the claim of misconduct will not be considered on appeal unless the conduct complained of was such that a harmful result could not be obviated by an instruction. People v. Abbott, 101 Cal. 645, 36 P. 129; People v. Derwae, 155 Cal. 592, 102 P. 266; People v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 545, 140 P. 256; People v. Mahoney, 201 Cal. 618, 258 P. 607; People v. Frank, 71 Cal. App. 575, 236 P. 189; People v. Singh, 78 Cal. App. 488, 248 P. 986; People v. Weeks (Cal. App.) 286 P. 514. Nor has the rule been changed by the decision in Berguin v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 203 Cal. 116, 263 P. 220. While certain language in that case, taken alone, might be construed to have that effect, the facts show that the misconduct there considered was such that its harmful effect could not have been removed by an instruction. No reference in this connection was made to the above cases, and it was manifestly not the intention to overrule the same or depart from the established doctrine. Here no exception was taken to the remarks of the court and the same were not assigned as misconduct. We cannot say that any harmful effect upon the jury could not have been removed by instructing them to disregard the remarks. In this connection, however, the record shows that the court instructed that questions of fact were solely for the jury's consideration, and that the court had no right to suggest, and did not suggest, what facts had been established in the case. Notwithstanding error or misconduct, in order to justify the reversal of a judgment the court must be of the opinion, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, that the same resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Const. art. 6, § 4½. After such an examination we are satisfied that the verdict of the jury was fully sustained by the evidence, and that nothing complained of by defendant warrants the conclusion that the same resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

DE WOODY v. BELDING, County Clerk, et al.
S. F. 14084.

Supreme Court of California.

Oct. 10, 1930.

1. Elections ⇨126(1).

Death, before general election, of supervisor elected at primary election did not convert primary election into nominating election, and Direct Primary Law did not apply (St. 1913, p. 1407, § 25, as amended).

2. Elections ⇨126(1).

Where one candidate received majority of votes for supervisor at primary election, he was elected, and neither he nor opponent was nominated, as contemplated by Direct Primary Law (St. 1913, p. 1407, § 25, as amended; Const. art. 2, § 2¾).

3. Elections ⇨126(1).

Right to office of supervisor of one elected at primary election was inchoate (St. 1913, p. 1407, § 25, as amended; Const. art. 2, § 2¾).

4. Counties ⇨43.

Death before general election of one elected supervisor at primary election did not create present vacancy in full-term office (Pol. Code, § 996; Const. art. 2, § 2¾).

5. Elections ⇨126(1).

Election of supervisor at primary election was rendered abortive by death before general election (Const. art. 2, § 2¾).

6. Elections ⇨172.

Where person elected supervisor at primary election died before general election, and opponent and another were thereafter nominated in accordance with statute, both names should be printed on ballot for general election (Pol. Code § 1188).

CURTIS and LANGDON, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

Application by R. M. DeWoody against C. F. Belding, as County Clerk of the County of Butte, and another, for writ of mandamus to compel respondent named to cause petitioner's name to be printed on ballot as candidate for supervisor.

Writ issued.

Bond & Dierup, of Chico, for petitioner.

J. Oscar Goldstein, of Chico, and Robert W. Harrison, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHENK, J.

Petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the respondent C. F. Belding, as county clerk of the county of Butte, to cause to be printed on the ballots to be used at the general election to be held on November 4, 1930, in the second supervisorial district in said county, the name of the petitioner as a candidate for supervisor for said district for the four-year term commencing the 5th day of January, 1931.

At the general election in November, 1926, one George T. Meeker was elected supervisor for said district for the four-year term commencing in January, 1927. He qualified and served until September 16, 1930, when he died. He was a candidate for re-election at the primary election held on August 26, 1930. The respondent A. H. Mahon was also a candidate at said primary election for said office for the full term. Meeker received 1,183 votes and the respondent Mahon received 726 votes. On September 20, 1930, the petitioner was appointed to the office of supervisor in and for said district to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Meeker and to hold said office until the election and qualification of his successor. He is now the duly appointed, qualified, and acting supervisor in and for said district.

On September 29, 1930, the petitioner filed a paper with the respondent county clerk pursuant to section 1188 of the Political Code, nominating the petitioner as a candidate for said office for the full term commencing January 5, 1931. On September 30, 1930, the respondent Mahon also filed with the county clerk, pursuant to said section 1188, a similar nomination paper for the same purpose. The respondent county clerk has announced that he intends to print said ballot with the name of the respondent Mahon as the sole candidate for said office. Hence this petition. A general demurrer has been interposed.

Incidentally it may be noted that both the petitioner and the respondent Mahon have filed nomination petitions under said section 1188 for the unexpired term commencing upon the qualification of the successful candidate at the general election on November 4th next and ending on January 5, 1931. No controversy has arisen with reference to the sufficiency or effectiveness of the nomination papers for the unexpired term. The question presented is whether the petitioner's name should be printed on the ballot as a candidate for the full term.

[1] Section 2¾ of article 2 of the Constitution, adopted in 1926, provides in part that: "Any candidate for a * * * county * * * office who at a primary election shall receive votes on a majority of all the ballots cast for candidates for the office for which such candidate seeks nomination, shall be elected to such office." The foregoing provision is self-executing and operates when there are two or more candidates for the one office. Meeker and the respondent Mahon were the two candidates for this one office at the recent primary election, and the constitutional provision above quoted was effective to constitute Meeker the duly elected candidate for said office. Whatever effect may be given to the last sentence in section 2¾ of article 2 of the Constitution, an inspection of the charter of the county of Butte discloses that there is nothing therein which would prevent the foregoing quoted constitutional provision from having full force and effect as to the election of Meeker. He was, therefore, elected at said primary election, and, if he had lived, he would have been entitled to a certificate of election, and, upon qualifying, to succeed himself for the full term commencing January 5, 1931, and his name would not appear on the ballot at the forthcoming general election. In legal effect the primary election was a final election so far as the two candidates for said office were concerned. The death of Meeker on September 16th did not convert the primary election into a nominating election as to either candidate, and section 25 of the Direct Primary Law (St. 1913, p. 1407, as amended) would have no application. That section contemplates a situation where no one of three or more candidates receives votes on a majority of all the ballots cast for candidates for the particular office. In such case there is no election, but the nomination only of the two receiving the highest number of votes. In other words, in the absence of an election under the new constitutional provision, two candidates are nominated for the office, and they are the "candidates chosen at the primary election to go on the ballot for the succeeding general election." If a vacancy occur as between those two candidates, "the name of the candidate receiving at said primary election the next highest number of votes, shall go upon the ballot to fill the vacancy."

[2-5] The result of the primary election in said supervisorial district of Butte county was therefore that Meeker was elected, Mahon was defeated, and neither was nominated, as contemplated by section 25 of the Direct Primary Law (St. 1913, p. 1407 as amended). Meeker's right to the office to which he had been elected was inchoate. He did not qualify and did not become an incumbent of the office. His death did not create a present vacancy in the full-term office. See Pol. Code, § 996. That office must necessarily be filled by election or by appointment by the Governor. The power of appointment would not accrue until after the commencement of the full-term office. People v. Ward, 107 Cal. 236, 40 P. 538. An election is available to the people of the district under the provisions of said section 1188, unless it must be said that Meeker's election at the primary election has deprived them of that right. We think it may not be so declared. The election of Meeker was rendered abortive by his untimely death.

[6] We have, then, a situation wherein there is a full-term office to be filled and no one elected to fill it; there is no candidate for said office resulting from the primary election; the time has not passed within which candidates may be nominated for that office and be voted for at the general election, November 4th; section 1188 of the Political Code provides the means for such nomination. Both the petitioner and the respondent Mahon have been nominated pursuant to that section, and the names of both as candidates for said office should be printed on the ballot to be used in said district at the ensuing general election.

Let the peremptory writ issue as prayed.

PEOPLE v. DAWSON.

Cr. 3345.

Supreme Court of California.

Sept. 30, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 30, 1930.

1. Constitutional law ☞203.

Amendments concerning indeterminate sentence and probation were ex post facto, and therefore inapplicable to defendant who committed offense before amendments were enacted (St. 1929, pp. 1930, 1384, amending Pen. Code, §§ 1168, 1203).

2. Statutes ☞71, 77(1).

Statute applying equally to all within natural class is not special legislation or void as not operating uniformly.

3. Statutes ☞74(1), 86.

Statutory distinction between felonies and misdemeanors is natural and reasonable classification, not violating constitutional provisions against special legislation, or lack of uniformity (Pen. Code, §§ 17, 1387).

Pen. Code, § 17, defines felony as crime punishable by death or imprisonment in state prison and every other crime as misdemeanor, while section 1387 provides that dismissal of misdemeanor charge shall operate as bar to prosecution for same offense.

4. Criminal law ☞178.

Order dismissing felony information for delay in bringing defendant to trial did not bar subsequent prosecution for same offense (Pen. Code, §§ 1382, 1387).

Pen. Code, § 1382, requires that action be dismissed if not brought to trial within 60 days after filing of information, unless good cause to contrary be shown.

5. Criminal law ☞1202(1).

To establish prior conviction of felony, prosecution must plead and prove that defendant served term in penal institution (Pen. Code, § 667).

Pen. Code, § 667, provides that one committing crime after having been convicted of offense punishable by imprisonment in state prison and "served a term therefor in any penal institution" is punishable as therein provided.

6. Criminal law ☞1202(6).

Judgment ordering imprisonment "for the term prescribed by law" after reciting conviction of forgery and prior conviction of felony, without reciting service of term in penal institution, held not void as imposing too severe punishment (Pen. Code, § 667).

CURTIS, J.

[1] A transfer of this action to this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal was ordered for the reason that we were impressed with the argument of the Attorney General that by the amendment in 1929 (St. 1929, pp. 1930, 1384) to sections 1168 and 1203 of the Penal Code it was unnecessary after the enactment of said amendments, in a case where the defendant was charged with a prior conviction of a felony, to either plead or prove that said defendant had served a term of imprisonment in a penal institution under said prior conviction. Whatever may be the force or effect of said amendments, we are convinced that they are not applicable to the present action for the reason that neither of said amendments was in effect at the date of the commission by the defendant of the offense charged in the information in this action. In so far, therefore, as the present action against the defendant is concerned, said amendments are ex post facto as to the appellant whose offense was committed before the enactment of said amendments. In re Lee, 177 Cal. 690, 171 P. 958; In re Fritz, 179 Cal. 415, 177 P. 157; People v. Schmidt, 33 Cal. App. 426, 435, 165 P. 555; Kring v. Missouri, 107 U. S. 221, 2 S. Ct. 443, 27 L. Ed. 506. The opinion, therefore, of the District Court of Appeal, which was written by Justice Houser and concurred in by Presiding Justice Conrey and Justice York, we think correctly and satisfactorily disposes of all questions presented in this action, and we adopt the same as the opinion of this court.

Said opinion is as follows:

By an information filed in the superior court, defendant was charged with the crime of forgery; also, that before the commission of such offense he had been convicted of another felony on which judgment had been pronounced, which latter charge defendant admitted. It is asserted by appellant that, following his conviction of the offense of forgery, judgment was pronounced by the trial court against him, not only on his conviction of the crime of forgery, but as well under the provisions of section 667 of the Penal Code, as for one who theretofore had been convicted of a felony and had served a term therefor in a penal institution.

In substance, it is first contended by appellant that the provisions of section 1387 of the Penal Code to the effect that an order for the dismissal of an action "is a bar to any other prosecution for the same offense, if it is a misdemeanor," but shall not constitute a bar to a further prosecution if the offense charged be a felony, is special and class legislation, and consequently unconstitutional and void, for the reason that if it be the law that a dismissal of an indictment or an information by which a defendant was charged with the commission of a felony does not bar a subsequent prosecution of the defendant for an offense identical with that originally charged against him, the effect is that upon the dismissal of a felony information, which is followed by a prosecution for an offense identical with that charged in the original information, the defendant is denied a speedy and public trial as guaranteed to him by article 6 of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, as well as by article 1, § 13, of the Constitution of this state, and section 686 of the Penal Code.

In substance, section 1382 of the Penal Code provides that, unless good cause to the contrary be shown, the action against the defendant must be dismissed if not brought to trial within sixty days "after the finding of the indictment, or filing of the information." Matter of Ford, 160 Cal. 334, 338, 116 P. 757, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 882, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1267.

[2, 3] By the record herein, it appears that defendant was actually brought to trial on the original information filed against him, but that, before the jury was impaneled in the action, "defendant did make his motion before said court to dismiss the said information and cause, and to discharge said defendant upon the ground that defendant, James H. Dawson, was not brought to trial within the time limited by law, and that he was not given a speedy trial," etc., which said motion was granted. In such circumstances, it would appear that defendant is in no position now to complain that he was not prosecuted under the original information. Furthermore, in the case of People v. Palassou, 14 Cal. App. 123, 111 P. 109, where a similar situation obtained, it was held that the fact that on the defendant's own motion he was discharged and the information dismissed because he had not been brought to trial within sixty days, as required by law, did not constitute a bar to a further prosecution under a new information for the same offense. However, appellant argues that because section 1387 of the Penal Code provides that the dismissal of a misdemeanor charge against a defendant shall operate as a bar "to any other prosecution for the same offense," the same rule should obtain where the defendant is charged with the commission of a felony; otherwise, in addition to the point that the statute constitutes special and class legislation, appellant contends that the statute is not uniform in its operation, convicts the defendant without due process of law, and denies to him the equal protection of the laws, in that the statute discriminates in favor of a defendant who may have committed a misdemeanor, as against one who may have committed a felony. The several questions thus presented may be reduced to the single inquiry as to whether offenses against the body politic may be legally divided into the two classes of misdemeanors and felonies, and procedure enacted which will be applicable to persons who are charged with the commission of the one class of criminal offenses and not be applicable to the other. A general rule, and one which has been so universally followed as to require no citation of authority therefor, is that, where a statute is made to apply equally as to all persons embraced within a natural class, the constitutional provisions directed against special legislation, lack of uniformity in the operation of the law, and the like, are not violated. From a consideration of section 17 of the Penal Code, which includes the statement that a felony is a crime which is punishable with death, or by imprisonment in the state prison, and that every other crime is a misdemeanor, it becomes apparent that as to the punishment or penalty which is to be imposed for a violation of the penal laws of the state, the Legislature by its enactment of the statute has recognized a distinction in degree as between or among different kinds of penal offenses. That such a classification is a natural one, not arbitrary, but based upon valid reasons and distinctions, and consequently not violative of the several constitutional provisions to which reference has been had, may be inferred from analogous adjudications by the Supreme Court of this state. People v. Finley, 153 Cal. 59, 94 P. 248; People v. Quijada, 154 Cal. 243, 97 P. 689; People v. Carson, 155 Cal. 164, 99 P. 970; People v. Oppenheimer, 156 Cal. 733, 106 P. 74; Selowsky v. Superior Court of Napa County, 180 Cal. 404, 181 P. 652; People v. Camp, 42 Cal. App. 411, 183 P. 845; In re Todd, 44 Cal. App. 496, 186 P. 790. Moreover, the classification as recognized in section 1387 of the Penal Code has stood, practically unchanged and unchallenged, for seventy-nine years. Crim. Prac. Act, St. 1851, p. 279, sec. 599.

It would seem clear that, as compared one with the other, a given offense may not be so serious in its consequences as another specified offense. In other words, as between two distinct offenses, one may be insignificant as far as its effect upon the body politic is concerned, while the other may be so heinous in character that to its frequent and unchecked commission might be attributed the origin of a possible state-wide disaster, or, eventually, the downfall of organized society. Manifestly, as relates to the penalty for the infraction of criminal statutes, the segregation into one class of comparatively trivial offenses from those which are placed into a second class because of their more serious effect upon the morals, the safety, or the welfare of the community, is justified. That the lesser crimes should be denominated misdemeanors, and the greater, felonies, is of no consequence; nor does the fact that in its regulation, especially as it affects the dismissal of a prosecution for its commission, the one class is treated differently from the other, give occasion for any valid objection on the ground that such action amounts to an arbitrary or unreasonable discrimination. It is a most natural classification, and one which does no violence to constitutional guaranties.

[4] Appellant presents the specific point that the order of dismissal of the original action was final; also that it was appealable; and that it acted as a bar to further prosecution of the defendant for the same offense. It is apparent that the people accepted such order of dismissal as final. That the people attempted no appeal therefrom furnishes no ground for complaint on the part of defendant, and that such order did not bar a subsequent prosecution of defendant for the same offense is decided adversely to appellant's contention, first, by the provisions of section 1387 of the Penal Code, to which reference herein has been had; and, secondly, by the ruling in the case entitled In re

Begerow, 136 Cal. 293, 68 P. 773, 56 L. R. A. 528, in which it is also held that, by the prosecution of the defendant therein on the second information filed against him, no constitutional right of the defendant was invaded. See, also, People v. Palassou, 14 Cal. App. 123, 111 P. 109; People v. Ammerman, 118 Cal. 23, 50 P. 15.

[5] It is urged by appellant that the judgment pronounced against defendant was void for the reason that it imposed on him a more severe punishment for the crime of which he was convicted than is provided by the statute which specifically prescribes the penalty for the commission of such crime.

As hereinbefore intimated, by the information in the instant action defendant was "accused * * * of the crime of forgery; * * * and that before the commission of the offense charged, * * * the said defendant was * * * convicted of the crime of violation of section 146 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 564), a felony. * * *"

That part of the judgment of which appellant complains was as follows:

"* * * James H. Dawson having been duly found guilty in this court of the crime of forgery, a felony, as charged in the information, and having admitted prior conviction of a felony,

"It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that the said James H. Dawson be punished by imprisonment in the state prison of the state of California at Folsom for the term prescribed by law."

In part, section 667 of the Penal Code provides that:

"Every person who, having been convicted of any offense punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, and having served a term therefor in any penal institution, commits any crime after such conviction, is punishable therefor as follows: * * *"

It will be noted that a part of the requisites to the imposition of the sentence of which complaint is herein made is that, following a prior conviction of an offense punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, the defendant must have "served a term therefor" in some penal institution; also, that the information herein was silent as to any allegation which related to any former service of a "term" by defendant in any penal institution; furthermore, that defendant pleaded guilty only to the charge of a prior conviction—which necessarily omitted the element of his having "served a term therefor in any penal institution."

Many authorities attest the rule that, in order to establish the prior conviction of a defendant of a felony, the statutory requirements must be fulfilled; that is to say, the necessary facts must be both pleaded and proved. People v. Coleman, 145 Cal. 609, 79 P. 283; People v. King, 64 Cal. 338, 30 P. 1028; People v. Wagner, 78 Cal. App. 504, 248 P. 946; People v. Wallach, 79 Cal. App. 605, 250 P. 578.

The opinion in the case of People v. Sampson (Cal. App.) 278 P. 492, contains a recognition of the fact that, in establishing a foundation for a valid judgment by which a more severe sentence may be imposed upon a defendant convicted of a criminal offense because of his prior conviction of a felony, it is essential that in some manner it appear that he has "served a term therefor" in some penal institution.

[6] It is clear that the duty of proving each of the statutory elements devolved upon the prosecution. Defendant pleaded guilty only to as great a charge as was contained in the information. Although it is manifest that a judgment by reason of which defendant would be subjected to punishment for the commission by him of the crime of forgery as severely as though both by the pleading and the proof in the action it appeared that theretofore he had been convicted of a felony, and had served a term therefor in some penal institution, would be violative of the rights of defendant; an examination of the judgment actually pronounced herein discloses that, after reciting the facts, to wit, that defendant had been convicted of the crime of forgery and that prior thereto he had been convicted of a felony, it was ordered that he be imprisoned "for the term prescribed by law." The attention of this court has been directed to no statute which, by its terms, purports to impose a more severe penalty on one convicted of a felony who theretofore simply has suffered a similar conviction, than is imposed upon one who never before has been convicted of a felony; and since the judgment herein contained no recital that following his conviction of a felony defendant had served a term therefor in a penal institution, the construction which should be placed upon the order contained in the judgment that defendant should be imprisoned "for the term prescribed by law," is that defendant be punished, not as prescribed by section 667 of the Penal Code, but only as is provided by the appropriate statute for a first offender convicted of the crime of forgery. So construed, as far as the point presented by appellant is concerned, the judgment is unexceptionable.

On examination of the record herein, this court is of the opinion that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury.

Following his conviction, defendant gave notice of appeal, not only from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial, but as well from several other orders which were incidental to the judgment.

It is ordered that the judgment as well as each of the several orders specified by defendant in his notice of appeal be, and they are, affirmed.

MORTON v. BEATY et al., Board of County Sup'rs.
S. F. 14073.

Supreme Court of California.
Oct. 1, 1930.

Mandamus $\Rightarrow$ 74(4).

Petitioner held not entitled, under circumstances, to mandamus for recount of ballots to determine right to office of justice of the peace (St. 1913, p. 1408, § 27, and p. 1489, § 14; Pol. Code, § 1216; Const. art. 2, § 2¾).

Although under Pol. Code, § 1216, and St. 1913, p. 1489, § 14, the registrar of voters of the county had possession and control of ballots cast at primary election, he was not a party to the proceeding, and no error, omission, wrongful act, or neglect of duty on part of board of supervisors was made to appear, in addition to fact that there was no method provided by law for the separate return by election officers of the number of ballots on which a vote or votes were cast for justice of the peace.

In Bank.

Original proceeding by writ of mandate by J. Russell Morton against Fred T. Beaty and others, as Board of Supervisors of Los Angeles County and acting as Primary Election Board of Canvassers.

Petition denied.

R. A. Morton, of Los Angeles, for affiant.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and Ray C. McAllaster, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

Hewitt, McCormick & Crump, of Los Angeles, for intervener.

PER CURIAM.

This is a proceeding under section 27 of the Direct Primary Law (Stats. 1913, p. 1408). The petitioner claims to have been elected at the primary election held on August 26, 1930, to one of the two offices of justice of the peace of Pasadena township. There were three candidates for the two offices to be filled. No returns were made to the respondent board of supervisors specifically or at all stating the number of the ballots cast in the precincts in said township on which a vote or votes were cast for the office of justice of the peace. In 29 of the 205 precincts in said township voting machines were used. By this method of voting 3,000 ballots were cast, and concededly it is not possible under present law to determine how many of the voters using voting machines voted for or failed to vote for a candidate for the office of justice of the peace. Nor is there any method provided by law for the separate return by the election officers of the number of ballots on which a vote or votes were cast for justice of the peace.

Notwithstanding the foregoing state of facts and the law, the petitioner contends that, if the ballots were now counted, he believes that such recount would disclose that he has been elected pursuant to the provisions of section 2¾ of article 2 of the Constitution as adopted November 2, 1926.

Under section 14 of the charter of the county of Los Angeles (Stats. 1913, p. 1489), and section 1216 of the Political Code, the registrar of voters of said county has the possession and control of the ballots cast at said primary election. He is not a party to this proceeding. No error, omission, wrongful act, or neglect of duty on the part of the respondent board of supervisors is made to appear.

The petition is denied.

ALDRICH v. CHINO SCHOOL DIST.

Civ. 121.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Oct. 8, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨909(6).

Appellate court could assume neither that resignation of school superintendent was accepted nor that effective date thereof was changed without his consent, in absence of evidence.

2. Schools and school districts ⇨63(1).

School board could not accept resignation of school superintendent as of August 1st (Pol. Code, § 1609, subd. 3(g), as amended by St. 1927, p. 1913).

3. Schools and school districts ⇨63(1).

School board could not arbitrarily change date of resignation of school superintendent from August 1st to June 30th without notice to superintendent (Pol. Code, § 1609, subd. 3(g), as amended by St. 1927, p. 1913).

4. Schools and school districts ⇨63(1).

Statute regarding resignation of school employee could not be construed as fixing date of resignation by operation of law, in absence of action by school board (Pol. Code, § 1609, subd. 3(g), as amended by St. 1927, p. 1913).

5. Schools and school districts ⇨63(5).

Finding in action for salary of school superintendent held to sustain judgment for salary for July, 1928.

The evidence disclosed that there had been no effective resignation prior to July, and that there had been no dissatisfaction with the superintendent's services and no action on part of school board looking to termination of his employment, that the school superintendent had gone away on vacation as in previous years, but had left his address with secretary, and that the superintendent performed certain services under the contract during the month of July.

6. Schools and school districts ⇨63(5).

School superintendent could not recover salary, in absence of evidence that district had available funds at time services were rendered out of which amount due could be paid.

BARNARD, J.

The plaintiff herein was employed by the defendant school district as superintendent of schools under a contract which covered a period ending July 1, 1929. On April 24, 1928, he received a telegram from the clerk of the school board, stating that the board was ready to elect his successor, if satisfactory to him, and asking him to wire his resignation to take effect August 1st. On the same day, he replied in part as follows: "This with general run down condition makes it necessary for me to resign, effective, August first." It is not shown that these messages were called to the attention of the board of trustees of defendant district, and, so far as shown by the record, the board took no action in reference to the resignation of the plaintiff, or in reference to terminating his employment.

About June 1, 1928, the plaintiff left the Chino school district and was gone all of June and July, except one day in June and except the last one or two days of July. His salary was paid for the month of June, but was not paid for the month of July, and this action was brought to recover the same.

In addition to the facts above stated, the court found that the plaintiff, during the month of July, 1928, communicated with the secretary of the school and kept her informed as to where he was; that this information was available at all times to the defendant school district and its board of trustees; that this was the vacation period of the school; that the school district and its board of trustees made no request of plaintiff to return or to perform any service, and made no protest because of his absence; and that plaintiff performed no service as such superintendent during the month of July, 1928, except the writing of two letters of instructions to the secretary of the school. The court found as conclusions of law, that, by reason of the provisions of subdivision third (g) of section 1609 of the Political Code, as amended in 1927, the resignation of plaintiff was ineffectual and void; that the plaintiff abandoned his contract of employment on August 1, 1928, and such abandonment was acquiesced in by the defendant school district; and that plaintiff was entitled to judgment for his salary for the month of July, 1928. From the judgment that followed the defendant has appealed.

Two points are raised by the appellant; the first being that, by reason of the provisions of subdivision third (g) of section 1609 of the Political Code as amended by St. 1927, p. 1913, the resignation of respondent became effective at the close of the school year, to wit, on June 30, 1928. The Code section referred to provides as follows:

"Boards of school trustees, and city, and city and county boards of education shall have power and it shall be their duty:
* * *

"Third * * * (g) To accept the resignation of any employee and to fix the time when such resignation shall take effect, which date shall not be later than the close of the school year during which such resignation shall have been received by such board."

[1-4] Appellant assumes that the school board accepted respondent's resignation, and, since there is no evidence that the board fixed any date when the resignation should become effective, it is argued that it must be presumed that the school board performed its duty and fixed the effective date thereof as of the close of the school year, on June 30, 1928. It is further argued that, if the school board accepted the resignation as of August 1, 1928, this act was beyond their power and void, leaving the matter as though the board had not acted at all, in which case the resignation became effective by operation of law upon the close of the school year. If it be assumed that the telegram sent by respondent constituted a resignation, the record is devoid of evidence to show that such resignation was ever accepted by the board, or any date fixed when the same should become effective. If respondent resigned, it was conditioned to take effect August 1st. In the absence of evidence, it can neither be assumed that the resignation was accepted, nor assumed that the effective date thereof was changed without the consent of respondent or notice to him. The board had no power, under the Code section above quoted, to accept the resignation as of August 1st (see Armstrong v. Board of Education, 173 Cal. 217, 160 P. 414), but neither did it have power to arbitrarily change the date of the resignation from August 1 to June 30 without notice to the respondent. Nor does that result follow by operation of law. The most that could be claimed for the Code section above quoted, is that it authorizes the board to fix the date when a resignation shall take effect, regardless of the date named in the resignation itself. Even then, it could hardly be argued that the board would have such a right, without the duty and obligation of notifying the employee of the date fixed by it. But nothing in that section can be construed as fixing the date of a resignation by operation of law, in the absence of any action by the board. We are of the opinion that it cannot be held, as a matter of law, that the purported resignation under consideration took effect on June 30.

[5] The second point urged by appellant is that the evidence does not sustain the court's finding that respondent's contract with appellant was mutually abandoned by both parties on August 1, 1928, it being also argued that, since the attempted resignation was void, an abandonment of the contract took place on June 1, 1928, when respondent went away, and was acquiesced in by the appellant as of that date. We find no evidence in the record to support the finding that the contract was mutually abandoned on August 1, 1928. On the other hand, there is evidence to sustain the court's findings that respondent had a contract of employment with the appellant board, which did not expire until July 1, 1929; that respondent performed certain services under said contract, during the month of July, 1928; and that no protest was made by the board because of respondent's absence and no request made to him to return, or to perform services other than those which he did perform. In addition to the evidence of specific work performed during that month by the respondent, there was evidence that in the six previous years of his service it had been respondent's custom to absent himself during the vacation months, and that he was only required to leave his address in case the board wanted to get in touch with him during that period.

There was also evidence that no duties were required of him by the board or by his contract, during this month of July, that he did not perform. Under these circumstances, the fact that there is no evidence of an abandonment of the contract on August 1, 1928, is immaterial. Whether this contract was abandoned August 1, 1928, or whether it is still in full force and effect is of no importance in this action. The only question here involved is whether or not it was in effect during the month of July, 1928. There having been no effective resignation prior to July, and, there being no evidence of any dissatisfaction with respondent's services, and no evidence of any action on the part of the board looking toward the termination of his employment, his contract remained in force, and the findings of fact made by the trial court are sufficient to sustain the judgment, which covers his salary for that particular month.

[6] It has, however, been held that, in such an action as this, recovery by the plaintiff depends upon whether or not there were, at the time the services were rendered, available funds of the district out of which the amount due for the services could be paid. Higgins v. San Diego Water Co., 118 Cal. 524, 45 P. 824, 50 P. 670; Buck v. City of Eureka, 124 Cal. 61, 56 P. 612; Martin v. Fisher et al. (Cal. App.) 291 P. 276. The record here shows no evidence or finding upon that point.

The judgment is therefore reversed, with instructions to the trial court to take evidence upon the one question, whether or not there were on August 1, 1928, available funds belonging to the appellant district out of which respondent's salary for the month of July, 1928, could be paid, and with the further instruction to then render judgment for or against the respondent, depending upon its finding upon that question.

TYLER et al. v. PARK RIDGE COUNTRY CLUB et al.

Civ. 208.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Oct. 3, 1930.

I. Venue ⇨21.

As general rule, defendant is entitled to have action tried in county of residence (Code Civ. Proc. § 395).

2. Venue ⇨68.

Burden is on plaintiffs to bring themselves within exception to rule giving defendant right to have action tried in county of his residence (Code Civ. Proc. § 395).

3. Venue ⇨5(3).

Action by golf club members to enjoin stockholders from transferring stock to persons other than those of Caucasian race did not involve "interest in real property" as regards venue (Code Civ. Proc. § 392, subd. 1).

Code Civ. Proc. § 392, subd. 1, provides for trial of action for recovery of real property or interest therein in county where subject of action or some part thereof is situated. The complaint alleged that by-laws of club limited members to persons of Caucasian race, and alleged upon information and belief that certain defendants were owners of all stock in corporation, and that they had entered into agreement to sell all of the stock to certain members of negro race, and that if not restrained defendants would transfer stock to such persons, and that by-laws would be amended so as to permit members of the negro race to become members of club, and that plaintiffs would thereby suffer great and irreparable damage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; William H. Ellis, Judge.

Action by V. A. Tyler and another against the Park Ridge Country Club, Dan Gilkey, and others, for the appointment of a receiver and to enjoin defendants' transferring stock of the corporation to persons other than those of the Caucasian race. From an order denying a motion for a change of venue, defendants named appeal.

BARNARD, J.

This action was brought by certain parties holding memberships in a golf club in Riverside county, conducted by Park Ridge Country Club, a corporation; the action being brought on behalf of and for the benefit of all those holding such memberships. The action seeks the appointment of a receiver to take charge of and manage the property of the corporation, and to restrain certain defendants who are alleged to own the stock of the corporation from transferring or selling said stock to any person other than one of the Caucasian race. The complaint alleges that the by-laws of said club limit the members thereof to persons of the Caucasian race; that those holding memberships therein are not entitled to voting power in the conduct of the club or in the corporation, nor in amending or changing the by-laws; that according to the articles of incorporation and the by-laws, the directors of the club and the owners of the corporate stock have the sole right to amend the by-laws and to provide rules and regulations for the conduct of the club and the members, including the right to change the by-laws in such a manner as to provide that memberships in said club shall not be limited to members of the Caucasian race; and further that the board of directors have full power to elect or reject candidates for membership. It is then alleged that the plaintiffs were induced to purchase memberships upon the representation that the members would be limited to persons of the Caucasian race; and that for the purpose of defrauding the defendants, the directors of said club have pretended and represented that the club is insolvent. Upon information and belief, it is alleged that certain of the defendants are the owners of all of the stock of said corporation, and that these defendants have entered into an agreement to sell all of said stock to certain members of the negro race; that if not restrained, said defendants will transfer said stock to such other persons; that the by-laws will be so amended as to permit members of the negro race to become members of the club; and that these plaintiffs will thereby suffer great and irreparable damage. Plaintiffs pray that a receiver be appointed, and that the defendants be enjoined from transferring the stock of said corporation to any person other than a person of the Caucasian race. The action was filed in the county of Riverside, and the defendants moved for a change of venue to the county of Los Angeles, upon the ground that all of the defendants are residents of that county. From an order denying this motion, this appeal is taken.

[1] The respondents apparently concede the sufficiency of the showing made by appellants as to the place of their residence. The only point raised on this appeal is as to whether or not this action is one involving real property within the purview of section 392 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As a general rule, a defendant is entitled to have an action against him tried in the county of his residence. Code Civ. Proc. § 395. Respondents contend that this action comes within that part of section 392, Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows:

"Actions for the following causes must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action, or some part thereof, is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial, as provided in this code:

"1. For the recovery of real property, or of an estate or interest therein, or for the determination in any form, of such right or interest, and for injuries to real property."

[2, 3] The burden is therefore upon respondents to bring themselves clearly within the exception to the general rule. Smith v. Smith, 88 Cal. 572, 26 P. 356. The respondents admit that they own no shares of stock in the corporation named, contending, however, that although they have no legal title to the real estate in question, this property is impressed with a trust, the title being held for the benefit of the members who are entitled to use the same, and that therefore they have such an interest in the real estate involved as brings the action within said section. We think this contention cannot be sustained. The complaint shows no fact to establish such a trust, nor does it set up any injury to the land itself resulting from the acts which are asked to be enjoined. Those acts are merely the transfer of corporate stock and a change in the directorate of the corporation. What is alleged in the complaint is not an interest in the land, but a contractual right to use the land, subject to the by-laws of the corporation, the rules made by the board of directors, and the equal right of others to the use of the premises. It is not even alleged that the right of respondents to use the land is affected or in any manner threatened. The complaint shows plainly that the real purpose of the respondents in this action is not to secure to themselves the right to use the land for the purposes embraced within the privileges of their membership, but to prevent certain other parties from acquiring or obtaining a similar right to use the same property. If it could be considered that any interest in real estate is involved, it would only be involved inferentially, and the complaint principally involves other matters not embraced within the provisions of section 392, Code of Civil Procedure, and that section would therefore not apply. Smith v. Smith, supra.

Not only is the action, seeking to enjoin the sale of corporate stock and to restrain certain persons from acting as directors of a corporation, a personal one, but it nowhere appears that the contractual right of the defendants to use the property in common with others has been or will be interfered with. It is sought to restrain the parties, to whom the stock may be sold, from doing certain acts which it is alleged they are entitled to do, under the articles and by-laws of the corporation. But it is not even claimed such new owners of the stock would or might attempt to prevent respondents from using the property. Instead of seeking to recover or establish their own right to use the property, respondents are seeking to prevent certain other persons from acquiring such a right. In effect, the action is one to obtain and exercise control of a corporation, rather than one involving an interest in real property.

The order appealed from is reversed.

Civ. 5895.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Oct. 3, 1930.

1. Partnership $\S$ 218(3).

Evidence showing partner sought to be held liable owned business and did not ratify unauthorized contract of alleged partner who had no interest in business warranted nonsuit.

Evidence showed that agreement sued on was executed by alleged partner who had no interest in business conducted by other partner under name and style of partnership. There was no evidence tending to show that partner sought to be held liable had actual knowledge of contract or had given other partner any authority whatsoever.

2. Contracts $\S$ 346(10)

Where contract introduced was not contract alleged in complaint, material variance existed, warranting nonsuit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Douglas L. Edmonds, Judge.

Action by P. E. Brazil against the Pacific American Petroleum Company, a copartnership, composed of John O. Haley and another, and against the partners individually. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant John O. Haley appeals.

Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Edward Winterer and Winterer & Ritchie, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. H. Van Law and A. G. MacRobbie, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SCHMIDT, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff brought action in the lower court on an alleged "agreement in writing" (pleading the contract in substance and not in hæc verba) against the defendant Pacific American Petroleum Company, it being alleged that same was a copartnership composed of John O. Haley and C. R. Haley, and against the two Haleys individually. Defendant John O. Haley answered, claiming that he was the sole owner of the Pacific American Petroleum Company. No service was had upon defendant C. R. Haley. The case went to trial upon the complaint and answer of John O. Haley.

The evidence in the case shows that the alleged agreement was executed on behalf of the Pacific American Petroleum Company by C. R. Haley and not by John O. Haley. The evidence further shows, and the court found, that the defendant John O. Haley, during all of the times mentioned in the complaint, conducted and carried on business under the name and style of Pacific American Petroleum Company. In order to prove the alleged contract plaintiff was permitted in the lower court to show what acts had been done by the defendant John O. Haley, this over the objection of defendant John O. Haley, it being urged that before ratification of a contract can be proved by acts of the person to be charged there must be a showing: First, that the person to be charged had knowledge of the contract; and, secondly, that the person signing the agreement had either actual or ostensible authority to sign for the principal.

[1, 2] The record is entirely void of any evidence: First, that the defendant John O. Haley had actual knowledge of the contract permitted to be introduced in evidence by plaintiff; and, secondly, of any authority whatsoever on the part of C. R. Haley to execute a contract for John O. Haley or for the Pacific American Petroleum Company. Under this state of the evidence, the motion for nonsuit by the defendant John O. Haley on these grounds should have been granted. Furthermore, the contract introduced in evidence is not the contract alleged in the complaint. No request to amend having been made, the motion for nonsuit on the ground of material variance should have been granted. Ortega v. Cordero, 88 Cal. 227, 26 P. 80; Riverside Water Company v. Gage, 108 Cal. 240, 41 P. 299.

In view of this conclusion, no other points need be discussed.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded to the lower court with directions to grant the motion for nonsuit and enter judgment accordingly.

ENOS v. NORTON et al.
Civ. 216.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.
Oct. 8, 1930.

1. Negligence ⇨117.

Generally, contributory negligence must be specifically pleaded, unless appearing from complaint, or from plaintiff's evidence.

2. Automobiles ⇨239(2).

Special defense held merely to deny motorist's negligence, and to allege motorcyclist's negligence; hence, did not plead motorcyclist's contributory negligence.

Special defense in question alleged substantially that plaintiff so negligently drove his motorcycle that by reason thereof, without any fault of defendants, motorcycle was driven against their automobile, and injury, if any, was caused by negligence of plaintiff, and not by fault of defendants.

3. Automobiles ⇨206.

Motorcyclist had right to assume approaching motorist would not make left turn in front of him to enter garage without warning (St. 1923, p. 553, § 113).

California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553) § 113, provides that operator of vehicle shall drive at careful and prudent speed, not exceeding what is reasonable and proper with regard to traffic, surface, and width of highway.

4. Appeal and error ⇨999(3).

Finding denying contributory negligence of motorcyclist, confronted with emergency when approaching motorist made left turn without warning, was conclusive (St. 1923, p. 553, § 113).

5. Automobiles ⇨225.

Unwise choice in emergency, caused by motorist's making left turn without warning in front of motorcyclist, does not alone constitute contributory negligence (St. 1923, p. 553, § 113).

6. Automobiles ⇨225.

Care required of motorcyclist, confronted with emergency when approaching motorist made left turn without warning, is care which ordinarily prudent person would exercise under similar circumstances (St. 1923, p. 553, § 113).

7. Appeal and error ⇨999(3).

Finding denying negligence, which in first instance is question of fact, is conclusive.

8. Negligence ⇨136(9).

Negligence is generally jury question, even in absence of conflict in evidence, if different conclusions can rationally be drawn.

9. Negligence ⇨136(9).

Negligence is question of law if only one conclusion can reasonably be reached on evidence.

10. Automobiles ⇨245(82).

Whether motorcyclist going 15 miles an hour, and stopping within 24 feet, was contributorily negligent in colliding with approaching motorist, who made left turn without warning, held for trial court in nonjury case (St. 1923, p. 553, § 113).

Evidence showed that pavement over which plaintiff was operating motorcycle was wet, while that on which defendant's automobile was traveling was dry. Plaintiff saw wheels of automobile start to turn in front of him when 30 feet away. He stopped in 24 feet, whereas motorcycle in good working order could have been stopped in 20 feet.

Action by Ernest Enos against Nicholas P. Norton and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

This action was instituted by plaintiff to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained in a collision between an automobile operated by one of the defendants and a motorcycle operated by the plaintiff. The facts may be stated as follows: Defendant Norton operated a garage in the city of Corona, and the defendant Matthews was in his employ. In the course of his business defendant Matthews had repaired a Chevrolet automobile. In order to test the same, defendant Matthews drove said car along Sixth street in said city, and while so driving said car the accident occurred. The garage of defendant is located on the south side of said Sixth street between Victoria avenue on the east and Ramona avenue on the west. There is an 18-foot Sixth street entrance to said garage. The distance from the east side of said entrance to the west curb line of Victoria avenue is 126 feet. The distance from the west side of said entrance to the east curb line of Ramona avenue is 207 feet. The distance between Victoria avenue and Ramona avenue is approximately 350 feet. Sixth street is paved and is approximately 50 feet wide between curbs. There was a pile of lumber about 4 feet high, and some gravel or sand on the southerly curb of Sixth street, extending some 6 or 8 feet out into the street a distance of approximately 116 feet west of the entrance to said garage. Defendant Matthews took the Chevrolet automobile from the garage to Victoria avenue, turned to the left, and returned to the garage, following a course a little to the right of the center of Sixth street. As he was proceeding south, when he arrived at a point a little west of said entrance to the garage, he turned to the left for the purpose of driving into the garage. The collision occurred near the east side of the entrance to said garage. Plaintiff got his motorcycle near the southwest corner of Ramona avenue and Sixth street, rolled it into Sixth street until he had passed the center line thereof, started his motor, and drove it east on Sixth street at a rate of 12 to 15 miles per hour. Plaintiff watched the car being driven by defendant Matthews from the time he began driving eastward, to see if any signal was given indicating the intention of the driver to turn into the garage. Plaintiff knew that a great many cars went into this garage. Defendant made no signal indicating his intention to turn. Plaintiff saw the front wheels of the car being driven by the defendant Matthews begin to turn toward the garage while he was at an estimated distance of 30 feet from the defendant's car. Plaintiff then applied his brakes and gradually slowed down. He had stopped at the moment of the impact. A motorcycle, properly equipped, can be stopped within 20 feet; plaintiff stopped his motorcycle in about 24 feet. The portion of the street upon which plaintiff was traveling was damp (wet). That portion upon which defendant Matthews was traveling was dry. The permissive speed limit on Sixth street between Victoria avenue and Ramona avenue at the time of the accident is conceded to be 15 miles per hour. The nature or extent of the injury need not be stated, except to say that plaintiff's leg was broken in the collision that occurred.

Appellant concedes that the evidence as to the negligence of the defendant is conflicting, and admits that under such circumstances the finding of negligence by the court as to the defendants must stand.

The complaint charges negligence. The answer especially denies the negligence on the part of the defendants and contains a defense, designated as a special defense. This separate defense alleges that Fred L. Matthews, one of the defendants herein, was operating his car on said street at the time and place referred to in the complaint in a careful and lawful manner, and alleges that the said "plaintiff, Ernest Enos, drove easterly along said Sixth street on his motorcycle at a rate of speed in excess of twenty-five miles per hour, and so carelessly, negligently and improperly managed said motorcycle that by reason thereof said motorcycle, without any fault on the part of these defendants or either of them, and by want of due care in the management of said motorcycle by the plaintiff, was driven against said automobile and thereby sustained the alleged injuries mentioned in the complaint; and if any injury was sustained by said plaintiff, it was caused by the negligence of said plaintiff and not by the fault of said defendants or either of them." Respondent maintains that said special defense does not charge contributory negligence.

[1] "To be availed of the defense of contributory negligence must, as a general rule, be specifically pleaded. * * * Of course, if it appears from the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint or from the evidence introduced by him that he has been guilty of contributory negligence the defense may be availed of, even though not set up by defendant." 19 Cal. Jur. 681; Hall v. City and County of San Francisco, 188 Cal. 641, 206 P. 459.

In the case of Hughes v. Warman Steel Casting Co., 174 Cal. 556, 163 P. 885, 888, the court said: "Defendant having in its answer denied all negligence on its part, this plea, though denominated a special defense, is simply an affirmative charge of negligence on the part of plaintiff which was available under the general issue without special plea," etc.

[2] The special defense interposed herein is but a denial of negligence, and an affirmative allegation of negligence on the part of the plaintiff. Hence it is not a pleading of contributory negligence. The court found the allegations of the answer, as to the negligence of the plaintiff, untrue. Under such circumstances, the judgment must be affirmed, unless it appears from the evidence offered by the plaintiff that he was guilty of contributory negligence.

From the facts above stated it appears that the plaintiff was proceeding easterly on Sixth street in the city of Corona and that the defendant was proceeding westerly on said street. Appellants urge that notwithstanding such finding the evidence presents a state of facts that renders the respondent guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

It must be remembered that the positions of moving machines are relative and small fractions of seconds change the relative positions materially. These machines were 30 feet apart when the defendant turned to cross the path of plaintiff. Plaintiff saw defendant's machine begin to turn and applied his brakes, coming slowly to a stop.

Estimated distances are not accurate. The road was damp on the side plaintiff was required to travel and dry on defendant's side. Plaintiff was keeping careful lookout, because he knew machines frequently crossed over from the left side of the street going into the garage. No signal was given by the defendant. Plaintiff had no way of knowing whether the defendant saw him or not; no way of knowing whether defendant was going to proceed at a slow rate of speed, permitting him to go in front, or whether he was going to continue across the street and force the plaintiff to go behind him.

"We are aware that the courts of this state have placed great emphasis upon the rule that a motorist must at all times use due care to avoid colliding with another; that he must be ever alert and watchful so as not to place himself in danger. And, while he may assume that others will exercise due care, he cannot for that reason omit any of the care which the law demands of him." Commonwealth Insurance Co. of New York v. Riverside-Portland Cement Co., 69 Cal. App. 165, 230 P. 995, 996.

[3-6] Plaintiff had a right to assume that defendant was not going to turn in front of him and cross his path without any warning signal. Under such circumstances, the sudden turning as though to cross plaintiff's path, without signal, constituted an emergency. In such an emergency plaintiff must determine his course at once and act on his choice. Whether or not such judgment in the light of after-acquired knowledge was the wisest or not cannot now be inquired into. Under such circumstances the determination of the trial court and its finding thereon is conclusive. An unwise choice in an emergency does not in itself constitute contributory negligence. Hammond v. Pacific Electric Railway Co., 32 Cal. App. 756, 164 P. 50; 19 Cal. Jur. 763; McPhee v. Lavin, 183 Cal. 264, 191 P. 23. The rule as to the care necessary to use under such circumstances is "the care that an ordinarily prudent person would have exercised under the same or similar circumstances." Tousley v. Pacific Electric Railway Co., 166 Cal. 457, 137 P. 31, 33.

Section 113 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553) contains the provision that "any person driving a vehicle on the public highways of this state shall drive the same at a careful and prudent speed not greater than is reasonable and proper, having due regard to the traffic, surface and width of the highway, and no person shall drive any vehicle upon a public highway at such a speed as to endanger the life, limb or property of any person."

[7-9] In the case at bar if the riding of a motorcycle at a speed of 12 to 15 miles an hour constituted negligence or contributory negligence, then it was because the conditions present made such speed a violation of section 113, supra. Negligence is a question of fact in the first instance, and if a question of fact, the determination of the same by the court's finding adversely to the plaintiff, is conclusive here. The general rule applicable to negligence cases is that often where there is no conflict in the evidence, negligence is a question of fact for the jury, if different conclusions on the matter can rationally be drawn from the evidence. However, if but one conclusion can reasonably be reached from the evidence, it becomes a question of law. Murray v. Southern Pacific Co., 177 Cal. 1, 169 P. 675; Jacobson v. Northwestern Pacific R. R. Co., 175 Cal. 468, 166 P. 3; California Rendering Company v. Pacific Electric Co., 205 Cal. 73, 269 P. 922.

[10] Hence the true test as to whether or not the plaintiff Enos was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law must be measured by whether or not there is but one reasonable conclusion that can be reached from the evidence presented in the trial court. Appellant cites the case of Davis v. Brown, 92 Cal. App. 20, 267 P. 754, which is authority on the question that we think may be stated to be well-settled law in this state, to wit, that it may be negligence to drive an automobile at a rate of speed not in excess of the statutory speed limit within the district, depending upon the conditions present at the time. The plaintiff Enos fixed the distance between his motorcycle and the automobile at the time the automobile began to turn into the garage, as 30 feet. Enos was 10 or 12 feet west of the entrance to the defendant's garage at that time. Defendant Matthews' car was west of the center of Sixth street when it began to turn. Plaintiff Enos fixed the distance at which he could stop his motorcycle going at the rate of 15 miles an hour upon a dry street at 20 feet.

The question presented might be stated thus: Is it negligent under all circumstances for a person to drive a motorcycle at from 12 to 15 miles per hour when he sees a machine proceeding toward him at approximately the same rate, when the street is wet or damp, so that he cannot stop his motorcycle within the mathematical distance that a motorcycle could be stopped in, if it were in good working order, or, as estimated in this case, within 20 feet, when the driver of the automobile which he is meeting at a distance of 30 feet, suddenly, and without signal or warning, turns his car in the middle of the block, into the path of the motorcycle? Certainly it could not be claimed that 12 to 15 miles per hour on a damp street, without traffic, would be either an unlawful or careless speed at which to operate a motorcycle, and if it were a negligent operation, it would be negligent because of the presence of another condition upon the street.

In the case of Simonsen v. L. J. Christopher Co., 186 Cal. 786, 200 P. 615, 616, the court said: "As has been frequently said by this court and the District Courts of Appeal, a person crossing a street in front of an approaching vehicle cannot close his eyes to threatening danger, relying upon the presumption that the other party will use reasonable care and prudence, and obey the traffic laws; but if there is nothing in the situation to warn him of impending danger he is not guilty of negligence in relying upon such assumption." (Citing cases.)

To the same effect, see, also, McPhee v. Lavin, 183 Cal. 264, 191 P. 23, supra.

The plaintiff had the right to assume that the defendant's car was going to proceed on its right side of the street, until advised that the defendant intended to turn into the garage. He was not advised by sign or signal, but, due to his own caution, he observed the car begin to turn, and immediately applied his brakes to avoid a collision, coming to a stop in 24 feet. Until he observed the car begin to turn, he had a right to proceed.

From all the evidence we cannot say that only one conclusion could be reasonably reached—hence, it was a question for the determination of the trial court. The trial court's finding that plaintiff was not guilty of negligence is conclusive upon this court.

The judgment is affirmed.

YORK, J.

This cause was tried in the municipal court of Los Angeles county and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $550, from which judgment appeal was taken to the superior court upon a statement duly settled by the judge of the municipal court, containing all the evidence adduced at the trial, the grounds of appeal, and copies of the pleadings. The superior court affirmed the judgment of the municipal court, and from the judgment rendered on that appeal, defendant appeals to this court upon the following grounds:

"1. That the decision is against the law.

"2. That the decision is against the evidence.

"3. That the plaintiff did not rescind within a reasonable time after her discovery that the contract had partially failed.

"4. That the second cause of action for money had and received is barred by subdivision 1 of section 339, Code of Civil Procedure."

[1-3] The record discloses that there was sufficient evidence to sustain the judgment. Five hundred and fifty dollars had been paid by the plaintiff to the defendant on a contract, which contract was rescinded by notice of rescission on April 13, 1926. The evidence shows that there were sufficient grounds for rescission. The action was properly brought in the municipal court, because it was merely an action for the recovery of $550 and not for the rescission of a contract, because that was rescinded by the notice of rescission. Instead of the statute of limitations for the bringing of this action running from June, 1923, when the alleged fraud was discovered, it would not begin to run until the cause of action accrued—on the 13th day of April, 1926 when the notice of rescission was served.

As was said in the case of Richter v. Union Land & Stock Co., 129 Cal. 367, at page 375, 62 P. 39, 41: "But the action is not for a breach of the original contract, but upon an obligation growing out of the failure to perform it. The plaintiff was not bound to treat the contract as abandoned on the first breach of it, or on any particular breach, but had his election still to rely upon it. The statute could not begin to run until he made his election to rely no longer upon the contract, and to sue for the money paid to the defendant under it." See, also, Rose v. Foord, 96 Cal. 152, 30 P. 1114; 16 Cal. Jur. 512.

We see no merit in any of the grounds of appeal urged. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

§. Banks and banking §49(8).

Alleged stockholder sought to be held liable for assessment after bank's insolvency held not estopped to deny stock ownership under evidence.

The evidence disclosed that the president of the bank on January 16, 1919, placed ten shares of the bank's stock for his own convenience in defendant's name on the books of the bank; that defendant knew nothing of the matter until October, 1924, and that he then notified the president of the bank that he did not wish to accept the stock, and on November 12, 1924, indorsed certificate in blank so that the matter could be straightened out; that the transfer of stock was made on books of bank, and that the bank failed on October 29, 1925; that the defendant had no knowledge that verified list of stockholders of bank which included his name had been filed with bank examiner twice each year, and that defendant had never received any part of dividends.

2. Banks and banking §48(2).

KNIGHT, J.

This action was brought by the receiver of an insolvent North Dakota state bank to recover the sum of $1,000 on a stockholder's liability created by the statute of that state. Judgment was given for the defendant, and plaintiff appeals. The determinative question presented relates to the legal effect of, and the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain, the trial court's finding that defendant was not at any time the owner of the stock.

Briefly stated, the essential facts are as follows: On January 16, 1919, while the defendant McLean was serving as an officer in the army in France, his brother-in-law, named Rother, who was president of said bank, placed ten shares of the bank's stock, for his own convenience, in McLean's name on the books of the bank. McLean knew nothing about the matter until October, 1924. At that time he was living in California, and he received a letter from Rother, stating what he had done, and adding that, if McLean would permit the balance of his account which he had been carrying with the bank to remain there, he (Rother) would continue to let the stock remain in McLean's name. McLean replied immediately, stating that he had established a permanent residence in California, that he wanted to use his money here, and that consequently he did not wish to accept the stock. Shortly afterwards Rother sent him a certificate representing the stock which he was asked to indorse in blank, so that the matter could be straightened out on the books of the bank. McLean indorsed the certificate as requested and returned it at once to Rother, the indorsement thereon bearing date of November 12, 1924. The transfer of the stock was made on the books of the bank accordingly. The bank failed October 29, 1925, and two months thereafter an assessment was levied on the stock. Under the North Dakota statute a stockholder's liability continues for one year after the transfer of the stock. After returning the indorsed certificate McLean heard nothing more about the matter until some time subsequent to the bank's failure and the levy of the assessment, at which time he was notified that he was expected to pay the assessment.

The evidence further shows that, as required by the statute of that state, the president and cashier of the bank filed with the bank examiner and auditor, twice each year, a verified list of the stockholders of the bank, which included McLean's name during the time the stock stood in his name on the books of the bank; also that in 1919 a dividend was declared, and that during the years 1920, 1921, and 1922, annual meetings of the stockholders were held, at which the stock in question was represented. But, admittedly, at no time did McLean have any knowledge of the filing of said lists, nor of the contents thereof; nor did he ever receive any part of the dividend; nor was he aware of the stockholders' meetings; nor does it appear from the record by whom or under what circumstances the stock was represented at said meetings.

[1] In view of the foregoing facts, we find no reason to disturb the judgment. As held in Schlitz v. Thomas, 61 Cal. App. 635, 216 P. 51, in cases such as this where ownership of stock is denied, the liability "is not based upon ownership, but upon estoppel to deny such ownership, and to establish it the elements of an estoppel must be shown." In the present case, as will be observed, there is no evidence whatever establishing, even inferentially, any element of estoppel.

[2] Appellant contends, however, that, even conceding that defendant never was the owner of the stock, his voluntary act in indorsing the certificate rendered him "just as liable to the creditors of said bank as if it were conclusively established that he was the owner of said stock * * *"; and as supporting such contention appellant relies mainly upon the case of O'Connor v. Witherby, 111 Cal. 529, 44 P. 227, 229, wherein it was held with reference to the peculiar facts of that case that the indorsement of the certificates of stock by the defendant therein was "conclusive proof, by his own admission, that he knew, or ought to have known, that they had been issued to him." But the facts of that case are far different from those of the present one, for there, as the decision plainly states, the party denying ownership of the stock certificates was a director and vice president of the bank, and attended the directors' meetings and gave advice as to the bank's business; and the court said, therefore, that under such circumstances he "certainly ought to have known his relation to it." As will be seen from an examination of the decision in that case, the court made no attempt to declare a broad inflexible rule to apply in all cases that the single act of indorsing a certificate of stock shall of itself constitute conclusive evidence of ownership. Indeed in that very case it was said: "Of course a man cannot be made liable to the creditors of a bank merely because, without his knowledge and under circumstances which did not put him on inquiry, someone had, without authority, caused some stock to be issued in his name." That is the situation here, and the evidence shows without dispute that, immediately upon learning that the stock was standing in his name, McLean adopted the only possible course open to him to clear the records of the bank by indorsing the certificate in blank and returning it to the president of the bank; and this was done more than eleven months before the bank failed and long prior to the levy of the assessment on the stock. Surely, under those circumstances, it cannot be fairly held that McLean was estopped from asserting the truth as to the ownership of the stock.

The judgment is affirmed.

Division 1, California.
Oct. 11, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 10, 1930.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court
Dec. 9, 1930.

1. Banks and banking ⇨145.
Bills and notes ⇨15.

Check is bill of exchange, and certification is equivalent to acceptance (Civ. Code, § 3265a).

2. Bills and notes ⇨338.

Presentation of check to drawee for payment is not "negotiation," and involves no warranties, since drawee is not "holder" or "holder in due course" (Civ. Code, §§ 3133, 3266).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Holder," "Holder in Due Course," and "Negotiate," see Words and Phrases.]

3. Bills and notes ⇨296.

Warranties of general indorser are based upon transfer of title, and run only to holders in due course (Civ. Code, § 3147).

4. Bills and notes ⇨440.

Drawee who paid instrument is not transferee of title, since last holder's indorsement does not transfer check, but converts it into voucher.

5. Bills and notes ⇨434.

Payment ⇨80.

Liability to refund rests upon quasi contractual duty to return money received under mistake, not upon warranty, and action therefor is not founded upon instrument drawee has paid.

6. Bills and notes ⇨434.

To establish obligation to reimburse, drawee who paid money on forged instrument their intent, purpose, and manifest tendency an interference with the orderly administration of justice in pending causes that they can be held to so far exceed the constitutional boundaries to freedom of speech and of the press as to constitute contempt of court.

5. Contempt $\S$ 28(1).

Fact that numerous utterances of influential minister commenting on proceedings in pending causes were truth would not be defense to contempt proceedings.

6. Contempt $\S$ 9.

Public utterances to constitute "contempt" need not have actually influenced actions of court or judge.

7. Contempt $\S$ 14.

Whatever manifestly tends to constitute interference with proper exercise of duties and functions of grand jury would constitute "contempt of court."

Grand jury is instrumentality of court, and as such is charged with quasi judicial inquisition into the conduct of citizens and of public institutions and officials, and must be as fully protected in exercise of its powers and functions in that regard as the courts themselves.

8. Contempt $\S$ 14.

Public utterances by influential minister in radio speeches regarding investigation of sheriff's office by grand jury held to constitute "contempt of court."

Substance of speech was to effect that there was understanding between grand jury and sheriff that grand jury would not proceed further with charges against sheriff. At time speeches were made grand jury was duly impaneled and acting as such and engaged in investigating criminal offenses and alleged misconduct on part of public officers committed within county.

9. Contempt $\S$ 72.

Several utterances by influential minister in radio speeches commenting on causes pending and undetermined before court and judges thereof held to each constitute separate offense.

Several broadcasted speeches occurred upon different dates and were delivered to different audiences and dealt in main with different phases of proceedings then pending in courts and before judicial officers against which broadcaster's animadversions were in each instance directed.

10. Contempt $\S$ 72.

Courts in contempt cases may impose consecutive sentences for separate contempts (Pen. Code, §§ 11, 669).

Original application by R. P. Shuler for a writ of habeas corpus prayed to be directed to William I. Traeger, as Sheriff of Los Angeles County, to secure release of petitioner from custody on commitment for contempt.

Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Thomas S. Bunn and Schweitzer & Hutton, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and S. V. O. Prichard, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Alexander Macdonald and Allen W. Ashburn, both of Los Angeles, for W. I. Traeger, sheriff.

RICHARDS, J.

The applicant herein applied for a writ of habeas corpus and was granted a hearing thereon upon his averment that he was imprisoned, detained, confined, and restrained of his liberty by William I. Traeger, sheriff of Los Angeles county at Los Angeles in said county, and that said imprisonment, detention, confinement, and restraint were and are illegal, the alleged illegality of which arises out of the existence of certain facts which are set forth in his aforesaid petition, and which may be stated as follows: On or about the 28th day of April, 1930, one L. Vaillancourt made and filed in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Los Angeles an accusation in the form of several affidavits, verified by said Vaillancourt, charging the applicant herein with having made a series of addresses to the public over and by means of a certain radio station, which addresses are set forth in hæc verba and seriatim in said affidavits, and upon the statements and substance contained therein it is alleged by the affiant they were intended and were calculated and were spoken and broadcasted by the petitioner for the purpose and with the intent that they should and would interfere with, influence, sway, and control the proceedings in a certain action numbered Criminal No. 35227 then pending in said court and in the department thereof presided over and conducted by Superior Judge Marshall F. McComb, and interfere with, sway, control, embarrass, and influence the action and decision of said Judge McComb, acting as said judge of the superior court in said cause, and of any other judge who might be called upon to take any action or make any ruling or decision therein, and also to interfere with, influence, sway, and intimidate any person or persons who might be called upon to act as jurors in said action, and also to bring into disrepute the said Judge McComb and the court over which he was at said time and in the conduct of said cause presiding, and expose him and it with respect to said action then pending to public disfavor, distrust, suspicion, ridicule, and opprobrium, and impute to said Judge McComb dishonest, corrupt, and unlawful motives, purposes, and actions in connection with his rulings and decisions of said action, and by so doing interfere with the orderly and due administration of justice in said court in respect to said action. Coincidentally with the filing of the aforesaid accusation and affidavits of said Vaillancourt, there were also filed and presented to said court certain further affidavits made and sworn to by one Walter S. Cox, setting forth certain further facts with respect to certain other utterances of the petitioner herein, also publicly broadcast over and by means of said radio broadcasting station, and having reference to certain other actions and proceedings pending in said court and before said Judge McComb and other certain judges of said court, and also having reference to pending proceedings of a grand jury then in session and functioning as a part of said court, and which statements and utterances of the petitioner, as set forth in detail therein, were also alleged to have had a like tendency and purpose to interfere with the orderly proceeding of said court and of said grand jury and the due administration of justice in said county.

Upon the filing and presentation of the foregoing accusation and affidavits before said superior court that tribunal on the 29th day of April 1930, issued its order and direction to R. P. Shuler, the petitioner herein, requiring him to show cause on May 8, 1930, in department 45 of said superior court, why he should not be adjudged guilty of contempt of said court. Said affidavits and order were duly served upon said Shuler upon said last-named date, and thereafter and prior to the aforesaid date of hearing thereon the said R. P. Shuler, appeared and filed in said court his verified answer to the aforesaid accusation and the affidavits filed in support thereof. A hearing upon said accusation and the answer thereto was thereupon, upon the request of said Shuler, advanced and set for hearing for May 2, 1930, at which time the matter was heard and evidence for and against the accusation and the answer thereto was duly received and said matter was thereupon submitted for decision to the court in department 45 thereof, Clair S. Tappaan, judge of said court then and there presiding in and over the aforesaid department thereof. Thereafter and on the 5th day of May, 1930, the judgment and commitment of said court and of the aforesaid judge thereof was given, made, and entered, adjudging that the petitioner herein by his aforesaid utterances, publishings, and broadcastings of the matters set forth in said affidavits, and each of them, had committed a contempt of said court and was thereby adjudged and declared to be in contempt of said court on account thereof, and should be punished therefor by such imprisonment and fines as were set forth and provided for in the aforesaid judgment and commitment, and that the terms of imprisonment set forth therein and designated as his punishment for the several and separate acts of contempt, as designated by the terms of said judgment, should run consecutively. Thereupon and upon the entry of the aforesaid judgment and commitment the petitioner was committed to the custody of the sheriff of Los Angeles for the execution thereof. Thereafter and pursuant thereto the petitioner was, as shown by his petition herein, imprisoned for the period of ten days immediately after the entry of said judgment, and in pursuance thereof, thereafter the petitioner having in the meantime offered to pay the portions of the several fines as specified in said judgment remaining due after such term of imprisonment, applied to this court for release upon habeas corpus upon the grounds hereinabove set forth. A writ of habeas corpus was thereupon issued out of this court and the petitioner was released upon bail pending the hearing thereon. Such hearing has been held, and the matters therein considered have been duly submitted to this court for decision. In order of such decision a more detailed statement of the facts and circumstances, as the same were presented to the superior court upon the aforesaid accusation and affidavits and the answer of the petitioner thereto, will be required. The facts about to be thus set forth, with sufficient of detail to form the basis of a correct conclusion thereon, are as follows:

On or about February 23, 1930, there was pending and undetermined in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Los Angeles, a criminal action numbered "Criminal No. 35227," in which the people of the state of California were plaintiffs and one Ben Getzoff and one Jacob Berman, alias Jack Bennett, were defendants, and in which action said defendants were accused by indictment of the crime of bribery. The acts of bribery in which said defendants were implicated directly involved one Asa Keyes and one Harold L. Davis, the former having been at the time of the occurrence of said acts of bribery district attorney of the county of Los Angeles, and the latter having been chief deputy district attorney under said Keyes. The accusation presented against said two officials arose out of and was directly connected with two other cerwas in existence and that Andrew H. Manning at the time of acceptance was not suffering any legal disability which would affect his ability to pass title to the instrument accepted by means of indorsement. According to the plain language of this section appellee by its general acceptance bound itself to pay a draft for $629.80, payable to the order of Andrew H. Manning. After the draft was accepted by appellee the drawer was discharged from liability thereon. When appellant took the draft it was complete and regular upon its face. It had been duly accepted by the drawee. It was taken in good faith and for value, and appellant then had no notice of any infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating it, and appellant was therefore a holder in due course. It relied upon the general acceptance of appellee, and under the Negotiable Instruments Law was protected by it. This construction of section 62 is in accordance with that sound principle which declares that where one of two innocent parties must suffer a loss the law will leave the loss where it finds it."

The common-law rule had been previously followed in First National Bank, etc., v. Northwestern National Bank, etc., 152 Ill. 296, 38 N. E. 739, 26 L. R. A. 289, 43 Am. St. Rep. 247, and Metropolitan National Bank, etc., v. Merchants' National Bank, etc., 182 Ill. 367, 55 N. E. 360, 74 Am. St. Rep. 180, which were decided previous to the adoption of the Negotiable Instruments Law. In State Bank, etc., v. Mid-City Trust etc., Bank, 295 Ill. 599, 129 N. E. 498, 12 A. L. R. 989, decided after the adoption of the law, the payee's name was forged as an indorsement upon a check after its certification, and the same was paid by the acceptor to the indorsee. The acceptor sought to recover upon the theory that it was liable to the real payee for the amount of the check. It was held that the check had never been delivered to the real payee and had never come into his possession, and that he had acquired no right by reason of the acceptance. Dean Ames contended before the Negotiable Instruments Law was adopted that upon principle an alteration before acceptance of any of the terms of a genuine bill should not affect the liability of the acceptor to an innocent holder. 4 Harvard Law Review, p. 297. The editors of the American Law Reports Annotated, vol. 22, p. 1162, express the view that the conclusion reached in the Illinois case is more in accord with the language of the Negotiable Instruments Law than the other cases cited, and, as said by Prof. Brannan in his work on the Negotiable Instruments Law (4th Ed.) at page 567: "It is difficult to see how he (the acceptor) can escape liability if any meaning is to be given to the words 'engages that he will pay according to the tenor of his acceptance.' The tenor of the acceptance is determined by the terms of the bill as it is when the drawee accepts and that is a bill for the raised amount. That is the bill he accepted and no other, and according to its tenor he has engaged that he will pay it." And where, as in the present case, an indorsee without notice has given value upon the faith of a certification and the instrument has been paid by the drawee, the result reached in the Illinois case not only makes for the usefulness and currency of negotiable paper, but, as held in that decision, is in accord with the principle that, where the parties are equally innocent, the law will leave the loss where they have placed it.

Appellant cites numerous decisions holding that money paid by the acceptor of a check upon the forged indorsement of the payee named therein can be recovered. Wellington National Bank v. Robbins, 71 Kan. 748, 81 P. 487, 114 Am. St. Rep. 523; Andrews v. Sibley, 220 Mass. 10, 107 N. E. 395; National Union Fire Ins. Co. v. Mellon National Bank, 276 Pa. 212, 119 A. 910; Union Tool Co. v. Farmers', etc., Bank of Los Angeles, 192 Cal. 40, 218 P. 424, 28 A. L. R. 1417; American Exchange, etc., Bank v. Yorkville Bank, etc., 122 Misc. Rep. 616, 204 N. Y. S. 621; Missouri, etc., Trust Co. v. St. Louis National Bank, 154 Mo. App. 89, 133 S. W. 357; Gasper v. Security State Bank, 109 Neb. 495, 191 N. W. 654; American Express Co. v. Peoples' Savings Bank, 192 Iowa, 366, 181 N. W. 701; Charleston, etc., Co. v. Exchange, etc., Co., 129 S. C. 290, 123 S. E. 830. The same rule applies to checks altered as to the amount or the name of the payee after certification. Ozark Savings Bank v. Bank of Bradleyville (Mo. App.) 204 S. W. 570; National Bank v. National Mechanics' Bank, 55 N. Y. 211, 14 Am. Rep. 232; Rapp v. National Security Bank, 136 Pa. 426, 20 A. 508. National Union Fire Ins. Co. v. Mellon National Bank, supra, is also cited in support of appellant's contention that the acceptor does not, by his acceptance, admit the genuineness of the body of the draft. This action was by the insurance company against the bank to recover the amount paid by the latter and charged to the former's account on drafts on which the payees' indorsements were forged. The drafts were drawn on the insurance company by its agents, and were payable to policy holders for supposed fire losses. The drafts came into the possession of an employee of the agent, who forged the names of the payees upon the back thereof, deposited the same in defendant bank, which forwarded them to the insurance company for acceptance. They were accepted without investigation as to the genuineness of the payees' signatures, were paid by the bank, and the amounts charged to plaintiff's account. A judgment for plaintiff was affirmed on appeal; it being held that by acceptance the plaintiff did not admit the genuineness of the signatures of the payees. This was the question decided, and the case is not authority for the claim that an acceptance is not an admission of the genuineness of the body of the draft. In many of the cases cited by appellant a recovery was allowed upon the theory that the party to whom the drawee paid the check, having indorsed the same, thereby warranted the genuineness of prior indorsements. But, as has been pointed out (Brannan, The Negotiable Instruments Law [4th Ed.] p. 618), the presentation of a check to a drawee for payment is not a negotiation and involves no warranties, as the drawee is not a holder in due course under section 52 of the Negotiable Instruments Law (Cal. Civ. Code, § 3133), nor a holder as defined in section 191 thereof (Cal. Civ. Code, § 3266). And, as held in the following cases, the warranties of a general indorser as provided by section 66 of that law (Cal. Civ. Code, § 3147) are based upon a transfer of title, and run only to holders in due course; consequently a drawee who has paid the instrument is not a transferee of title as the last holder's indorsement does not transfer the check, but converts what was a check into a voucher. South Boston Trust Co. v. Levin, 249 Mass. 45, 143 N. E. 816, 817; National Bank, etc., v. First National Bank etc., 141 Mo. App. 719, 125 S. W. 513; Woodward v. Savings & Trust Co., 178 N. C. 184, 100 S. E. 304, 5 A. L. R. 1561; Bank of Commerce v. Seattle National Bank, 109 Wash. 312, 187 P. 342; American Hominy Co. v. Millikin National Bank (D. C.) 273 F. 550; Figuers v. Fly, 137 Tenn. 358, 193 S. W. 117. The liability to refund rests upon the quasi contractual duty to return money received under mistake and not upon warranty, nor is an action therefor founded upon the instrument which the drawee has paid. Bank of Commerce v. Union Bank, 3 N. Y. 230; Redington v. Woods, 45 Cal. 406, 429, 13 Am. Rep. 190; Brannan, The Negotiable Instruments Law (4th Ed.) p. 619. The same rules apply to the claim against defendant Popkin. In order to establish any obligation on his part to reimburse the plaintiff, it would be necessary to allege and prove that he received a benefit from the plaintiff (Woodward, Quasi Contracts, § 7, p. 9; Keener, Quasi Contracts, p. 24), and the testimony shows that any benefit he derived from the transaction was received either from his co-defendant or from Behling.

[8, 9] We think the construction placed upon the section by the Illinois court is correct, and that it was not the legislative intent that the obligation of the acceptor should be limited to the tenor of the instrument as drawn by the maker, as was the rule at common law, but that it should be enforceable in favor of a holder in due course against the acceptor according to its tenor at the time of its acceptance or certification.

The judgment is affirmed.

Application by Herbert W. Livingston for writ of habeas corpus to secure custody of Dean Livingston, a minor, from Lois Livingston.

Writ granted.

Joe Crider, Jr., and Clarence B. Runkle, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

William F. Adams, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

This is an application by Herbert W. Livingston, the father of Dean Livingston, a minor, for a writ of habeas corpus. The petitioner and Lois Livingston intermarried in September, 1918, and there was born to them during the year 1919 the son, Dean Livingston. On August 28, 1925, Lois Livingston commenced an action in the state of Wisconsin against petitioner for a divorce. She was granted a decree, on June 30, 1926, and upon stipulation of the parties the court awarded the custody of Dean Livingston, then of the age of about 7 years, to the mother, "subject to the supervision of the court," and with right granted to the petitioner to have the child with him each Sunday of the year with the exception of four to be designated by the mother, and excepting also that defendant was given the custody of the child during the school vacation occurring during the holiday period each alternate year commencing with the year 1926 and each Easter school vacation in alternate years commencing in 1927, and for two weeks during the summer school vacation of every year. The decree provided further that neither parent was to take or permit any one to take the child beyond the jurisdiction of the court without permission of the court, to be granted only after notice to the other party. On December 4, 1928, Lois Livingston removed from Wisconsin to Los Angeles, Cal., bringing the boy with her, in direct violation of the order of the court and without its consent or the consent of petitioner. On June 5, 1929, the circuit court of the county of La Crosse, Wis., issued its order to the respondent, Lois Livingston, commanding her to appear and show cause why the decree of June 30, 1926, should not be modified by giving to the petitioner herein the sole and exclusive custody of his son, and commanding her further to produce and have the child in court at the time of the hearing on June 25, 1929. This order was personally served upon respondent in the county of Los Angeles, and in response thereto she appeared by counsel, first, specially for the purpose of objecting to the jurisdiction of the court and then generally. She did not produce the child in court, but announced through her counsel that she had no intention of returning to Wisconsin or producing her son in court. Whereupon the court made its order modifying the decree theretofore rendered and giving to the petitioner here the sole and exclusive custody and control of the child. It is this order which furnishes the basis for the contention here, as it did in the superior court of Los Angeles county, where a former proceeding in habeas corpus was had resulting in the dismissal of the writ. No testimony was taken in the last-named court concerning any change of circumstances since the decree, the matter having been submitted upon exemplified copies of the proceedings in the Wisconsin court; nor is such a contention advanced here, the respondent very properly taking the position that such "should be determined only in a regular action where the facts can be produced fully before the court in the regular way."

[1] It is first asserted by the respondent that the discharge of the writ by the superior court is binding upon the petitioner here and renders the matter res judicata. We are in thorough accord with the authorities upon which she relies, to wit, In re Gille, 65 Cal. App. 617, 224 P. 784, In re Bees (Cal. App.) 280 P. 1033, and In re Gury (Cal. App.) 284 P. 944; but those cases only decide that a final adjudication on a writ of habeas corpus brought for the purpose of determining the right of private parties to the custody of a minor child is conclusive of the identical facts therein involved. Those authorities do not hold that the determination by the superior court of a pure question of law could be binding upon an appellate tribunal. The argument amounts to this, and its absurdity is apparent: That because the superior court decided that the decree of the Wisconsin court was, even in the absence of evidence of changed circumstances, not of any force or effect outside the jurisdiction of Wisconsin, we are bound thereby. The same contention was raised in Re Marshall, 100 Cal. App. 284, 279 P. 834, 836, and dismissed with this language: "However, as no change is shown to have taken place in petitioner's condition or moral fitness since the date of the order and judgment of the Arizona court, and no change in petitioner's condition or moral fitness since such date was shown at the hearing in the superior court of San Mateo county, nor passed upon by that court, the decision of the Arizona court is res adjudicata, and is controlling until such change in appellant's condition is shown."

[2] The quotation just set forth not only answers the argument in the particular already mentioned, but also indicates the rule generally prevailing that a decree of a court of one state, having jurisdiction, relating to the custody of minor children is under the doctrine of comity prevailing among sister states and, subject of course to the right of the parties to show a change in the circumstances or conditions, entitled to recognition in another state. In re Wenman, 33 Cal. App. 594, 165 P. 1024; In re Marshall, supra; State v. District Court, 46 Mont. 425, 128 P. 590, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 256. Particular reference is made to a case note appearing in 20 A. L. R. at page 815, where the authorities are collected, and where the following statement is found: "With some variation of statement, and an occasional intimation to the contrary, it is established by the great weight of authority that in the absence of fraud or want of jurisdiction, affecting its validity, a decree of divorce awarding the custody of a child of the marriage must be given full force and effect in other states as to the right to the custody of the child at the time and under the circumstances of its rendition; but that such a decree has no controlling effect in another state as to facts and conditions arising subsequently to the date of the decree; and the courts of the latter state may, in proper proceedings, award the custody otherwise upon proof of matters subsequent to the decree which justify the change in the interest of the child." (Italics ours.)

[3] The Wisconsin court undoubtedly had jurisdiction of the parties to this proceeding. The petitioner submitted thereto by seeking the modification of the original decree and the respondent by entering a general appearance.

[4] It is ordered that the respondent, Lois Livingston, forthwith deliver to the petitioner the minor child of petitioner and respondent.

BETHURUM v. KRUMM.

Civ. 127.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,

1. Appeal and error ⇨110.

Appeal does not lie from an order denying motion for new trial (Code Civ. Proc. § 963).

2. Appeal and error ⇨989.

Appellate court, in determining whether evidence was sufficient to support judgment, need only consider evidence most favorable to prevailing party.

3. Assault and battery ⇨35.

Evidence held to support verdict for plaintiff in action for damages resulting from alleged assault and battery (Pen. Code, §§ 240, 242).

"Assault" is defined by Pen. Code, § 240, as unlawful attempt, coupled with present ability, to commit violent injury on person of another, while "battery" is defined by section 242 as any willful and unlawful use of force or violence on person of another.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1002.

Finding of jury on weight of evidence in case of conflict is conclusive on appellate court.

5. Assault and battery ⇨38.

Mental anguish, following injury, is element of damage to be considered in fixing amount thereof.

MARKS, Acting P. J.

[1] This is an action for damages resulting from an alleged assault and battery upon the person of the respondent by the appellant. The record shows that on the 5th day of September, 1928, the parties hereto had an argument in the council chambers of the board of trustees of the city of Redlands. They afterward met in a public market in the city of Redlands, and an altercation followed which resulted in an affray and this action for damages. A trial was had before a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of respondent in the sum of $400. Appellant made a motion for a new trial, which was denied. He then appealed from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. Since the amendment of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure in 1915, an appeal does not lie from an order denying a motion for new trial.

[2] Appellant relies upon two grounds for a reversal of the judgment. He maintains that the evidence was not sufficient to support the judgment, and complains of two instructions given by the court. Under his first contention there is presented a very usual state of facts, in that the evidence for the two parties is directly conflicting. In deciding this point, we need only consider the evidence most favorable to the prevailing party, and, if it supports the judgment, we are bound thereby.

[3] The evidence in this case most favorable to respondent shows that, when he and the appellant met in the public market in the city of Redlands, appellant seized respondent by the arm and commenced pulling him toward the front of the building; that respondent hung back, and appellant thereupon picked him up bodily from the floor, threw him across his hip, and started to carry him from the building. Following this blows were struck by both parties without very serious injuries or damages to either one.

An assault is defined by section 240 of the Penal Code as follows: "An assault is an unlawful attempt, coupled with a present ability, to commit a violent injury on the person of another."

A battery is defined by section 242 of the Penal Code as follows: "A battery is any willful and unlawful use of force or violence upon the person of another."

[4] The evidence in this case most favorable to respondent amply supports the verdict of the jury under the definitions of an assault and a battery, which we have just given. The fact that the evidence for appellant would have sustained a verdict in his favor merely creates a conflict which the jury resolved against him. Under this state of facts the findings of the jury on the weight of the evidence is conclusive on this court.

[5] The first instruction complained of by appellant is one in which the court instructed the jury in effect that, in an action for assault and battery, the insult and indignity inflicted upon a person by striking him a blow in anger, rudeness, or insolence constitute an element of damage in connection with the mental suffering, if any, arising therefrom. This is but another way of informing the jury that mental anguish, following an injury, is an element of damage which may be considered in fixing the amount thereof. This principle of law has been recognized in many cases in this state. Easton v. United Trades School Contracting Co., 173 Cal. 199, 159 P. 597, L. R. A. 1917A, 394; Merrill v. Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co., 158 Cal. 499, 512, 111 P. 534, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 559, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134.

[6] In the second instruction complained of by appellant the court instructed the jury, in effect, that, where a defendant interposes a defense of self-defense in an assault or battery case, it is an affirmative defense, the burden of proving which, from all the evidence in the case, rests upon the defendant. This principle of law has been approved in Marriott v. Williams, 152 Cal. 705, 93 P. 875, 125 Am. St. Rep. 87. Appellant not only pleaded self-defense, but relied upon it as a defense at the trial, and the court correctly instructed the jury in this regard.

We have examined all of the instructions given by the court, and believe that the jury was fairly and fully instructed upon all the law necessarily involved in the case.

Judgment affirmed.

LOS ANGELES—FIRST NAT. TRUST & SAVINGS BANK v. HOWLAND et al.

Civ. 6103.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

Oct. 6, 1930.

1. Pleading ⇨121(4).

Defendant may not by denial on lack of information or belief of fact ascertainable from public record raise issue.

2. Pleading ⇨121(4).

Denial on information and belief of allegation in complaint in respect to alleged consolidation of banks raised issue as respected right to judgment on pleadings (St. 1927, p. 1796, § 31d).

Although under St. 1927, p. 1796, § 31d, recordation of certificate of consolidation is constructive notice of all of the rights, benefits, privileges, duties, and obligations of whatsoever kind or nature held or possessed by or imposed on the bank so converted or consolidated or merged are retained by and imposed on successor bank, recordation is not therein made compulsory, but is merely a privilege or right, so that evidence of the fact of alleged consolidation of banks was not legally required to be of public record whereby it could be readily ascertained by inspection of record.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon R. Yankwich, Judge.

Action by the Los Angeles-First National Trust & Savings Bank against Percy H. Howland and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Reversed, with directions.

M. W. Conkling, of San Diego, for appellants.

William L. Kuehn and Arthur Loveland, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J.

The cause of action herein was based upon the nonpayment of a promissory note executed by the defendants in favor of the Pacific-Southwest Trust & Savings Bank, which bank was the alleged predecessor in interest of the plaintiff. In addition to the usual allegations in actions of this character—that is, of execution, delivery, and nonpayment of the note—the complaint contained the allegation: That, at the time of execution and delivery of the said note, the predecessor in interest of the plaintiff was a corporation which “by proceedings duly and regularly had and taken has been consolidated with plaintiff under the charter and corporate title of plaintiff. That said consolidation was approved by the Comptroller of the Currency and became effective at the close of business September 1, 1927. That by virtue of said consolidation plaintiff became and now is the holder of said promissory note.”

Based solely on the allegation that the defendants “had no information or belief” of the alleged consolidation of the two banks, mentioned in the complaint, as well as of plaintiff’s alleged ownership of said note, the answer of defendants was limited to a denial of those facts.

On motion presented to the trial court for judgment on the pleadings, judgment was ordered in favor of the plaintiff; and the defendants appeal therefrom.

Appellants now contend that their answer raised an issue of a material fact and consequently that the judgment of the trial court should be reversed.

[1] By a long line of decisions by the courts of this state, the rule is settled that, where the determination of the existence of a material fact alleged in the complaint is readily ascertainable by the defendant from an inspection by him of a public record, he may not, by denial of such fact based on his lack of information or belief, raise an issue as to such allegation. 21 Cal. Jur. 150, and authorities there cited.

[2] The complaint herein contained no allegation to the effect that any instrument purporting to evidence the consolidation of the two interested banks was ever either filed or recorded in any place whatsoever. Nor has attention been directed by respondent herein either to any mandatory or any directory provision of law by which it became or was the duty of either of the contracting parties to such merger or consolidation, their successor, or any other person, to file or to record any such instrument. The most that appears from any statute or authority cited by either of the parties litigant herein is a provision contained in section 31d of the Statutes of 1927, pp. 1789, 1796, by which “the recordation of such certificate [of consolidation] in the office of the recorder of any county shall be * * * constructive notice that all of the rights, benefits, privileges, duties and obligations of whatsoever kind or nature held or possessed by or imposed upon the bank so converted or consolidated or merged are retained by and imposed upon the successor bank. Any such certificate shall be prima facie evidence in all courts and places of the regularity of the proceedings taken and of the fact of such conversion or consolidation or merger.”

But nowhere, either in the cited statute or in any other to which the attention of this court has been attracted, is such recordation made compulsory. Apparently no duty or obligation is made to rest upon any person either to file or to record in any public office any instrument from which constructive notice of the consolidation of banks of the character of those here involved either will or may result. The act of recordation of the certificate of consolidation is but permissive; it may or may not be done, dependent upon no statutory demand or requirement. By the terms of the statute, the recordation of the certificate of consolidation is merely a privilege or right, of which some unnamed and unspecified person or corporation may avail himself or itself, and from which recordation, when accomplished, certain specified advantages may accrue. It follows that, since evidence of the fact of the alleged consolidation of the two banks mentioned in the complaint herein was not legally required to be of public record, the defendants were within their rights in denying the existence of such fact based upon their alleged lack of information and belief.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the lower court to deny the motion presented by the plaintiff for judgment on the pleadings in the action.

SCOTT v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY.

Civ. 7274.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Oct. 6, 1930.

Courts ⇨472(6).

Superior Court's jurisdiction held exclusive in suits foreclosing mechanic's liens for less than $2,000 on property within county outside municipal court's jurisdiction (Deering's Gen. Laws 1925-1927, Act 5238, § 29; Const. art. 6, § 13, and art. 6, § 5, as amended in 1928).

Const. art. 6, § 5, as amended in 1928, provides that superior courts shall have original jurisdiction in all civil cases, except where jurisdiction is given to municipal or other courts. Deering's Gen. Laws 1925-1927, Act 5238, § 29, gave municipal courts exclusive jurisdiction in cases arising within city where demand was $1,000 or less, and concurrent jurisdiction with superior court in cases arising within county but outside city, in which demand was likewise $1,000 or less. Pursuant to Const. art. 6, § 13, jurisdiction of municipal courts was later increased to $2,000 (Deering's Gen. Laws Supp. 1929, Act 5238, § 29).

Petition by O. N. Scott for writ of prohibition to restrain the Superior Court in and for the County of Los Angeles from hearing and determining certain actions pending therein.

Petition denied.

Charles S. McKelvey, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Morin, Newell, Brown & Hamill, of Pasadena, for respondent.

CRAIG, J.

The petitioner is a party to five certain actions pending in the superior court of Los Angeles County, entitled, respectively, Oak Knoll Tile Shop v. J. S. Atkins et al.; C. A. Schoch v. J. S. Atkins et al.; Pasadena Ornamental Iron Works v. J. S. Atkins et al.; O. S. Purdy v. Marian Scott et al.; and Arthur I. Knox v. Marian Scott et al. It is alleged that each suit is instituted for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien, and that the amount demanded therein is less than $2,000. The petitioner prays for a writ of prohibition restraining the superior court from proceeding to hear and determine the issues, for the reason that the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles is invested with exclusive jurisdiction thereof.

The property sought to be charged with liens is situated in the county of Los Angeles, but within the city of Pasadena, and outside the immediate exclusive jurisdiction of the municipal court. Section 5, article 6, of the Constitution, as amended by ratification of the people on November 6, 1928, provides in part that: "The superior courts shall have original jurisdiction in all civil cases and proceedings (except as in this article otherwise provided, and except, also cases and proceedings in which jurisdiction is or shall be given by law to municipal or to justices in other inferior courts). * * *" Section 29 of the original act, defining the jurisdiction of municipal courts (Deering's Gen. Laws 1925-1927, p. 1607, Act 5238), provided that they should have exclusive original jurisdiction in all cases at law in which the demand, exclusive of interest, amounted to $1,000 or less, arising within the limits of the city, and jurisdiction concurrent with the superior court in actions for $1,000 or less, arising outside of the city limits, but within the county. Thereafter, by section 13, article 6, of the Constitution, the Legislature was empowered to fix the jurisdiction of municipal courts, and pursuant thereto such jurisdiction was so fixed at $2,000 (Deering's Gen. Laws Supp. 1929, Act 5238, § 29), upon the same conditions as to territorial limitations. From this it follows that the superior court was given original jurisdiction in demands for amounts exceeding $300, but less than $2,000, which would arise outside the limits of the city having a municipal court and within the territorial jurisdiction of the superior court. Johnston v. Wolf (Cal. Sup.) 280 P. 980.

From the foregoing it is apparent that the superior court has exclusive jurisdiction of the suits in controversy.

The petition for writ of prohibition is denied.

SHENK, J.

This action was brought by the plaintiff as trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of J. C. Rice, a bankrupt, to have it adjudged that certain property described in the complaint belongs to the plaintiff as trustee for the creditors of the bankrupt, and for an accounting. The court found in favor of the plaintiff and enjoined the defendants from asserting any claim or interest in and to the property in controversy. The defendants J. C. Rice Company and M. Y. Wolf are the appealing defendants.

[1] The court found that certain property, title to which stood in the name of J. C. Rice Company, was the property of the bankrupt, and that the title to 247 shares of stock in the J. C. Rice Company, although standing in the name of the defendant Wolf, was the property of the bankrupt, and that Wolf held title to the same in trust for the plaintiff. These findings are attacked as unsupported by the evidence. The evidence shows that J. C. Rice was engaged in numerous promotional enterprises in real estate and other property; that he did business through the medium of corporations which he organized, owned, and controlled, among which was the J. C. Rice Company. The court found that the J. C. Rice Company was merely the alter ego of J. C. Rice, and the evidence is amply sufficient to support that finding. The evidence also disclosed that on November 21, ISAACSON v. UNION TRUST CO. OF SAN DIEGO et al.

L. A. 9525.

Supreme Court of California,
Oct. 15, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 13, 1930.

1. Bankruptcy $\S$ 303(5).

Evidence sustained finding that property standing in name of certain defendants be-

1918, and at a time when Rice was insolvent, he was the owner of all of the stock of the J. C. Rice Company, consisting of 250 shares, excepting 3 thereof issued to qualify directors; that his creditors were numerous and insistent upon payment; that on November 21, 1918, he pledged to the defendant Wolf 247 shares of said stock as security for the payment of a promissory note executed by Rice to Wolf in the sum of $21,458.79, due five years after date, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum payable at maturity; that the amount of the note represented an antecedent indebtedness from Rice to Wolf, with interest accrued over a considerable period of time; that in addition to 247 shares of stock the bankrupt pledged to Wolf other property and securities constituting in the main the entire assets of Rice which were estimated to be of the value of $75,000; that under pledgee's sale, which took place on the 9th day of September, 1919, Wolf sold the 247 shares of stock and took the title in his own name. The court found that the pledge of the stock was a bona fide transaction, made for a valuable consideration, but that the pledgee's sale "was made with the secret understanding and agreement between said J. C. Rice and said M. Y. Wolf that said M. Y. Wolf would hold said stock in trust for said J. C. Rice, and that said M. Y. Wolf does now hold said stock in trust for said plaintiff as trustee in bankruptcy of said J. C. Rice and that the claim of said M. Y. Wolf to said stock of J. C. Rice Company is without any right whatever as against the plaintiff"; that the "sale of said stock of said J. C. Rice Company by said M. Y. Wolf was made by said M. Y. Wolf with the intent to aid and assist said J. C. Rice to conceal his assets from his creditors * * * that said pretended sale of said stock to said M. Y. Wolf was made with the intent to delay, hinder and defraud the creditors of said J. C. Rice and the creditors of said J. C. Rice were thereby hindered, delayed and defrauded and prevented from collecting their claims against said J. C. Rice."

[2] There is sufficient evidence to support the foregoing findings. The note had more than four years to run before its maturity. The due date was attempted to be accelerated by a call for further security, although the agreed value of securities pledged was $75,-

000. The sale was deceptive in that it was noticed for and took place on a legal holiday. From the date of sale to the 16th day of February, 1925—the day before he filed his petition in bankruptcy—Rice continued to be the control of the J. C. Rice Company. Wolf paid no attention to the multifarious transactions in which it engaged. The evidence as a whole supports the conclusion that Wolf was in league with Rice to defeat the rights of the latter's creditors. The sale was not free from fraud, as appeared in Pierce v. Pierce, 16 Cal. App. 375, 117 P. 580, a case strongly relied upon by the appellants. Although the original note transaction was found to be in good faith, the circumstances surrounding the sale were sufficient to avoid it under the rule stated in 20 Cyc., at page 401, as follows: "A collusive and fraudulent sale under a foreclosure of a mortgage or deed of trust on real or personal property either under a power therein or by legal proceedings, will be set aside at the suit of the creditors of the mortgagor or grantor." The text is supported by the authorities cited in the footnote, one of which is James v. Railroad Co., 6 Wall. (73 U. S.) 752, 18 L. Ed. 885, where the sale under the terms of a valid mortgage given to secure the payment of bonds was set aside on the ground of fraud.

An affirmance of the judgment will leave Wolf still as pledgee of the 247 shares of stock of the J. C. Rice Company, with the assets of that corporation in the hands of the plaintiff for the benefit of creditors. It may be said that the stock so held by Wolf is now worthless, but this result is not inequitable under all of the evidence, which shows also that during the time that Wolf was holding the legal title to said stock and before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy he withdrew from J. C. Rice Company the sum of $18,000, which more than equaled the original indebtedness of Rice to Wolf, together with a substantial allowance for interest thereon. If, perchance, Wolf has any further claim against Rice, his place would seem to be as a general creditor in the bankruptcy court.

The judgment is affirmed.

CARPENTER v. STATE BAR OF CALIFORNIA.S. F. 13854.

Supreme Court of California.

Oct. 23, 1930.

1. Attorney and client ☞38.

Evidence that attorney made settlement agreement with adverse party without consent of her counsel, and without informing her that her case had been affirmed, justified suspension (St. 1927, p. 38, §§ 25, 29; Code Civ. Proc. § 287, subd. 2).

The evidence disclosed that attorney complained against knew that decision of court had been rendered affirming order requiring his client as husband to pay his wife for support of children and that without informing wife of her rights or ascertaining whether she had received notice of such affirmation, attorney proceeded to draft in his office an agreement between parties, without notification to or presence of wife's attorney, and told her that it was not necessary to notify her attorney or have him present or that matter be taken up in court.

2. Attorney and client ☞76(4).

Affirmance on appeal did not terminate relationship of attorney and client as regards attorney's communication with adverse party without consent of such party's counsel (St. 1927, p. 38, §§ 25, 29; Code Civ. Proc. § 287, subd. 2).

Application by A. H. Carpenter to review a recommendation of the Board of Governors of the State Bar of California for the suspension of applicant as an attorney.

Order affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for petitioner.

Max Thelen, of San Francisco (Thelen & Marrin, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The above-entitled proceeding has for its object the discipline of A. H. Carpenter, an attorney at law of Stockton, Cal., and a member of the incorporated State Bar.

The charges are made in proper form and in essence are that said attorney is guilty of an infraction of No. 12 of the Rules of Professional Conduct approved by this court, in that he communicated with a party represented by counsel on the subject of controversy in the absence of and without the consent of such counsel. The basis for this charge will be found in the following statement:

In 1912 Henry R. Howe brought suit and obtained a decree of divorce from his wife, Clara Howe; minor children, the issue of such marriage, were not provided for in said decree. On October 4, 1927, some fifteen years later, after due proceedings to that end had, the judge of the San Joaquin county superior court made and filed an order in said cause requiring the husband to pay to the wife for the support and maintenance of the two children $40 per month until the further order of the court, the first payment to be made on October 1, 1927, and monthly thereafter. The husband, through his attorney, appealed to this court from said order.

The wife, who had later married a man by the name of De Costa, was first represented by the firm of Stahlman & Bennett and later by Sydney C. Bennett, the latter's connection with the matter being known to petitioner, the husband's attorney. Under said order the amount due Mrs. De Costa as of December 1, 1928, was $600. During the pendency of the husband's appeal he sought at various times to induce her to agree to some settlement, often telling her that she could not win the case on appeal anyway. He also made efforts to induce his son to talk to her and to influence her to make a settlement. It appears, however, that on December 20, 1928, the order appealed from was affirmed by this court. Howe v. Howe, 206 Cal. 1, 272 P. 751. It became final and remittitur issued on January 21, 1929.

There is satisfactory evidence that the attorneys for the respective parties received notice of the order of affirmance on or about December 21st and prior to December 24, 1928. On the latter date, however, Mr. Bennett, acting as attorney for Mrs. De Costa, had still been unable to communicate to her the fact that the order had been affirmed. On the morning of December 24th Mr. Howe telephoned his former wife and asked her to come to the office of this petitioner, A. H. Carpenter, to fix up a settlement. A previous offer of $300 had apparently been discussed and agreed upon between the parties, with no evidence that petitioner had any knowledge thereof. Mrs. De Costa called at petitioner's office with her son, and while there, without disclosing to her in any way the affirmance of said order, petitioner prepared an agreement waiving the respective rights of the parties as husband and wife and mentioning as a consideration a promissory note of $300. The testimony does not show that petitioner advised or participated in the negotiations for a settlement. It does show, however, that Mrs. De Costa asked petitioner if it would be necessary for her attorney to be present, to which he replied: "No, he does not need to be here at all, because we can fix the papers here." This proceeding was followed by the giving of a promissory note without interest, due in sixty days, although Mrs. De Costa believed it to be a thirty-day note.

Later, Mr. Bennett saw his client and was informed of what had been done and as a result of such information the present proceeding was begun on January 1, 1929. Notice to answer complaint was served on petitioner on April 2, 1929, and his answer was made on April 11, 1929. The local administrative committee, which had the matter in charge, noticed it for hearing on May 6, 1929. Petitioner filed with said committee on April 27, 1929, a defamatory, if not scurrilous, communication directed at Mrs. De Costa and her attorney and also charging the local administrative committee with prejudice, bias, and hostility, and further alleging that if petitioner's objection should be disregarded, he demanded that the hearing be an open one and that he be confronted with the witnesses against him and that a court reporter be present. The secretary of the committee responded, offering to show petitioner every courtesy and to have a court reporter present if desired, and enclosed a copy of a subpoena for his use in procuring witnesses who would testify in his behalf. The hearing was nevertheless thereafter held at 8 o'clock on the evening of May 6, 1929, petitioner failing to appear. The evidence adduced showed the facts to be in substance as above stated.

The committee of five, only four of whom acted, were unable to agree upon a recommendation in the matter, and the whole proceeding was transmitted without recommendation to the Board of Bar Governors. Upon consideration of the evidence, said board, by eleven affirmative votes, concluded that petitioner ought to be suspended for the period of three months and a recommendation to that effect was made to this court.

[1] We have given careful consideration to all the evidence in this case and have reached the conclusion that the recommendation of the Board of Governors of the State Bar is fully justified and that it should be adopted by this court. It appears without substantial conflict that petitioner knew that the decision of the court had been rendered affirming said order; he also knew that Mr. Bennett was the attorney for Mrs. De Costa. Without so much as informing her of her rights or ascertaining whether she had received notice of said affirmance, he proceeded to draft in his office the agreement between the parties, without notification to or presence of her said attorney. Mrs. De Costa, in the presence of her son, was told that it was not necessary to notify the attorney or to have him present or that the matter be taken up in court. This conduct cannot be harmonized with the ethics of the profession (State Bar Act [St. 1927, p.

38] §§ 25, 29), nor with the letter or spirit of subdivision 2 of section 287 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[2] The statement that the affirmance of the order terminated the relationship of attorney and client between Mr. Bennett and Mrs. De Costa is entirely without merit. Furthermore, the order of affirmance had not become final as the time for rehearing had not passed and the matter was still pending in every sense of the word. All the other points urged by petitioner herein have been disposed of in previous decisions of this court and time need not be consumed in discussion of them.

It is ordered that the action and recommendation of the Board of Governors in this matter be and it is hereby approved, and that petitioner herein, A. H. Carpenter, be and he is hereby suspended from the practice of law in this state for the period of three months from and after the date of filing of this order.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by Enrico Martinelli against Joseph Poley and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, the named defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Myrick & Deering and Scott, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edmund J. Holl, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CURTIS, J.

The plaintiff in this action was injured in a collision between a passenger automobile, in which he was riding as a guest of the appellant, and an autotruck, driven by W. Barlow and owned by William McDermott. The collision occurred at the intersection of B and Third streets in the town of Davis, Yolo county, in this state. B street runs north and south, and is intersected practically at right angles by Third street, which runs east and west. The car in which plaintiff was riding at and just prior to the injury was traveling in a northerly direction and on the right or easterly side of the highway. The truck with which it collided was traveling in an opposite direction and on the westerly side of B street, and, when it reached the intersection of the two streets, it attempted to make a lefthand turn into Third street, with the result that the two machines collided at the intersection, seriously injuring the plaintiff. Plaintiff instituted this action for damages against not only the appellant herein, the driver of the machine in which he was riding as a guest, but also against the driver and owner of said autotruck. The action was tried by a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff against all of said defendants in the sum of $3,146.50. No question is raised as to the amount of the verdict, but, on motion for a new trial, the trial court, for errors of law occurring during the trial, set aside the judgment as to the driver and owner of the truck, but allowed it to stand as against the driver of the machine in which the plaintiff was riding. From this judgment said defendant has appealed.

On this appeal the appellant contends that he is entitled to a reversal of the judgment upon three grounds; namely: (1) Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; (2) error on the part of the trial court in permitting the witness Stitt to testify as to the location of the center point of intersection of B and Third streets; and (3) error in giving certain instructions to the jury. We will consider these assignments of error in the order just named.

[1] The plaintiff, appellant, and four other persons, who appeared as witnesses at the trial of the action, composed a theatrical troupe, and at the time of the collision were returning from Chico, Cal., to San Francisco for the purpose of appearing in a theatrical engagement in the latter city. They were traveling in two automobiles, one driven by appellant, in which the plaintiff and one other member of said troupe were riding; the plaintiff occupying the front seat with the driver, and the third passenger riding in the rear seat. The other three members of the troupe were riding in the other car, which was following the car in which the plaintiff and appellant were riding. These six persons testified as plaintiff's witnesses at the trial, and it may be conceded that the testimony of all of these witnesses, with the possible exception of the plaintiff, was to the effect that the collision was due to the negligence of the driver of the autotruck in turning suddenly and abruptly at said street intersection into Third street without giving any warning, and thereby passing immediately in the path of the machine driven by the appellant. These witnesses further testified that at and just prior to the collision the appellant was traveling on the easterly side of the highway and at a speed of about 20 miles per hour, while Barlow, the driver of the truck, was traveling 22 to 25 miles per hour when he made the left turn at the intersection and collided with the machine of the appellant. The plaintiff testified that his attention was directed more to the scenery along the route just prior to the accident than at the highway over which they were traveling, and, when he observed the truck, it was about five feet from "our car and struck it sideways, and that is all I remember. I don't remember whether the truck driver had his hand out or not." Were this all the evidence in the case, it is clear that the contention of appellant as to the insufficiency of the evidence would have to be sustained. But the evidence of the driver of the truck corroborated by the witness Sutton, was in direct contradiction to that given by the above-mentioned witnesses. Barlow testified that, when he went to make the turn at the street intersection, the Poley car was about 150 feet to the south; that, at the time he made the turn into Third street he had his signal out for a left-hand turn and was traveling from 6 to 6½ miles per hour. "This other car was coming right along. I don't know how fast exactly. I had no speedometer or nothing to tell. He hadn't slowed up in speed. He was driving at that time about twenty-five or thirty, or maybe more. It took me to stop about two or three feet, two feet, something like that. I don't know exactly." Another witness, Rehm, testified that the Poley car was being driven at about 35 miles per hour, while the evidence showed that there were skid marks on the highway made by the Poley car 21 feet in length leading in a southerly direction from the scene of the accident. It is evident from this brief résumé of the evidence that there is a marked and substantial conflict therein as to whether or not plaintiff's injury was not caused by the negligent acts of the appellant. This conflict the jury, by their verdict, resolved in favor of the plaintiff and against the appellant. On motion for a new trial, the trial court refused to set aside the verdict. Under this state of the case an appellate court is without power to reverse the judgment on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence.

[2] This action was commenced in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, the place of residence of the plaintiff. A motion was granted to have the place of trial changed to the superior court of the county of Yolo, the place of residence of the defendants Barlow and McDermott. Plaintiff resisted said motion, and asked that the trial of said action be retained in the city and county of San Francisco upon the ground of the convenience of witnesses. In support of his demand for the retention of said action in the city and county of San Francisco the plaintiff filed his own affidavit, which, among other things, set forth the names of his witnesses and a statement of facts which he expected to prove by said witnesses. In this affidavit the plaintiff named as witnesses who would testify at the trial in his behalf the appellant and the four other members of said theatrical troupe, already referred to, together with a statement of facts to which each of said witnesses would testify. The statement of facts, thus set forth in plaintiff's said affidavit, agreed in all substantial respects with the testimony which these same witnesses subsequently gave at the trial of the action. Appellant contends, therefore, that the plaintiff, having called these witnesses with full knowledge as to what they would testify, is bound by their testimony, and that, as the testimony of these witnesses completely exonerated appellant, plaintiff should not be permitted to recover against him. As we have already stated, plaintiff brought his action not only against the appellant, but also against Barlow and McDermott, the driver and owner of the autotruck. Plaintiff was entitled to introduce any competent evidence which would tend to establish the negligence of either the appellant or the other two defendants in the case. The fact that the evidence of some of plaintiff's witnesses exonerated appellant and tended to show that the other two defendants were responsible for plaintiff's injuries should not deprive plaintiff of the benefit of the evidence of other witnesses whose testimony tended to prove the negligence of the appellant. Plaintiff at the trial introduced the testimony of the five witnesses above referred to. He then introduced in evidence the deposition of Barlow. He thus made out a prima facie case of negligence against appellant as well as against Barlow and McDermott. But, if we follow the reasoning of appellant, the plaintiff was out of court entirely. By knowingly introducing the evidence of the five witnesses who testified to Barlow's negligence thus exonerating appellant, he was bound by their testimony, and was accordingly precluded from recovering against appellant, and, by introducing the deposition of Barlow, the contents of which the plaintiff was presumed to know, plaintiff was bound by the testimony of Barlow, and accordingly could obtain no relief against Barlow or his employer. Obviously the appellant has cited no authorities in support of this unusual and illogical contention. In our opinion, it is entirely without merit.

[3, 4] The only error assigned by appellant as to the admission of evidence relates to the testimony of witness Stitt, who was a surveyor and engineer. He testified that he had visited the scene of the collision, took certain measurements of the streets, and made observations as to the location of trees and dwellings along the highway at or near the intersection of the two streets, where the collision occurred, and had measured the distance from these objects to the streets at said intersection. He made a map of the street intersection and of the lands adjacent thereto. On this map were depicted the streets and other objects just referred to. This map was admitted in evidence, and was used by many of the witnesses in connection with their testimony. The streets were not paved except in the center of B street; the state highway, 18 feet in width, runs for some distance both north and south of Third street. There is no button or other mark indicating the center of the street intersection. North of Third street B street appears to be curbed, and the street is 50 feet between the curbs. Third street is not paved at or near its intersection with B street. Appellant contends that the traveled portion of Third street is 53 feet in width, and therefore the median line of said street would be 26½ feet south of and parallel to the north curb thereof. The witness Stitt placed said line 25 feet south of said curb or 1½ feet north of the location claimed therefor by appellant. He was permitted to testify that in his opinion the center line of Third street should be located as shown on said map. Appellant attaches considerable importance to the location of this center line, for the reason that he contends that Barlow, in making the left turn at said intersection, "cut the corner" and ran to the north of said center line. As we view the case in its present state, we think the point made by appellant is of but slight importance. Were Barlow and his employer before us, then the fact whether Barlow cut the corner in making the turn into Third street might be of material importance to determine whether Barlow was guilty of negligence in so doing. But, as between the appellant and respondent, the testimony most favorable to the respondent, and that which we are in law bound to adopt and follow, shows that Barlow made the turn after giving the required signal or warning when the appellant was some 150 feet south of said street intersection. The jury could well have determined from this evidence that the appellant had sufficient time to observe Barlow as he made the turn into Third street, and by the exercise of ordinary care could have avoided the collision by turning his car to the left and thereby missed Barlow altogether. In this case, as between the parties to this appeal, the question of Barlow's negligence is of slight moment, provided the testimony was sufficient to establish the negligence of the appellant, which, according to our views already expressed, was ample for that purpose. If, therefore, the court erred in the admission of this testimony of Stitt, such error was not prejudicial to the appellant.

[5] Appellant takes exception to the action of the trial court in giving certain instructions to the jury. The first of these instructions given by the trial court to which appellant objects is as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that all of the allegations contained in plaintiff's complaint have been proven, then I instruct you that your verdict must be in favor of plaintiff, and against defendants." Instructions of this character, where reference is made to the pleadings, and which cast the burden upon the jury of ascertaining the issues in the case from the pleadings, instead of setting forth a clear statement of the issues, have been severely criticized in some jurisdictions. Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. King, 179 Ill. 91, 53 N. E. 552, 70 Am. St. Rep. 93; Robinson v. Berkey, 100 Iowa, 136, 69 N. W. 434, 62 Am. St. Rep. 549. We do not find, however, that any cause has been reversed solely for this reason. It is a practice not to be commended, and tends more to the confusion of the jury than to their enlightenment. It is, however, not sufficient cause for a reversal of the judgment.

[6-9] Objection is further made to this instruction for the reason, as contended by appellant, that it is a formula instruction, and that it omits all reference to the defense of contributory negligence. In the present action contributory negligence was not set up as a defense to plaintiff's cause of action. It is well settled that contributory negligence, in order to avail the defendant, must be specially pleaded. But, in the absence of such a defense set up in the answer, when contributory negligence can be inferred from the circumstances proved by the plaintiff, plaintiff cannot recover. Therefore, if it be conceded that the instruction of which complaint is made is a formula instruction, in the absence of contributory negligence being specially pleaded as a defense, it would not be necessary to include in said instruction any reference to contributory negligence, unless from the evidence of the plaintiff contributory negligence has been proven or may be inferred. We find nothing in the evidence, either that admitted on behalf of the plaintiff, or that introduced by the defendants, that would tend to show that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. He was simply riding with the appellant as a guest of the latter, and had no power of control over the machine in which they were traveling. Nothing had happened during the trip, so far as the evidence shows, at least until the collision occurred, which indicated in any manner that the appellant was not driving his machine in a perfectly proper and careful manner. There was no reason for the plaintiff, therefore, to be apprehensive of his safety while riding with appellant, or to take any unusual precautions against their running into danger. Just before the accident happened, he was observing the houses along the highway, and was not looking in front of the machine, and therefore did not see Barlow's truck until it was about 5 feet from the car in which he was riding. It was then too late for him to caution appellant regarding the latter's driving, or to do anything else to avoid the collision. There is nothing in this conduct of the plaintiff which would tend in the least to prove that he was guilty of contributory negligence in causing the injury sustained by him as a result of the collision. The instruction, therefore, was proper, and the court was not in error in giving it.

[10-13] Appellant also takes exception to the following instruction: "You are instructed that a witness false in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others, and if you believe from the evidence that any witness has willfully testified falsely in any part of his testimony, then it is a presumption of law that he has testified falsely in other parts thereof and you are entitled to distrust him as to the whole of his testimony." The part of the instruction which we have italicized above is the part to which the appellant objects, and contends that the giving of the instruction with this objectionable part included was error on the part of the trial court entitling the appellant to a reversal of the judgment. This instruction was given by the court at the request of the defendants Barlow and McDermott, and not at the instance or request of the plaintiff. We do not understand, however, that this fact would make any material difference as to the force or effect of the instruction. If it was given by the court, the jury were justified in acting upon it, and the consideration given to it by the jury would be the same whether the instruction was given at the request of one party to the action or of the other. The error in either case, if the instruction were erroneous, would be the same, except that the party who offers the instruction cannot complain of the action of the court in giving it. We think the appellant as he was not in any way responsible for the giving of the instruction, has the right to complain of any erroneous statement of law contained therein which injuriously affected his rights in the action or trial. The instruction is based upon subdivision 3 of section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows: "That a witness false in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others." We find no precedent in the decisions of this state, and our attention has not been called to any in other jurisdictions which sanctions or justifies the giving of the instruction in the form in which it was given to the jury by the court in this action. We question, however, whether the appellant has been seriously prejudiced by any statement contained in the instruction. The jury were told that, if a witness has willfully testified falsely in any part of his testimony, then it is a presumption of law that he has testified falsely in other parts thereof (a statement which we think was clearly erroneous and unauthorized under any provisions of law in this state); yet the jury were told that, if they had this belief, then they were simply "entitled to distrust him as to the whole of his testimony." They were not told that they must distrust or reject his testimony, as was the case in a case relied upon by the appellant People v. Rosa, 97 Cal. App. 501, 275 P. 961. On the other hand, the words of section 2061, Code of Civil Procedure, were followed by the court in the framing of the instruction, and particularly that part of the instruction defining the power of the jury in respect to the testimony of a witness whom the jury believed had testified falsely in one part of his testimony. All the jury were told was that they were entitled to distrust such a witness as to the whole of his testimony. We cannot feel that any prejudicial results followed from the giving of this instruction.

Complaint is also made by appellant to instruction 18, respecting the damages to be allowed the plaintiff, in that it contravenes section 3283 of the Civil Code, which provides that "damages may be awarded, in a judicial proceeding, for detriment resulting after the commencement thereof, or certain to result in the future." Like objection was made to an instruction similar to the said instruction 18, and the objection overruled in the case of Burk v. Extrafine Bread Bakery (Cal. Sup.) 280 P. 522. In Norton v. Houlette, 85 Cal. App. 233, 237, 258 P. 1104, 1106, the court gave extended consideration to an instruction similar in principle to instruction 18 in the present action, and held that, "while not to be commended, the instruction of which complaint is made was not prejudicial to the rights of defendant." See, on this subject, Scally v. W. T. Garratt & Co., 11 Cal. App. 138, 104 P. 325.

A number of other instructions are criticized by appellant. We have carefully examined each of them, and have given consideration to the argument of appellant in support of these criticisms. In our opinion, these instructions contain no prejudicial error, and we think it is unnecessary to set out these instructions or the grounds upon which they are sustained.

[14] Since the oral argument of this appeal, both appellant and respondent have filed supplementary briefs as to the effect of section 141½ of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1929, p. 1580), which section was enacted and went into effect subsequent to the entry of the judgment in this action. At the time of the filing of said briefs, this court had never passed upon the question as to the retroactive effect of said section and whether or not it applied to pending actions. On July 24, 1930, however, this court handed down a decision in which it was held that section 141¾ of the California Vehicle Act, as amended, does not in any way affect causes of action for damages for personal injuries existing on August 14, 1929, the date the statute took effect. Callet v. Alito (Cal. Sup.) 290 P. 438. The ruling in this last-named case is a complete answer to the contention raised by the appellant as to the effect of said statute upon the present action.

We find no error in the record in this action which would justify a reversal thereof.

The judgment therefore is affirmed.

HARRINGTON v. STATE BAR OF
CALIFORNIA.
S. F. 13743.

Supreme Court of California.
Oct. 20, 1930.

As Amended Nov. 15, 1930.

Attorney and client $\S$ 10.

Petitioner held entitled to admission to practice law in state on certificate from another state.

The only matters in record on which committee of the state bar denied application for admission to practice law related to petitioner's having been named codefendant in criminal proceedings wherein defendants were charged with conspiracy to obstruct justice by secreting a witness. In such proceeding petitioner was absolved from any guilt. Another matter related to his receiving from clerk of court money belonging to client, as he had a right to do under state statute, and which he thereafter failed to deliver to client because unable to find her, but which, about a year after client disappeared, he paid to her on her demand and under circumstances showing he was not guilty of any wrongdoing.

In Bank.

Proceeding by Gerald F. Harrington against the State Bar of California, to review an order of the Committee of the Bar Examiners of the State Bar, denying his application for admission to practice on certificate from another state.

Application for admission granted.

Wm. Kehoe, of San Francisco, and Isidore B. Dockweiler, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Morse Erskine, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The petitioner herein, Gerald F. Harrington, presented to the committee of bar examiners of the state bar of California, on May 18, 1928, his application, in due form, for admission to practice as an attorney and counselor in the courts of the state of California, basing the same upon his certificate of admission to practice law in the state of Nebraska, duly issued to him in the year 1913 and unrevoked, and upon a considerable number of commendatory letters from judges, members of the bar and former clients of the petitioner while practicing law in the state of Nebraska between 1913 and 1926. Pursuant thereto the petitioner appeared before the committee of bar examiners on June 1, 1928, and was examined at length by the members thereof, from which it appeared that the applicant, prior to his admission to practice in the state of Nebraska, had received a high school education, followed by a college degree and two years' law school study at Creighton University, with one year at Harvard, after which he passed the bar examination in Nebraska and took up the practice of the law in Omaha, in which he had continued with apparently considerable success during the succeeding thirteen years. He frankly admitted that he had at one time, and about the year 1917, been named a codefendant with his father, who was also a lawyer, and with certain other parties, in a criminal proceeding wherein the defendants were charged with conspiracy to obstruct justice by secreting a witness in a white slave case, upon the trial of which he was, however, acquitted, the evidence in the case disclosing that he had nothing to do with the alleged offense, having been absent from the state at the time of its alleged commission. The record in that case, which was subsequently presented before the board, fully supported the claim of the applicant that he was entirely innocent of any wrongdoing or of any ethical misconduct in respect to that proceeding. In addition thereto, and in response to a letter written by one of the members of the board to the firm of attorneys in Dubuque, Iowa, who had been engaged in the prosecution of the defendants in that case, a reply was received from the member of that firm who had personally conducted such prosecution and at the close thereof had advised the jury to acquit the applicant herein, and who in his said letter expressly stated that the said charge should not be a bar to his right to practice law in this state, and that the applicant was "a reputable young man of fine appearance and training and he should not be prevented from pursuing his career because of the unfortunate affair in which his father was involved." At the conclusion of the first hearing before the board of bar examiners that body delegated to Mr. George Stoneman, one of the members, the duty of further examining the record in that case, and this having been done by him he made and filed with said board his report thereon on September 20, 1928, stating that: "From the record I am unable to see that the application for admission to the bar of this state of Gerald F. Harrington is affected in any manner save unfortunately he became involved through his relationship to his father. I therefore recommend that his application for admission to practice law in this state be granted." In addition to the foregoing the petitioner herein has presented a letter from Judge Thomas C. Munger of the Circuit Court of Appeals in and for the circuit which includes Nebraska, and who had reviewed the aforesaid cause upon appeal, stating: "I am informed that you are applying for admission to the bar of California. I am pleased to recommend you for admission as an attorney. In the many years in which you have practiced in the United States court in this state I found you to be capable, industrious and honorable. I wish you success."

Notwithstanding the foregoing showing, the board of bar examiners manifested an indisposition to admit the applicant, and continued the matter of his admission for further investigation. At a later hearing the applicant was questioned with relation to another matter voluntarily adverted to by him, and which involved his professional relations with a client named Mrs. Frahm, from which it appears that in the year 1922 the applicant represented this client in a divorce suit against her husband, and procured for her a decree of divorce wherein it was provided that the plaintiff should be allowed permanent alimony in the monthly sum of $25, together with attorney's fees in the sum of $75. The husband made one payment of $25 into court upon this judgment and then disappeared. The lady also presently remarried and disappeared, leaving with her attorney neither the name of her second husband nor her address. In the year 1924, in another action, affecting a piece of real estate in which her former husband had some interest, the sum of $160.73 was paid into court to be applied upon account of the judgment in the divorce proceeding. The clerk of the court, not knowing the plaintiff's address, but desiring to clear his records, wrote to the applicant herein, asking him to receive, on her account, this sum of money. This the applicant did, as he had a right to do, not only by virtue of the Nebraska statutes (section 266, Compiled Stats. of Nebraska, 1922), but also for the reason that he had an interest in said judgment to the extent of his unpaid counsel fees. At once, upon the receipt of this sum of money, the applicant wrote to the last-known address of his former client, stating the transaction and requesting her to call at her earliest convenience to get the money. His letter was returned undelivered, whereupon the applicant made a trip to Council Bluffs, sought out her last known residence and questioned her former friends and neighbors as to her whereabouts, but all in vain. About a year later the lady reappeared at the applicant's office at a time when he was moving, and was asked to return on the following day, by which time the applicant stated that he could get at his books and accounts in order to make his settlement with her. Instead of so doing she went to the court and the judge thereof notified the applicant to appear in court the following morning and explain the transaction. He so appeared and made his showing as to his vain efforts to locate the lady and his entire willingness to pay over to her there and then whatever portion of said money was coming to her after deducting his own fees and costs. At the close of such hearing the judge made an order allowing the applicant his aforesaid fees and costs and directing the payment of the balance to his client, which the applicant immediately paid over to her. It is a significant fact to be considered in relation to the foregoing transaction that the deputy clerk of Douglas county, Neb., who had immediately to do with the payment of the sum of money involved therein to the applicant and with the subsequent proceedings with relation thereto, has presented an affidavit absolving the applicant herein of any wrongdoing whatever in the matter, and that the presiding judge of Douglas county has contributed a letter strongly recommending the admission of the applicant to the California bar.

The original application of this applicant was presented to the board of bar examiners on May 18, 1928. Whatever examination was thereafter had into the merits of his said application, aside from the two hearings above referred to, were made ex parte by the members or committees of the board of bar examiners, during the course of which the matter was delayed from time to time for nearly a year. The applicant, becoming impatient of this delay, began making inquiries at the office of the board, but he could gain no satisfaction save that his application was still pending. When, in the month of December, 1928, he wrote a letter to the member of the board of bar examiners having particularly to do with the investigation into the merits of his application, requesting information as to the status thereof, and also requesting that he be given information as to any other charges against him, in order that he might be in a position to refute the same, he received a reply stating that: "It is not the policy of the committee of bar examiners to disclose information received by it in investigations which it conducts," and further informing him that: "When our examination is completed, if we should be inclined to make an adverse decision based upon information which we have received pursuant to our independent investigation, you will be advised thereof in ample time to explain or rebut the same." Notwithstanding this assurance no further action was taken by the committee in the way of informing the applicant of the status of his application until the month of August, 1929, when, after repeated requests for information, he was finally and for the first time advised that his application had been denied on March 16, 1929. He at once applied for a rehearing, in connection with which he demanded that he be given copies of any affidavits or other papers bearing upon his character or fitness for admission to the bar, and offering to stipulate for the taking of any testimony by deposition in the state of Nebraska if the committee should deem it advisable. To this application and request the applicant received no other answer than that his petition for rehearing was denied. Upon being so advised he made application for a review by this court, in response to which the entire record of the proceedings before the board of bar examiners has been filed herein. An examination of this record discloses that other than the two matters in any way affecting the qualifications of this applicant to be admitted to practice in this state no charges have been either preferred or investigated, nor has anything whatever derogatory to the character or professional standing or fitness of the applicant been urged either before the board or any member thereof, or before this court. On the contrary, there has been presented in this record an unbroken line in the way of testimonials from the bench and bar of the state of Nebraska, including practically every judge of both the state and federal courts of that jurisdiction, certifying to the high standing and unblemished professional career of this applicant during his many years of practice in the Nebraska courts. In numerous instances these testimonials are couched in terms of personal regard and even affection far beyond the ordinary language of formal recommendation. Coupled with these are also to be found like testimonials not only from the lawyers and firms of well-known standing and repute at the Nebraska bar, but also from members of the Nebraska Bar Association, all testifying to the enviable position and excellent character of the applicant while engaged in practice at the Nebraska bar. It was ill health which compelled this applicant to seek a change of residence and to come to California in the year 1926. Having recovered his health, in the year 1928 he sought admission to the California bar. He has thus far been denied that opportunity upon what seems to us entirely insufficient justification for such denial. He has also been delayed beyond reason and without adequate excuse for such delay. He has been, on the whole, harshly treated, quite contrary to what we think should be the policy of the membership and official representatives of the state bar in extending a welcoming hand to their professional brethren from other jurisdictions who, having there been duly admitted and having there pursued an honorable and successful career, conclude to make their home in California and in due course seek permission to continue the practice of their profession here with like assurances of honor and distinction.

It is therefore ordered that the petitioner herein be and he is hereby admitted to practice as an attorney and counselor at law, authorized to practice in all the courts of this state, and the clerk is hereby directed to issue and deliver to him a certificate of such authority upon his taking the prescribed oath and signing the roll of attorneys.

WASTE, C. J. (concurring).

As the petitioner has shown himself entitled to such admission, I concur in the order admitting him to practice law in this state. But I withhold my approval of any language in the majority opinion that may seem to imply that the "membership and official representatives of The State Bar" should not continue to be diligent and thorough in determining the character and qualifications of applicants for admission from other jurisdictions. Those members of the profession who have pursued an "honorable and successful career" elsewhere are, of course, welcome; but experience and the records of our courts show that not all who apply for admission here are worthy.

SEAWELL, J.

The defendant was convicted of the double murder of Stanley Montaro and Mary Munoz, aged twenty-three and twenty years, respectively, committed in a suburban district of San Leandro, county of Alameda, this state, on December 19, 1929. The indictment upon which he was convicted contained two counts, and the jury returned a verdict of guilty of murder of the first degree, without recommendation of imprisonment, upon both counts. The murdered persons were betrothed, and had parked the Chevrolet coupé, in which they were seated at the time they were fired upon, by the side of Holland avenue, one of the several crossroads in the locality in which the crime was committed, and which leads into the main thoroughfare of travel. The crime was committed approximately at 7:30 o'clock in the evening. The defendant, then twenty-four years of age, lived at the home of his mother and stepfather, situate in a fruit and agricultural district near the place where the crime was committed. The defendant and the victims of his deadly assault lived in the same community, at varying distances apart. It would seem that all of said parties had resided in the same vicinity since childhood, and a mutual acquaintance existed as to one another.

Three days after the commission of the crime the defendant made a confession of guilt, and related with considerable circumstance of detail the facts of the killing, which he repeated upon two or three other occasions, without material variation, to the officers of the law and the physicians called by the state to examine him as to his mental status. Later, however, he repudiated said confessions in toto and went to trial upon pleas of not guilty, and not guilty by reason of insanity. His confessions were corroborated by certain definite physical facts and also by independent evidence adduced at the trial.

From the above sources of information it would appear that he was the owner of a .38-caliber revolver which was kept concealed under the mattress of a bed, and the cartridges were kept under another bed at the home. He claimed to have been the owner of two other revolvers, which he had purchased from an unnamed man who had recently arrived from Honolulu, but which remained in the possession of said stranger, as there was some talk between them with reference to a suggested bank robbery. However, on the evening in question he left his home at about 7 o'clock, taking with him said revolver and a number of cartridges, which he carried loosely in his pocket. Upon leaving the home he loaded the revolver and walked through a field to Holland avenue. This and other avenues in the district seem to have been preferred places of retreat for youthful lovers, who frequently drew to the side of the road and, bringing their cars to a stop, tarried for a time in the seclusion which said less frequented avenues afforded. This fact was well known to defendant, who referred to such episodes as "petting parties," the suggestiveness of which seems to have inflamed his sexual passions to an abnormal point. He stated in his confession that he went upon the highway with the intention of compelling by force of arms the submission of a female member of such a "petting party" to an act of sexual intercourse, holding at bay, by threats and intimidation, her escort. Whether he had in mind the parties whom he slew, or whether he recognized them during the short interval that he was engaged in an attempt to force them to submit to his commands—which he denied—is not determinative from anything which appears in the record.

Shortly upon reaching Holland avenue he observed the Chevrolet coupé pass him, in which were seated said couple. He observed it to presently draw up beside the road, and he approached it on the side the man was seated, stepped upon the running board and, with drawn revolver, intended to command "Hands up!" but he got no further than "Hands", when, to use his own words, the man "got sore and started to swear" and made a forward motion, illustrating it, which caused the defendant to believe that the man was about to draw a revolver, and he began shooting. One version of the shooting was that he first shot the man, then he shot the girl, then shot the man again and tried to shoot the girl again, but missed the girl and hit the man. In a statement made to one of the alienists he said that when he first shot, the girl threw herself on the man to save him and that accounts for the shot in her right side. It is a fact that the bullet which struck the young lady entered her right side. He also made a statement that he ordered the man to take "a walk." After the shooting he ran across vacant land to his home. He wrapped the pistol in a small sack, hid it, and went to bed. In his flight he relieved himself of the extra cartridges which he had taken with him and also threw from the revolver the four exploded shells. The young woman, who had been mortally wounded by a bullet which entered her body, made her way with great difficulty to a main thoroughfare, where she attracted the attention of the driver of a truck, who took her to San Leandro, and she was placed in the Highland Hospital for treatment. She died the next day a few minutes past noon. An attempt was made to take her statement about one hour before she expired, but it proved futile. Her companion was found dead in a reclining position behind the steering wheel of the car with three bullet wounds in his body.

[1] An investigation of the crime brought to light circumstances which pointed to the defendant. He was thereupon placed under arrest and two days thereafter confessed and gave a detailed statement of his actions prior to, at the time of, and immediately subsequent to the murder. Several exploded and unexploded .38-caliber pistol cartridges were found at the places where he told the officers they would be found; the revolver, which had been recently discharged, was recovered at his home, as he had told the officers where it would be found; bullets in the undischarged shells corresponded in size and shape with those taken from the bodies of his victims; the number of shots fired into each body corresponded with his narrative of the shooting. Other corroborative evidence was added, which, taken in all, makes the proof against the defendant conclusive.

On the first or general issue of not guilty, the issue of legal competency was brought into the case by the defendant by his objection to the introduction in evidence of the confession which he had made, on the ground that he was mentally deficient and that he did not and could not have comprehended the significance of the statements and admissions which he was purported to have made, and, further, that any statements or admissions made by him were induced by intimidation and threats. On the issue of mental deficiency the defendant was permitted to introduce such evidence as he chose to present. He called as his witness Mrs. Grace M. Hunt, the Alameda county psychologist, who first came into official contact with the defendant in 1922 and again in 1925 and lastly a few days after the commission of the crime for which he was on trial. She estimated his mental age, by the tests which she applied, at ten years and four months. The intelligence test which she used was a modification of the Binet system. Under such a system the 100 per cent. normal persons are rated between 14 and 16 years. There is no hard and fast rule by which results may be said to be exact, as the quotients are established by the process of approximation. His auditory memory was tested by repeating to him five numerals, with a slight pause between each, as, for example, 6, 9, 4, 8, 2, and then having him repeat them backwards, or in reverse order. His answer was 2, 9, 6, and then he became lost. The next test consisted of 5, 2, 9, 6, 1. He began with 1 and went no further.

Such a test unexpectedly applied would most likely perplex the average person untrained in the permutation of figures, to say nothing of one who is troubled with the consciousness of an appalling crime, with its consequent effect immediately before him. His early trouble in 1922 and his commitment to the Sonoma State Home for the care of feeble-minded children, as the result of complaint having been made against him on account of his serious criminal conduct in 1925, and his release from said institution in 1927, were referred to by the witness. His mentality had improved somewhat since Mrs. Hunt first made observation of him, and she expressed no opinion as to his responsibility to the law.

[2-4] Upon the trial of the issue of not guilty the prosecution offered in evidence the confessions of the defendant, one of which had been reduced to typewritten form by the stenographer who reported it. The defendant objected to the introduction of said confessions, or either of them, on the ground that he was wholly unable to understand, by reason of a congenital mental deficiency, the meaning, effect, or force of said purported confessions. The trial court admitted evidence produced by the defendant as to his mental incompetency on the theory that it was the province of the jury to determine whether or not said confessions were understandingly made or could have been the products of a defective mind, such as the defendant was alleged to possess. The trial court limited such evidence to the sole inquiry as to whether the defendant possessed sufficient understanding to have comprehended the significance of his confession, was conscious of what he was saying, and understood the import of his words and acts and appreciated their significance. The court instructed the jury that they could not consider said confessions unless they were made by a mind which understood and appreciated their full import at the time they were claimed to have been made. The jury evidently impliedly found that the confessions were understandingly made, and accordingly gave them consideration. This evidence, while limited to the purpose indicated by the court, nevertheless brought an advantage to the defendant which otherwise would have been denied him by authority of sections 1020 and 1026, Penal Code, which excludes, on the trial of the issue not guilty, all evidence tending to show the mental condition of the defendant at the time of the commission of the offense, in that from necessity it placed before the jury, upon the trial of the main issue, the mental status of the defendant. The raising of the issue of want of consciousness on the part of the defendant with respect to his confessions brought to the jury's consideration its right to exercise its discretion in affixing the penalty (section 190, Pen. Code) and determine whether a sentence of life imprisonment would better serve the requirements of the law in the circumstances of the defendant's mental status than would the imposition of the death penalty. The section of the Code above cited makes it the duty of the jury to affix, in the exercise of its discretion, the penalty in all murders which are of the first degree, but in none other. It is strictly a matter of fixing the punishment, and does not extend to the degree of crime.

[5] The question, however, as to his responsibility to the law for his act will presently receive attention. It may be here stated that the confession was further opposed upon the ground that it was obtained by physical punishment inflicted upon him by one of the deputy sheriffs. He claimed that said officer told him on the day following the murders that, if he did not "tell," he would kill him, and he replied that he had nothing to do with the killing, and further said that this "Isn't the Hickman or the Dorothy Ellingson Case." He further stated that said officer in an attempt to force a confession struck him upon the temple, upon the neck, and stomach. This could not be true, as defendant's body was examined carefully for specific purposes by alienists and physicians covering the period fixed by the defendant and afterwards and no indications of any marks or bruises were visible upon his person. In fact, his belated accusation was made after he had concluded to repudiate his confession, and it is also in direct contradiction of statements made to the foreman of the grand jury and several other persons that he had been well treated during his confinement. The officer denied that any threats or violence were employed by him to induce the confession. There is nothing in the record that would cause us to doubt his testimony, which finds corroboration in the evidence.

[6] The same jury which returned the verdict of guilty was retained to try the issue of not guilty by reason of insanity. By virtue of section 1027, Penal Code, the trial judge appointed three alienists with wide experience to examine the defendant and investigate his sanity. One of said alienists was the medical superintendent of the State Hospital at Napa and the other two were well-known alienists of the county of Alameda who had long experience in the treatment of the insane. In addition to said three alienists appointed by the court, the people called the medical superintendent of the Sonoma State Home, at which institution the defendant was an inmate for approximately two years; the former family physician of the defendant's parents; and the director of hospitals of Alameda county, who has had much psychopathic experience, all of whom devoted much study and time to the mental status of the defendant. Without attempting to review the testimony of the said several witnesses, it may be said that they were unanimous, except one, who apparently, through inadvertence, was not called upon to express an opinion that the defendant was legally responsible for the crime of which he stood convicted.

Throughout the larger part of his life the defendant has been anti-social and involved in numerous highly mischievous, if not positively criminal, acts. From the story of his life as unraveled by him it appears that the defendant attended the common schools from 8 to 15 years of age, at which time he had occasional trouble with his teachers on account of attendance derelictions, which resulted in his quitting school and seeking employment as a dairy or farm hand. He first came to the attention of the Alameda peace officers in 1922 by reason of petty thefts and other petty offenses in which he, with others, was implicated. He again came before the law in 1925, charged with placing a telephone or telegraph pole across the track of the Western Pacific Railroad Company, which resulted in his commitment to the Sonoma State Home for training and discipline. He was paroled in 1927. He did not fit well into the home life and he appears to have harbored an unfriendly feeling against his stepfather, and in one or two instances against his mother, also. It would seem that he resented the adverse criticism made against him in the community by reason of having been an inmate of the home. The several examinations which the alienists made were unusually thorough and searching, and covered a wide range of subjects, including his personal and family history. His memory proved to be unusually good, in fact, one of the alienists described it as a photographic memory. He was good in mathematics and accurate in dates, and in a logical and sequential manner discoursed on events and their results. He appears to have grown more aggressive in his sex relationships during the past few years of his life. He denied that he had delusions or that there was any mental or nervous trouble in his history or his family's history. After leaving school he engaged in dairy, farm, and orchard work, did his own bargaining, and at the date of his crime or shortly before he had more than $300 on deposit with a neighborhood bank. While he may be mentally deficient, as most persons who commit crime are held to be by alienists, all of the medical skill called into the case pronounced him unquestionably responsible as a moral agent. He knew that it was wrong and a violation of the moral and legal codes to commit murder, and that the law's penalty included the possibility of the infliction of the death penalty against those who unlawfully take human life, all of which fully appears in the record.

In addition to the opinions expressed by the alienists as to the legal responsibility of the defendant, his confession, as taken by questions and answers, and his testimony as a witness on his own behalf at the trial are before us. There is nothing in his statements or testimony that would justify this court in holding that his mentality was deficient or impaired to the degree that he did not fully understand the nature and quality of the acts which he committed or did not know that he was doing wrong in committing them. We have carefully read the record in the case and find no prejudicial errors were committed at the trial. The learned trial judge was liberal in his rulings and specially called to the attention of the jury that it was in their power to relieve the defendant of the extreme penalty of the law by the following instruction:

"The punishment for murder in the first degree is death, or confinement in the State Prison for life, at the discretion of the jury trying the case. The law prescribes no rules or tests for the guidance of jurors in the exercise of its discretion in determining whether the greater or lesser penalty shall be inflicted, but leaves the question of punishment solely to the conscience and sound judgment of the jury.

"If the jury determines that the punishment shall be mitigated, that is, to life imprisonment in State Prison, then the verdict must distinctly state such punishment, for if nothing is said in the verdict as to the punishment, then always the court imposes the penalty of death."

The law is so thoroughly settled as to the kinds of mental disorders or mental incompetency which will relieve a defendant from punishment for his acts that it is not necessary to do more than cite a few of the more recent cases. People v. Willard, 150 Cal. 543, 89 P. 124; People v. Gilberg, 197 Cal. 306, 240 P. 1000; People v. Sloper, 198 Cal. 238, 244 P. 362; People v. Perry, 195 Cal. 623, 234 P. 890; People v. Hickman, 204 Cal. 470, 268 P. 909, 270 P. 1117; People v. Troche, 206 Cal. 35, 273 P. 767; People v. Leong Fook, 206 Cal. 64, 273 P. 779.

Measured by the law's standard, the jury found the defendant to be responsible for his crimes and with a full instruction before them as to their power to relieve him of the death penalty they refused to exercise said discretion in favor of the imposition of the lesser punishment.

The validity of sections 1017, 1020, and 1026, Penal Code, which provide the order and procedure which shall govern trials in which insanity is made a ground of defense and which also provide that, upon the trial of the general issue of "not guilty," the defendant shall be conclusively presumed to be sane, have been so fully discussed by the two cases last above cited that it is sufficient merely to cite them.

We find nothing in the record that would warrant us in disturbing the verdicts of the jury and the judgments.

The judgments and orders appealed from with respect to both counts of the indictment are affirmed.

On the record before me I am compelled to concur in the judgment. I do so with the utmost reluctance, and solely because of the limitations upon this court in its review of criminal proceedings. I think that the matter of sentence should receive careful consideration by the chief executive of the state in the event that an application for such relief should come before him, for he alone may grant relief where we are powerless to act. It has heretofore been determined that the defendant was so deficient in mentality as to require his confinement in the Sonoma State Home for the Feeble-Minded; and at the time when this crime was committed he was on parole from that institution. To me it appears monstrous that the state should execute one of its own wards, who should never have been set at liberty, and who at the time of this tragic event was still under surveillance as a mental defective.

WASTE, C. J.

Action brought by plaintiff to recover the sum of $7,550 alleged to be due from defendants under the terms of a written contract for the drilling of oil wells. Defendants defended on the ground that plaintiff did not substantially perform his part of the contract, and that therefore no recovery could be had. Plaintiff's excuse for the alleged nonperformance is that defendants first breached the contract. The case was tried before the court without a jury, resulting in a judgment in plaintiff's favor in the sum of $7,200. From this judgment, defendants prosecute this appeal.

The contract involved herein provides, among other things, that plaintiff agreed to drill four oil wells for defendants, keeping his two portable drilling rigs in continuous operation until each well is drilled to a depth of 500 feet, and, if necessary and feasible, to a greater depth; that plaintiff is to furnish all labor, fuel, water, tools, and equipment, except that defendants agree to furnish "all casing, also cement and all tools and materials whatsoever required in cementing off water"; that the compensation of plaintiff for such services shall be at the rate of $3 per foot for the first 600 feet, 75 per cent. of which shall be paid at the completion of each 100 feet of drilling, the balance upon completion; that in the event [and this is an important feature of the contract] "rock is encountered in drilling any of said wells," plaintiff agrees to drill one foot through the same without extra compensation, but beyond that defendants agree to pay $75 per day for each day of nine hours required in drilling through "all rock formations"; that if plaintiff finds that it is not feasible to drill through rock formations, he may abandon the well and drill another, plaintiff to receive compensation for the abandoned well on the scale set forth above; that defendants agree to pay to plaintiff $25 per day for each day of nine hours lost by plaintiff on account of failure of defendants to supply casing or other materials; that defendants agree to deposit with the First National Bank of Delano the sum of $3,000 as a cash bond to insure payment of all sums due plaintiff, the bank to make payments from said sum to plaintiff upon presentation of a certificate showing the sum to be due; that when such deposit is reduced to $1,000 defendants agree to deposit a further sum of $2,000 for the same purpose, and to continue such deposits so that at all times there shall be on hand a sum sufficient to meet all plaintiff's demands under the contract.

It is stipulated by defendants that they furnished no casing, and at no time made the

SCHLITZ v. AKERS et al.

L. A. 10221.

Supreme Court of California.

Oct. 20, 1930.

1. Mines and minerals ⇨109.

Word "rock" or "rock formations," used in contract for drilling oil well, must be given general and popular meaning, and includes "shale" (Civ. Code, § 1645).

Contract in question provided for payment of extra compensation in case rock or rock formations were encountered during drilling operation. Term "shale" is defined as rock formed by consolidation of clay, mud, or silt, having a finely stratified or laminated structure.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Rock," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Mines and minerals ⇨109.

Under contract for drilling oil well, furnishing of casing by owner of land held condition precedent to performance of contract by driller.

Owner of land under terms of contract for drilling oil well agreed to furnish "all casing, also cement and all tools and materials whatsoever required in cementing off water." Contention was made that, as driller made no demand upon owner for casing, no default under contract arose for failure to furnish casing.

bank deposits as required by the contract. It is further agreed that plaintiff has been paid the sum of $1,550. The principal findings of the court may be summarized as follows:

1. Plaintiff started performance and kept in continuous operation his two drilling rigs from November 30, 1923, to February 1, 1924.

2. That in drilling the wells plaintiff encountered rock formation and consumed 56 days of nine hours each with each rig in drilling through the same.

3. That on or about February 1 casing became necessary to further carry on operations, but defendants failed and neglected to furnish the same, and as a result thereof plaintiff lost 14 days with one rig on account of such delay.

4. That defendants failed, neglected, and refused to deposit in bank the sums required by the contract; that it was understood and agreed that such deposit was to enable plaintiff to pay the actual cost of doing the work during the progress thereof; that the compliance with this provision was a condition precedent to performance by plaintiff.

5. That on or about February 15, 1924, by reason of the failure and neglect of defendants to furnish the casing and to deposit the money in the bank, the plaintiff elected to treat the contract as broken by defendants.

6. That plaintiff became entitled to $8,400 for drilling through rock formation for 56 days at $75 per day for each rig, and to $350 for the 14 days delay at $25 per day caused by defendants' failure to supply the casing; that $1,550 having been paid, there remains due, owing, and unpaid the sum of $7,200.

7. That the alleged defenses of defendants are not true.

[1] On this appeal defendants strenuously contend that the evidence shows that plaintiff drilled the greater portion of the time through shale, and that the terms "rock" and "rock formations" do not include shale. To support this contention defendants produced a petroleum engineer who testified that technically the term "rock" includes "shale or stone," but in "oil field parlance" the term refers "to hard formations, usually in large bodies, as, for instance, granite"; and, further, that "shale is not considered rock by oil people." The trial court interpreted the term used in the contract in its general sense, and refused to interpret it in the limited fashion suggested by the expert. We agree with the interpretation of the trial court. In Webster's New International Dictionary the term "shale" is defined as "a rock formed by the consolidation of clay, mud or silt, having a finely stratified or laminated structure." Clearly, then, as the term "rock" is generally used it includes shale. Defendants refer to section 1645 of the Civil Code, which provides that "technical words are to be interpreted as usually understood by persons in the profession or business to which they relate, unless clearly used in a different sense," and contend that the term is a technical one and therefore should be limited according to oil field usage. There is nothing in the contract nor in the evidence to show that the term was intended to be so limited; in fact, the inferences to be gathered from the evidence all tend to show that the term was intended in its general or popular sense. The evidence is uncontradicted that plaintiff was unfamiliar with the territory where the wells were drilled; that defendants knew that plaintiff was not experienced in oil well drilling, having heretofore engaged only in the drilling of water wells; that the territory with which he was familiar contained little or no shale; that defendants represented that the soil formation where the oil wells were to be drilled was similar to that with which plaintiff was familiar and where there was little shale. Moreover, the contract uses, in addition to the word "rock," the term "rock formations," and clearly the latter, if not the former, includes shale. Under the circumstances, the general and popular meaning of the term was reasonably intended.

Defendants likewise contend that there is no evidence to support the finding that plaintiff drilled 56 days of nine hours with each rig through rock. Defendants, by mathematical formula, attempt to discredit the finding. Plaintiff's drilling superintendent, among others, testified fully to the work done on the four wells. The evidence on the point seems to be quite complete, and amply supports the finding. In this connection, it should be noted that the trial court made no allowance whatsoever for the time spent in drilling through soil for which plaintiff was to be paid $3 per foot.

[2] Appellants contend that under the contract they were only to supply casing when needed for a water shut-off. The quoted part of the contract, supra, provides otherwise. They also contend that plaintiff made no demand upon them for the casing, and that a demand was necessary to place them in default. We do not so interpret the contract. Under its terms, the furnishing of the casing was a condition precedent to respondent's performance. However, even if a demand were necessary, it would avail appellants but little, for the reason that they clearly breached the contract by failing to make the money deposit required by the contract.

The evidence is also sufficient to support the finding that the 14 days' delay which occurred was due to appellants' failure to supply casing.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment appealed from is hereby affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by Frank Manfre against C. B. Sharp, doing business under the name of the Sharp Flour Company, for breach of a sales contract. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Thomas, Beedy, Presley & Paramore, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Walter E. Hettman, of San Francisco, and Lafayette J. Smallpage, of Stockton, for respondent.

SHENK, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $2,365.50.

The action is one to recover damages for an alleged breach by the seller of a contract for the purchase and sale of flour. It appears that in July, 1924, the defendant, appellant herein, entered into a contract with one Voight for the sale to the latter of a specified quantity of flour, the same to be delivered weekly over a period of time extending into 1925. This contract contemplated the extension of credit to Voight. Voight was then engaged in the bakery business in Stockton under the fictitious name of Snow White Bakery. On October 31, 1924, he sold the bakery business to his foreman, Manfre, the plaintiff and respondent herein, and assigned to Manfre all of his right, title and interest in and to the contract with the defendant. On December 15, 1924, Voight mailed a letter to the defendant which the defendant claims and the court finds was not received by him until December 20, 1924, informing the defendant that he had sold the business to the plaintiff. In this letter Voight stated, among other things, that he would "no longer be responsible for any bills which may be contracted hereafter, and any business done by you will be with Mr. Manfre direct." On December 20, 1924, the defendant replied to this letter acknowledging its receipt, but in no way mentioning that part of the letter dealing with the release of Voight. On December 31, 1924, the defendant wrote to the plaintiff, stating that certain moneys were due and likewise stating that they "must insist upon your living up to the terms of the contract, as booked, and on which you are at the present time in arrears." Finally the defendant refused to deliver more flour unless the plaintiff pay cash therefor, the price of flour having risen considerably in the meantime. As a result the plaintiff purchased flour in the open market and brought this action for the damages thus sustained. It was stipulated at the trial that if the plaintiff was entitled to any damages that sum should be $2,365.50. It was likewise stipulated, or admitted by express statement of counsel and found by the trial court, that neither the plaintiff nor Voight were in default in taking deliveries or in the making of payments under the contract. The case was tried before the court without a jury.

The defendant contends that the finding to the effect that he gave his consent to the release of Voight and accepted the plaintiff in lieu thereof is not supported by the evidence.

If the defendant's contention is correct, we would then be presented with the question as to whether the buyer under a contract which involves personal credit may assign the same without the consent of the seller. The defendant contends that it is the law of this state that a buyer may not so assign. We do not find it necessary to decide that point, for the reason that we are of the opinion that the finding involved is supported by the evidence. For that reason, the transaction here presented does not involve the law of assignment of contracts at all, but is a novation; that is, the substitution of one debtor for another and releasing the first. The defendant contends that the contract with Voight was canceled and that no contract was ever entered into with the plaintiff.

[1-3] As defined by the Code, "Novation is the substitution of a new obligation for an existing one." Civ. Code, § 1530. The same Code likewise provides that, "Novation is made * * * 2. By the substitution of a new debtor in place of the old one, with intent to release the latter. * * *" Civ. Code, § 1531. Also it is provided that, "Novation is made by contract, and is subject to all the rules concerning contracts in general." Civ. Code, § 1532. Where a new debtor is substituted for an old one, a sufficient consideration for the agreement appears when it is shown that the old debtor was released from his obligation in consideration of the substitution. 20 Cal. Jur. p. 250, § 5. The whole question is one of fact and depends upon all the facts and circumstances of the particular case. In the case at bar the mere assignment by Voight to the plaintiff did not, of course, establish a novation, in the absence of the consent of the creditor, the defendant. The evidence must show an acceptance by the creditor of the substitution. The letter from Voight to the defendant informing him of the assignment and declaring that he would no longer be liable on the contract did not of itself accomplish a novation, but the letter may reasonably and fairly be interpreted as an offer on the part of Voight to release himself and substitute the plaintiff in his place. This was the conclusion of the trial court. The only remaining question is whether the defendant accepted this offer. This acceptance may be shown to have been made by acts as well as by words. That is, the acceptance may be inferred from conduct. In the case of Leary v. United States, 224 U. S. 567, 32 S. Ct. 599, 56 L. Ed. 889, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1029, the court found it necessary to determine, before it could grant relief, whether or not an express contract had been entered into. Justice Holmes disposed of this point with the statement (page 575 of 224 U. S., 32 S. Ct. 599, 600): "It [the contract] would be none the less express if it was conveyed by acts importing it than if it was stated in words."

[4, 5] The trial court here, after considering all of the acts of the defendant, specifically found that the defendant gave his consent to the release of Voight and accepted the plaintiff in lieu thereof. It is true that there is some conflict in the evidence on that point, but such conflict was entirely a matter for the trial court. The letter of December 31st, above mentioned, sent by the defendant to the plaintiff, is capable, reasonably, of the interpretation that the defendant acquiesced in the release of Voight and recognized that the plaintiff had stepped into his shoes. This letter alone would be sufficient to sustain the finding. It would serve no useful purpose to recount the other testimony which likewise tends to uphold the finding. Sufficient it is to say that from all the facts and circumstances the finding of the trial court finds ample support in the evidence.

[6] The defendant also contends that he was deprived of a fair trial. The principal basis of this contention is that he was served with a copy of the proposed findings on August 24, 1928; that he immediately prepared objections to the proposed findings (which were never presented to the trial court); that on August 25, 1928, the trial court signed the findings, of which fact the defendant was notified on August 27, 1928. It is at once obvious that the provisions of section 634 of the Code of Civil Procedure were not complied with. The defendant contends that the failure to comply with this Code section is, under the facts of this case, reversible error. The cases do not so hold. It is clear that the above section was adopted for the purpose of aiding the trial court in making proper findings. If the findings are proper, no reversible error has occurred. If they are improper that will appear on the appeal. Amundson v. Shafer, 36 Cal. App. 398, 401, 172 P. 173; Sadicoff, etc., v. Jackson, 46 Cal. App. 256, 189 P. 111.

We find no merit in any other assignment of error. The judgment is affirmed.

STARKWEATHER v. EDDY.

L. A. 10525.

Supreme Court of California.

Oct. 17, 1930.

1. Malicious prosecution ☞56.

Plaintiff, found not guilty on criminal charge, cannot recover for malicious prosecution unless he prove both malice and want of probable cause.

2. Malicious prosecution ☞59(10).

Evidence that defendant brought criminal charge on advice of prosecuting officers is admissible in action for malicious prosecution on question of probable cause.

3. Malicious prosecution ☞22.

Before fact that defendant brought criminal charge on advice of prosecuting officers can constitute defense in action for malicious prosecution, it must appear that defendant made complete disclosure and acted in good faith.

4. Malicious prosecution ☞64(2).

Finding that defendant in malicious prosecution action had made full disclosure to prosecuting officers before bringing criminal charge held unsupported.

5. Malicious prosecution ☞64(1).

In action for malicious prosecution, finding that plaintiff without cause leveled firearms at defendant, demanding possession of land, held unsupported.

6. Judgment ☞715(3).

Judgment in action to quiet title held not res judicata of issue of malice and probable cause in action for malicious prosecution of a criminal charge.

SHENK, J.

This action is one for malicious prosecution growing out of the acquittal of the plaintiff of a charge brought by the defendant of assault with a deadly weapon. The case was tried before the court without a jury, judgment being rendered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

The assault charge arose out of the following facts: The plaintiff was a large stockholder in the Minarets Mining Company, a corporation, whose principal properties are located in the high Sierras in Mono and Madera counties. For several years prior to the events about to be recounted, the plaintiff and the defendant had been connected with opposing factions; both sides being desirous of gaining control of the corporation. Early in 1921 the directors of the corporation had appointed the defendant president and general manager. This appointment the plaintiff contended was not valid, for the reason that the board of directors making the appointment had not been validly elected.

At the mining property, it appears there were two cabins, one known as the lower cabin close to the workings of the mine, and the other known as the upper cabin, being some distance from the mine. The upper cabin had been formerly owned and occupied by the plaintiff, but had later been sold to the corporation. Even after such sale, the plaintiff on occasions had occupied the cabin either while doing assessment work at the mine, or while running a guide business in the mountains.

It appears that the 1920 assessment work at the mine had not been completed, and that, in order to preserve the property, that work, under the law, had to be started by July 1, 1921. About the middle of May, 1921, the plaintiff had taken possession of the upper cabin. There can be no doubt that he intended to relocate the claims for himself and friends if the corporation failed in its assessment work. In addition to this purpose, the plaintiff had occupied the cabin with the intention of carrying on his guide business, having brought his horses and sleds with him.

On June 13, 1921, between the hours of 8 and 9 o'clock a. m., the defendant accompanied by several employees, arrived at the upper cabin, intending to start on the assessment work. They noticed unmistakable indications that the cabin was occupied, but no one answered their calls and knocks. As a matter of fact, the plaintiff and his son were in the cabin, but for their own reasons did not choose to answer. The defendant and his men then proceeded to a nearby barn and returned to the upper cabin a little later. One of the defendant's men was at that time carrying a box containing 25 pounds of dynamite, and another was carrying a long coil of fuse. All this could be seen by the plaintiff from the cabin. Upon arriving in front of the cabin, one of the men, and probably the defendant himself, suggested that the dynamite be put under the house and touched off, in order to bring out the occupants. The plaintiff and his son, upon hearing these threats, immediately vacated the premises via the windows. The plaintiff was armed with a revolver, while his son was armed with a rifle. With these weapons they "covered" the defendant and his men, who, except for the dynamite, were unarmed. The defendant and his men cried out that they were unarmed, and that the dynamite threat was only a joke, whereupon the plaintiff's son said the rifle and pistol were also a joke, and offered his rifle to the defendant, who refused it. The plaintiff and the defendant then engaged in a short dispute, the defendant finally leaving with a threat to return with the sheriff and put the plaintiff in jail. The defendant thereupon hastened to Bridgeport, the county seat of Mono county, and laid some of the facts, at least, before the district attorney, emphasizing the gun incident, but, as will appear, placing very little emphasis on the dynamite incident. The defendant then, upon the advice of the district attorney charged the plaintiff with an assault with a deadly weapon, and a warrant was issued. The plaintiff was thereupon arrested and lodged in jail and kept there over two days. Upon his preliminary hearing he was released on his own recognizance and upon the subsequent trial found not guilty. The plaintiff thereupon brought this action for malicious prosecution against the defendant, the complaint being filed in 1922, but the action not being tried until 1926. The answer of the defendant admitted all of the allegations of the complaint save that the defendant had acted maliciously and without probable cause. During the course of the trial the defendant offered in evidence the complete record of an action brought in the superior court of Mono county, entitled Minarets Mining Company v. Starkweather, in which action the title of the corporation was quieted against Starkweather. One of the findings in that action, which action was not commenced until 1923 and judgment rendered in 1924, stated that Starkweather was then and had been since 1917 a trespasser on the property. The trial court believed that this judgment, from which no appeal was taken, was binding and conclusive in the malicious prosecution action for some reason that does not appear.

[1-4] Before discussing the points involved on this appeal, some general remarks are necessary concerning the nature of an action for malicious prosecution of a criminal action. In such cases it is well settled that, even though the person so charged is found not guilty on the criminal charge, he cannot recover unless he prove both malice and want of probable cause. Although malice may be inferred from lack of probable cause, the burden rests on the plaintiff to prove the above two elements, and, unless he does so, he cannot recover. Lee v. Levison, 173 Cal. 166, 168, 159 P. 438; Runo v. Williams, 162 Cal. 444, 450, 122 P. 1082; Pickering v. Havens, 70 Cal. App. 381, 233 P. 346; Franklin v. Irvine, 52 Cal. App. 286, 198 P. 647; Redgate v. Southern Pac. Co., 24 Cal. App. 573, 583, 141 P. 1191. It is also well settled that evidence of the fact that the defendant brought the charge on the advice of counsel or on the advice of the prosecuting officers is admissible on the question of probable cause, but, in order to constitute a defense it must affirmatively appear that the defendant made a full, fair, and complete disclosure of all the facts, and acted in good faith on the advice. Dunlap v. New Zealand F. & M. I. Co., 109 Cal. 365, 369, 42 P. 29; Sandell v. Sherman, 107 Cal. 391, 397, 40 P. 493; Hewelcke v. Shipman, 65 Cal. App. 257, 265, 223 P. 1019; Braga v. Ponte, 50 Cal. App. 94, 98, 194 P. 514; Jirku v. Brod, 42 Cal. App. 796, 798, 184 P. 413; Montz v. Nevins, 40 Cal. App. 202, 207, 180 P. 537. In this case the trial court found that the defendant "did then and there fully, fairly, truthfully, impartially and correctly and without malice state and relate to said district attorney each, all and every of the facts and circumstances, and all of the evidence in relation to said offense." This finding is attacked by the plaintiff as unsupported by the evidence. In this we agree. The district attorney was called as a witness by the defendant. On his direct and cross-examinations he was thoroughly interrogated by both counsel as to his conversation with the defendant, and in no way even mentioned that the defendant had told him of the dynamite incident. That incident was very material, inasmuch as no assault was made if the plaintiff acted in self-defense. Upon being recalled later in the trial, he did testify that "I understood something about there was dynamite there." The defendant testified: "I told him about the joke about the dynamite. I might have told him that we had a box of powder and I might not." This evidence does not appear to us to be sufficient to sustain the finding above quoted.

[5] Another material finding is not supported by the evidence. The court found: "That the defendant demanded of the plaintiff in a quiet and peaceful manner possession of said property. * * * That thereupon said plaintiff and his said son without just cause, excuse or provocation drew and leveled the said firearms at and upon the defendant." If that finding is supported, the plaintiff was guilty of the assault. But it is admitted that he was found not guilty. The fact is, however, that the evidence does not support the finding; the evidence of the defendant himself being contrary thereto. The defendant in his direct examination, after testifying that he and his men had gone to the lower cabin and then returned to the upper cabin and again knocked on the door, stated:

"* * * Not getting any response we rested a while; and one of the boys says 'Let's put some dynamite under the cabin and wake them up.'"

"Q. By the Court: And did you have dynamite with you? A. Yes sir. There was about a half a box of dynamite that had been in the tunnel all winter and was wet and had been frozen. We brought it up—I had one of the boys bring it up. And we set it down when we was waiting to see if anybody was there. And one of the boys had a roll of fuse on his arm that was in the tunnel, but we had no caps. * * *

"Q. By Mr. Davis: * * * What was said then on that occasion? A. Why, I think that remark [about placing the dynamite under the house] was made by two or three different ones, and it might possibly have been made by myself. * * * And soon after that remark was made one of the boys had a book that he had gotten at the lower cabin. He threw the book on the porch. And the next instant we faced guns. * * *

Moreover, the defendant corroborated the testimony of the plaintiff that, immediately upon the defendant's crying out that he was unarmed, and stating that the dynamite threat was a joke, the plaintiff's son stated that the guns were a joke, and offered the defendant his rifle, which was refused. From that testimony we do not perceive any such "quiet and peaceful" demand as is described in the finding above quoted, nor do we find any evidence to support the finding that the plaintiff acted without "excuse or provocation." When we consider the above testimony in connection with the long animosity that existed between these parties, it would appear that the plaintiff was amply justified in believing that the defendant was going to carry out the threat and therefore acted in self-defense. At any rate, the finding above quoted is not supported by the evidence.

[6] In another respect the trial court was in error. As stated above, the defendant introduced in evidence the entire record of a quiet title suit commenced in 1923 by the Minarets Mining Company against the plaintiff, and in which the judgment was rendered in 1924 in favor of the corporation. In that action there was a finding that the "possession of said defendant [the plaintiff herein] * * * since March 17, 1917, was unlawful and wrongful. * * *" The trial court evidently believed that that finding in the quiet title action, filed after the facts herein involved took place and between different parties, was decisive of the malicious prosecution action. On different occasions the court stated: "This court is bound by that judgment as it stands now." And again: "I want to say frankly to you gentlemen I will not overrule that judgment the way it stands, and if that judgment stands this case is dismissed." So impressed was the trial judge with the judgment, that he granted a long continuance until the entire record could be produced. We cannot discover any reason sustaining the court's viewpoint that the judgment was binding in this case. Assuming that the judgment was res judicata as to the point that the plaintiff herein on June 13, 1921, was a trespasser on the property, which point we do not find it necessary to decide, how that fact could be conclusive on the issue of whether the defendant acted without malice and with probable cause in charging the plaintiff with an assault with a deadly weapon, does not appear. To state the proposition is to answer it. Any such theory was and is incorrect.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment must be reversed. In so doing we in no way hold that the plaintiff has, upon the evidence produced, sustained the burden cast upon him in such an action. That is a question to be decided on the new trial, if one be had. We hold that the enumerated findings are not supported by the evidence, and that the trial court proceeded on an erroneous theory under which the plaintiff's testimony could be given no weight.

The judgment is reversed.

IN RE MCARTHUR'S ESTATE.

L. A. 11246.

Supreme Court of California.

Oct. 1, 1930.

1. Descent and distribution ☞52(1).

Ordinarily, term "widow" means woman whose husband is dead and who has not married again.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Widow," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Descent and distribution ☞61.

Sister and sole heir of deceased brother was entitled, on death of widow, to his share of community estate, regardless of widow's remarriage (Civ. Code, § 1386, subds. 4, 8, and § 1401).

Although community property vests in widow under Civ. Code, § 1401, with full power of disposition thereover, and widow apparently would be entitled to property under blanket provisions of section 1386, subd. 4, such section deals with property of wife other than that which came through her husband or through marriage, dealt with in subdivision 8, expressly providing for disposition of community property on death of widow.

3. Descent and distribution ☞61.

Interests of relatives of one spouse may vest under statute, regardless of whether other spouse left any relatives to claim share (Civ. Code, § 1386, subd. 8).

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Hudner, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Iva Farrand McArthur, deceased. From a judgment directing distribution of the estate, Lillian Mae Flint appeals.

Reversed, with directions.

Superseding opinion, 284 P. 718.

H. G. Simpson, of Pasadena, for appellant.

Victor T. Watkins and Hugh A. McNary, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, J.

The decedent was formerly the wife of William W. Farrand. He died on September 1, 1920. Subsequently she married Samuel L. McArthur. On May 7, 1926, she died intestate, leaving no issue of either marriage. McArthur, her second husband, survived her.

All of the property of her estate included in the petition for distribution involved herein was, at the time of the death of Farrand, her first husband, the community property of Farrand and herself.

McArthur, the second and surviving husband, claimed the whole of the property. Lillian Mae Flint, the sister and sole heir of Farrand, the first husband, objected, contending that one-half thereof should be distributed to her.

The court determined that the surviving husband was entitled to the whole, and, McArthur having died during administration, distributed the property to his estate. This appeal is taken by the said sister.

The single issue presented by this case is as to the interpretation of section 1386, subdivision 8, of the Civil Code, which reads as follows:

"If the deceased is a widow, or widower, and leaves no issue, and the estate, or any portion thereof, was common property of such decedent and his or her deceased spouse, while such spouse was living, such property goes in equal shares to the children of such deceased spouse and to the descendants of such children by right of representation, and if none, then one half of such common property goes to the father and mother of such decedent in equal shares, or to the survivor of them if either be dead, or if both be dead, then in equal shares to the brothers and sisters of such decedent and to the descendants of any deceased brother or sister by right of representation, and the other half goes to the father and mother of such deceased spouse in equal shares, or to the survivor of them if either be dead, or if both be dead, then in equal shares to the brothers and sisters of such deceased spouse and to the descendants of any deceased brother or sister by right of representation.

"If the estate, or any portion thereof, was separate property of such deceased spouse, while living, and came to such decedent from such spouse by descent, devise, or bequest, such property goes in equal shares to the children of such spouse and to the descendants of any deceased child by right of representation, and if none, then to the father and mother of such spouse, in equal shares, or to the survivor of them if either be dead, or if both be dead, then in equal shares to the brothers and sisters of such spouse and to the descendants of any deceased brother or sister by right of representation."

The meaning and effect of this statute in the ordinary case is quite clear. A husband dies intestate, leaving his surviving wife and no issue. The estate consists of community property. The whole of such property vests in the widow under section 1401 of the Civil Code. She has full power of disposition over it. But, if she fails to exercise such power, and dies intestate, leaving no issue, an important problem arises: Shall the property accumulated by the joint efforts of both the husband and the wife, go solely to the wife's heirs, merely by reason of the fact that the husband predeceased her? The statute meets the problem by providing that one-half of the property shall go to certain designated members of the deceased husband's family or their descendants.

In the instant case, if the decedent be considered the widow of Farrand, then the statute applies, and the property should have been divided between her sole heir, her surviving husband, McArthur, and her deceased husband's sister. It is the contention of respondent, however, that, upon her subsequent remarriage to McArthur, she ceased to be the widow of Farrand, and that thereupon the statute no longer applied. The trial court so concluded, and distributed the property without regard to subdivision 8.

[1, 2] The primary question, then, is as to the interpretation to be placed upon the term

"widow" as used in the section. Ordinarily it means a woman whose husband is dead and who has not married again. Webster's New International Dictionary, p. 2334; Bouvier's Law Dictionary, vol. 3, p. 3454; Black's Law Dictionary, p. 1227; 40 Cyc. 934; Appeal of Kerns, 120 Pa. 523, 14 A. 435; In re Ryan's Estate, 174 Mo. App. 202, 156 S. W. 759; Rosenbloom v. Southern Pacific Co., 59 Cal. App. 102, 210 P. 53. But there is considerable authority holding that the term may, when used in a statute, be applied to a woman who, though a widow of her former husband, has remarried. In re Ray's Estate, 13 Misc. Rep. 480, 35 N. Y. S. 481, 484, comes to the following conclusion: "A woman, though the wife of another, is still the widow of her former husband; though married to another woman, the husband is still the widower of his former wife. * * * The law invests them with the name of 'husband' or 'wife' or 'widow' for certain legal purposes, and under these names, although the designation may not come within the definition of the dictionary, property may vest in them, whether it comes to them by legacy or otherwise. Notwithstanding the definitions of the words 'wife,' 'widow,' and 'husband,' we apprehend it is not our duty to accept them in place of the statutes of this state, which make use of these words, whether correctly or not, to designate persons entitled to certain legal rights." In Davis v. Neal, 100 Ark. 399, 140 S. W. 278, 279, L. R. A. 1916A, 999, the question was whether a woman who had remarried upon the death of her former husband, came within the terms of a homestead exemption for the "widow or child or children of any deceased person, who was when living, entitled to the benefits of this act." The court said (page 279 of 140 S. W.): "We think that the word 'widow,' as used in the act, refers to the person, and not to her state or condition, whether she remains a widow or marries again. The rule is that, whenever a right of law is attached to a person by reason of her being a widow, such right remains, unless other words are used in the act which limit it. If the Legislature had intended that her right of homestead should cease when she married again, it would doubtless have used words of that import such as during her widowhood which would refer to her state or condition, and not to the person, or would have added the words 'until she marries again' or 'so long as she remains unmarried.'" (Italics ours.) The case of Iltz v. Krieger, 104 Or. 59, 202 P. 409, 206 P. 550, reaches a similar result. In Mathews v. Marsden et al., 71 Mont. 502, 230 P. 775, at page 778, it is said: "We think that the word 'widow,' as used in both of these sections of our Codes, refers to the person and not to her state or condition, whether she remains a widow or marries again. We are of the opinion that it was not the purpose of our Legislature, to penalize a widow in case of her remarriage. * * * See, also, Hansen v. Brann & Stewart Co., 90 N. J. Law, 444, 103 A. 696.

Such decisions are of no direct aid in the solution of the problem before us, but they are nevertheless of the highest value, for they indicate that the term is not of fixed and positive meaning, but on the contrary calls for construction. Our situation is aptly characterized by the court in the case of In re Ray's Estate, supra, as follows: " * * * We are confronted with the definitions of the word 'widow' as stated in the various dictionaries * * * and by the argument, based on these definitions, that in order to be a widow she must remain unmarried. The question at issue is not whether these definitions are correct, but what is the legal import, meaning, effect, and object of the words 'wife or widow of a son,' * * * as these words are used in this and other statutes of this state, or, if the language made use of to express the intention of those who prepared and passed the law is not clear, what construction will best accomplish the design." (Italics ours.)

It follows that this court is charged with the duty of construing our own statute to determine the legislative intent. In this connection, we should observe that practically the only aid to interpretation to which we have been directed, or to which research has led us, is the statute itself, for the few decisions which have dealt with subdivision 8 have not mentioned the problem herein presented, with the exception of Estate of Underhill, 190 Cal. 233, 211 P. 801, in which the question was expressly left open. Our inquiry is, therefore, whether section 1386 of the Civil Code, and particularly subdivision 8 thereof, discloses any definite purpose which might indicate the sense in which the term "widow" was used in said subdivision. In brief, did the Legislature intend that the remarriage of a widow should eliminate the rule laid down in subdivision 8, and make the descent of the property follow the rules set forth in the other subdivisions?

The provisions of subdivision 8, in so far as they are relevant here, may be briefly summarized. In the first place, the subdivision deals with descent from a widow. Second, it deals with community property which vested in such widow by the death of her husband. Third, it covers a situation where there are no issue of the widow nor children of the deceased husband.

The purpose of these provisions is quite obvious. Subdivision 8 does not, of course, limit the testamentary power of the widow as to such property. Thus the decedent in the instant case had full control over it, and could have deeded it or willed it to her new husband or to any one else. Estate of Hill, 179 Cal. 683, 178 P. 710; Estate of Brady, 171 Cal. 3, 151 P. 275; Estate of Wenks, 171 Cal.

607, 154 P. 24; Veirs v. Roberts, 39 Cal. App. 684, 179 P. 689; Estate of Marshall, 42 Cal. App. 683, 184 P. 43; Wright v. Rohr, 41 Cal. App. 265, 182 P. 469. Nor does the subdivision conflict with other parts of section 1386. There is no indication that it is to be construed as subordinate to subdivision 4. Subdivision 4 gives the surviving husband the whole of the property of a deceased wife, where she leaves neither issue, parents, brothers, or sisters, nor children or grandchildren of a deceased brother or sister. Subdivision 8, which comes afterward, deals with a special class of property, and to that extent constitutes, it would seem, an exception to the blanket provisions of subdivision 4. In other words, subdivision 8 does not limit the right of a surviving husband to succeed to the whole of his wife's estate in the absence of the surviving relatives specified in subdivision 4, where such property came to her from any source save that specified in subdivision 8. But it does limit the right of the surviving husband to succeed to the wife's estate, where that estate came to her through the death of her former husband, either as his separate property, or as community property vesting in her under section 1401 of the Civil Code. In this situation, therefore, and with respect to property of such origin, subdivision 8 makes a rule of succession designed to benefit the objects of the bounty of the former owner—the deceased husband. It seeks to turn the descent of such property back to the line from which it was diverted by the first marriage of the wife, that is, back to the husband's family, instead of permitting it to go to the wife's family. In the case of community property, one-half goes back in this manner. In the case of separate property, the whole goes back. See Estate of Simonton, 183 Cal. 53, 58, 190 P. 442. With respect to the community property, the theory seems clear enough. The idea of the community under our statutes is that the whole undisposed of estate should go to the survivor, who was, during the lifetime, a member of the community and a contributor to the acquisition of the property. Hence, when the husband dies without making a will, the wife takes the whole. By this special rule embodied in section 1401 of the Civil Code, the deceased husband's share of such property is diverted from his family—parents, brothers and sisters, etc.—to his wife. But, upon the death of the wife, the reason for this special rule disappears, and the statute therefore provides that the one-half of the property representing the former interest of the deceased husband shall go back in the normal line of succession to his family, and not the family of his wife. This view is expressed in Estate of Brady, 171 Cal. 1, 4, 151 P. 275, 276, where it is said: "The apparent object of subdivision 8, where both spouses die without lineal descendants, is to provide for the inheritance of the property equally by the respective families of the two spouses by whose efforts it was accumulated."

The obvious conclusion from the above is that subdivision 8, in so far as it deals with the deceased husband's former interest in the property, is not concerned with the matter of relationship to the wife. As to that interest, the wife's parents, brothers, and sisters, etc., are definitely excluded, in favor of persons who bear no blood relationship to the wife at all, namely, the parents and brothers and sisters of the deceased husband. The subdivision makes the origin of the property, and not the closeness of the relationship to the wife, the test of succession in the particular situation covered by it. Hence it is illogical in this case to speak of the close relationship of the new husband, and his relative superiority, as an object of the wife's bounty, over her deceased husband's family. We are not here concerned with the objects of the wife's bounty. If we were, then her father and mother, or brothers and sisters, should all take to the exclusion of those of her deceased husband. They all have superior claims on the wife, just as has the new husband. But the statute does not so provide, and the provision that it does make shows unmistakably that the Legislature intended, in the particular situation covered by subdivision 8, that the origin of the property should indicate the persons to be benefited. Where the property, either in whole or in part, has its origin with the deceased husband, the statute provides that the whole or such part shall go to the objects of his bounty, not hers.

If this be the correct interpretation of the statute, it is clear that the remarriage of the widow can have no effect upon its operation, for such remarriage has nothing to do with the persons whom the statute attempts to benefit. So far as the objects of the husband's bounty are concerned, it is immaterial whether she remarries or not, for her new husband is as much a stranger to the family of her old husband, as are her other relatives.

Looking now not at the provisions of subdivision 8, but at its important omissions, we find additional support for these views. That the Legislature contemplated the passage of years between the deaths of the husband and wife is clear from the enactment of the statute. See Estate of Brady, 171 Cal. 1, 4, 151 P. 275. If it contemplated that years might so elapse, it must certainly have contemplated the possibility of remarriage by the survivor. This being so, a failure to limit the application of the statute to a widow who remains unmarried is, under the authorities discussed above, an indication that no such result was intended. See Davis v. Neal, 100 Ark. 399, 140 S. W. 278, L. R. A. 1916A, 999, supra; Mathews v. Marsden et al., 71 Mont. 502, 230 P. 775, supra. Subdivision 8 makes no such limitation. Moreover, it expressly provides for the issue of the decedent: such issue would take instead of the deceased spouse's family. But nothing is said about a new and surviving spouse, notwithstanding the fact that elsewhere in the same section a surviving spouse and a child are deemed equal in right to inherit. Civ. Code, § 1386, subd. 1. The omission seems deliberate and equivalent to an express exclusion. See Estate of Underhill, 190 Cal. 233, 235, 211 P. 801.

We are not unmindful of the blanket provision of subdivision 4, which reads, "If the decedent leaves a surviving husband or wife, and neither issue, father, mother, brother, sister, nor the children or grandchildren of a deceased brother or sister, the whole estate goes to the surviving husband or wife," and of the added difficulties presented by this subdivision. To us, however, it hardly seems that subdivision 4 was intended to apply to the special situation of subdivision 8. Subdivision 4, like all previous subdivisions, is not concerned with the origin of the property. It deals with property of the wife other than that which came through her husband or through the marriage as provided in subdivision 8. And here we may point out that it is immaterial that the wife is the owner of the property. With respect to her new husband, the estate is her separate property, the moment of her former husband's death, and it remains her property whether she remarries or not. See Estate of Brady, 171 Cal. 1, 6, 151 P. 275. Subdivision 4, which does not deal with the origin of the property, cannot be construed as limiting or modifying subdivision 8.

To adopt the view contended for by respondent, that the Legislature intended to exclude from subdivision 8 a widow who subsequently remarried, would lead to results which are contrary to the plain purpose of the provision. Take, for example, the separate property of the deceased husband. Under the statute, when the widow dies without issue, the whole of such property goes back to the line of the deceased husband. Where the wife remarries, if she is not deemed a widow, none of such property goes back to the line of the deceased husband, but only half of it ordinarily goes to the new, surviving husband. The other half goes to the father and mother, or brother and sister, etc. of the wife (Civ. Code, § 1386, subd. 2), who would not take at all if she were a widow within the meaning of the statute. In other words, the remarriage of the wife serves, under this interpretation, to confer a new right on others than the new husband, strangers both to the marriage and to the origin of the property, a purely arbitrary and illogical result which cannot be deemed to have been the intention of the Legislature.

Again, suppose the deceased husband has a child by a previous marriage, and upon his death, community property vests in the surviving wife. She then remarries. If she is still a widow under subdivision 8, the property goes to the child of her former husband. Estate of Marshall, 42 Cal. App. 683, 184 P. 43. If she is not, her new husband, a stranger to the acquisition of the property, takes the whole under subdivision 4, to the exclusion of a child of one of the parties who contributed to the acquisition thereof.

[3] Other examples might perhaps be found, but these are sufficient to show that the construction of the term "widow" which is urged by respondent would frequently lead to results entirely inconsistent with the purposes of the statute; and, on the other hand, the construction for which appellant contends appears to carry out these purposes. We cannot agree with respondent that the effect of this latter construction would be that, while the sister of a deceased spouse would take one-half of the property, the rest would, in our situation, escheat to the state. While such a result might be suggested from the absence of any mention of a surviving husband in subdivision 8, it is palpably unsound. Escheat only takes place when there are neither kindred nor heirs of the decedent (Civ. Code, § 1386, subd. 9); and, irrespective of the provisions of subdivision 8, the remaining one-half of the property not distributable to any persons named therein must be deemed to pass to McArthur as the surviving husband or heir of Mrs. McArthur. This point is, however, not involved in the present appeal. Appellant makes claim to but one half the property, and does not object to the order of distribution to McArthur to the extent of the other half. It has been decided by this court that the interests of the relatives of one spouse may vest, under this subdivision, regardless of whether the other spouse left any relatives to claim their share. Estate of Ross, 187 Cal. 454, 202 P. 641.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to modify its decree of distribution so as to provide that one-half the community property in question shall be distributed to Lillian Mae Flint, appellant herein, and the remaining one-half to the estate of Samuel L. McArthur.

TERRY TRADING CORPORATION v. BARSKY.

L. A. 10521.

Supreme Court of California.

Oct. 1, 1930.

1. Appeal and error *§*843(4).

Sufficiency of denial of payee's allegation of nonpayment of note need not be considered, in absence of contention by maker that note was paid.

2. Usury *§*115.

That ostensibly lawful transaction constituted usurious loan, with intent to evade statute, may always be shown.

3. Usury *§*52.

That maker of note may have been required to enter into unprofitable contract, as condition to loan, would not itself make loan usurious.

4. Usury *§*12.

That usurious interest is described as payments for services or materials furnished by lender or his agent is immaterial, if actually intended as interest.

5. Usury *§*12.

Test of existence of usury is whether there was intent to evade law, circumstances and negotiations preceding transaction being competent in determining intent.

6. Usury *§*113.

Maker of note has heavy burden of proof in establishing alleged usury.

7. Evidence *§*35.

Under statute, California courts will take judicial notice of Usury Law of New York (3 Birdseye, Cumming & Gilbert's Consol. Laws [2d Ed.] p. 2950, § 370 et seq.), where note in controversy was executed (Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, subd. 3).

8. Usury *§*111(2).

Defense of usury need not be pleaded, since court, as in other cases of illegality, will deny recovery of usurious interest on its own motion.

9. Usury *§*142(3).

Maker of usurious note need not file cross-complaint for treble interest, but may recover by counterclaim (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 438, 442).

10. Pleading *§*142.

Whether pleading is counterclaim or cross-complaint will be determined from allegations, regardless of improper designation (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 438, 442).

11. Pleading *§*147.

Counterclaim and cross-complaint by maker of note, alleging breach of contract, and plaintiff payee's collection of various moneys from maker's customers, necessitating accounting, held sufficiently to state cause of action (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 438, 442).

Defendant alleged that note in controversy was one of series given to pay for printing motion picture positives, under contract requiring plaintiff to use stock specified by defendant, and that plaintiff, disregarding specifications, used inferior stock, damaging defendant in stated amount. Defendant further alleged that, as security for loan, he assigned to plaintiff right to collect certain moneys receivable from defendant's customers, and that plaintiff had collected unknown amount, believed to exceed loan, and had refused accounting.

12. Set-off and counterclaim *§*23.

Counterclaim by maker of note for breach of contract, and demand that payee account for moneys collected under contract, held proper under statute requiring merely that counterclaim must tend to diminish or defeat recovery (Code Civ. Proc. § 438).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 438, as amended in 1927, sole requisites of counterclaim are that it must tend to diminish or defeat plaintiff's recovery, and must exist in favor of defendant and against plaintiff between whom several judgment might be had. Under this amendment, there need be no connection between cause of action in complaint and that alleged in counterclaim.

13. Set-off and counterclaim *§*8(1).

That demand for accounting is equitable in nature is no objection to its assertion in action at law on note (Code Civ. Proc. § 438).

Under system of Code pleading, equitable defenses and counterclaims are available in actions at law, as well as legal defenses and counterclaims in suits in equity.

14. Set-off and counterclaim *§*35(1).

That counterclaim is based upon unliquidated demand is no objection (Code Civ. Proc. § 438).

15. Set-off and counterclaim *§*59.

Affirmative relief may properly be sought by counterclaim, which may not only defeat plaintiff's recovery, but result in affirmative judgment for defendant (Code Civ. Proc. § 438).

16. Pleading 34(1).

To deny party right to trial, there must be obvious failure of pleadings to state cause of action or defense (Code Civ. Proc. § 452).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 452, pleadings are to be liberally construed with view to substantial justice between parties.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon R. Yankwich, Judge.

Action by the Terry Trading Corporation against Bud Barsky, doing business under the name of Bud Barsky Productions, with a counterclaim and cross-complaint by defendant. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Reversed, with directions.

Nathan Goldberg and Edward Linder, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John W. Hart and Delvy T. Walton, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, J.

This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment for plaintiff, entered after an order sustaining general demurrers to defendant's answer and cross-complaint, without leave to amend.

The action was brought to collect the sum due on a promissory note. The complaint was filed August 10, 1927. The chief allegations of the said complaint are that the said note was for $17,512.71, with interest at 6 per cent.; that it was executed and delivered by defendant to plaintiff in New York City on October 6, 1926; that by its terms it was payable at Bank of Italy, Hollywood, Cal., nine months after date; that it became due on July 6, 1927; that no part of the principal nor interest has been paid except the sum of $1,200; and that the balance due and unpaid amounts to $16,687.38 principal, $389.52 interest, together with interest on the said balance of the principal at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from February 14, 1927, to July 6, 1927, and thereafter at the rate of 7 per cent.

On September 26, 1927, defendant filed an answer, which included a counterclaim, and also filed a cross-complaint. General and special demurrers to each were sustained. Defendant filed an amended answer, containing two separate defenses and a counterclaim, and an amended cross-complaint containing three causes of action. General demurrers were sustained to the amended answer and to the first two causes of action in the amended cross-complaint. A second amended answer and cross-complaint were filed. This time general demurrers to each were sustained without leave to amend. Thereafter, on January 17, 1928, judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff as prayed for.

[1] An examination of the pleadings shows that defendant does not directly allege that he has paid the note, and he makes no such contention in his brief. It is therefore unnecessary to consider the sufficiency of the denial of the allegation of nonpayment in the first defense. The facts relied upon in such first defense are more fully and more properly pleaded elsewhere.

The elements of defendant's case, set forth with some duplication in the answer and cross-complaint, boil down to pleas of usury and breach of contract, and a demand for an accounting.

In the answer it is alleged, in substance, that the note sued upon is one of a series executed by the defendant in accordance with a certain contract, dated July 29, 1925, between plaintiff and defendant, the said contract being incorporated by reference into the answer; that a rate of interest was charged in excess of that permitted by the law; and that the excess interest amounts to the sum of $6,500, which is included as a part of the principal in the note sued upon herein. In the first cause of action of the cross-complaint more facts are stated. Among other things, it is alleged that by the terms of the above-mentioned contract, defendant agreed to use the laboratory of Hirlagrap Company, plaintiff's agent, exclusively, for the development of its films for a period of five years, and to secure certain materials from said agent of plaintiff at an excessive price, the result being an overcharge for the loan of about $6,500; that under said contract defendant assigned all of his contracts with his customers and the right to collect the sums due thereon to plaintiff, and that plaintiff has made collections in excess of $6,500; and that the said contract is a "scheme and device" on the part of plaintiff to evade the Usury Act (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii).

[2-6] The courts will not permit an evasion of the Usury Law by any subterfuge, and it is always permissible to show that a transaction, ostensibly lawful, actually constituted a usurious loan and was made with intent to evade the statute. Haines v. Commercial Mortgage Co., 200 Cal. 609, 616, 254 P. 956, 255 P. 805, 53 A. L. R. 725. Of course, the mere fact that defendant may have been required to enter into an unprofitable contract as a condition to a loan of money would not itself make the loan usurious. On the other hand, the law would be violated if the lender provided for a lawful rate of interest in the note itself, but required additional and excessive interest by the terms of a collateral agreement. Nor would it make any difference that the additional and excessive amounts of interest were designated as payments for services or materials furnished by the lender or his agent, if they were actually intended as interest. The test is whether there was the intent to evade the law, and the circumstances and negotiations which preceded the transaction may be material in determining such intent. Lamb v. Herndon, 97 Cal. App. 193, 275 P. 503; Douglass v. Boulevard Co. et al., 91 Conn. 601, 100 A. 1067; Lowenstein & Sons v. British-American Mfg. Co. (D. C.) 300 F. 853; Clemens v. Crane, 234 Ill. 215, 84 N. E. 884; cases collected in notes, 21 A. L. R. 797, 812, 53 A. L. R. 746; Coffin, Usury in California, 16 Cal. L. Rev. 296, 415, 416, 422. It is said by the court in Douglass v. Boulevard Co. et al., supra, 91 Conn. 601, 100 A. 1067, at page 1068, that: "Whether such an intention is present * * * is always a question of fact for the jury. No device can be invented and no disguise can be put on which will make a contract valid if behind or underneath an intent to evade the statute is found. It then must follow that every circumstance surrounding or connected with the transaction is material, if in any manner it will reveal the intention of the parties." And in Clemens v. Crane, supra, 234 Ill. 215, 84 N. E. 884, at page 889, the court said: "It is the constant practice of courts to resort to extrinsic evidence to determine the question of usury. 2 Jones on Evidence, § 441; 1 Elliott on Evidence, § 591; Ferguson v. Sutphen, 3 Gilman, 547; Reeve v. Strawn, 14 Ill. 94. Resort to parol evidence in such cases does not in any way depend upon the existence of an ambiguity in the written contract, but it is justified on the ground that the charge of usury raises a question of the legality of the instrument to the extent that usury, under the statute, renders contracts illegal or void." The authorities leave no doubt as to the right of defendant to have this issue tried. Of course, the burden, and a heavy one, rests upon him to establish the evasion. Stark v. Bauer Cooperage Co. (C. C. A.) 3 F.(2d) 214; Friedman v. Wisconsin Acceptance Corp., 192 Wis. 58, 210 N. W. 831, 53 A. L. R. 758.

[7, 8] A question of conflict of laws is raised by plaintiff, the contention being made that the note recites its execution in New York and its validity is therefore to be governed by the law of New York, despite the fact that the place of payment is in California. There is some uncertainty under the pleadings as to where the note was actually made, and there is some confusion in the decisions as to whether the legality of the note is to be determined by the law of the place of execution, or that of the place of performance. See 6 Page on Contracts, 6217-6223, §§ 3596, 3597, 3598, 3598a; Goodrich, Conflict of Laws, p. 238, § 108. The question is not, however, really involved in this case. New York also has a usury law (General Business Law, art. 25, § 370 et seq., Birdseye, Cummings & Gilbert's Consolidated Laws of New York [2d Ed.], vol. 3, p.

2950), and our courts will take judicial notice of such law (Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, subd. 3). Moreover, usury as a defense need not be pleaded; the court will, as in other cases of illegality, deny the recovery of usurious interest on its own motion. Wallace v. Zinman, 200 Cal. 585, 589, 254 P. 946, 62 A. L. R. 1341. Since there is, therefore, no actual conflict of laws on this point, and no necessity of pleading usury, it would seem that the demurrer served no purpose, and should have been overruled.

[9, 10] Defendant sets up a claim for treble interest by way of cross-complaint. No point is made in the briefs as to which law governs the defendant's remedy, but since it appears that the New York law makes a usurious contract wholly void, there can be no objection to the choice of the less drastic relief sought by defendant under the law of California. Several contentions are made by plaintiff with respect to lack of compliance of this pleading with section 442 of the Code of Civil Procedure, on cross-complaint. We have heretofore held, however, that treble interest may be recovered by counterclaim under section 438 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Rice v. Dunlap, 205 Cal. 133, 270 P. 196. Our courts have on a number of occasions taken note of the uncertain line of division between counterclaim and cross-complaint under our statutes, and have held that the nature of the pleading will be determined from its allegations, regardless of improper designation. Pickwick Stages v. Board of Trustees, 189 Cal. 417, 208 P. 961; Bledsoe v. Stuckey, 47 Cal. App. 95, 190 P. 217; Kirtley v. Perham, 176 Cal. 333, 168 P. 351; Pfister v. Wade, 69 Cal. 133, 10 P. 369; 23 Cal. Jur. 273, § 43.

[11] The second part of defendant's case consists of the plea of breach of contract. In brief, it is alleged that the note was one of a series, executed pursuant to the contract of July 29, 1925; that the note was given in payment of printing motion picture positives in accordance with said contract; that the contract required plaintiff to print upon such stock as defendant might specify; that defendant specified Eastman stock; that plaintiff disregarded said specification and printed upon an inferior and unmerchantable type; and that by reason thereof defendant was damaged in the sum of $10,000. These facts are pleaded as a "defense and counterclaim" in the answer, and also by way of cross-complaint.

As the third cause of action in his cross-complaint, defendant (cross-plaintiff) alleged that under the above-mentioned contract he borrowed the sum of $51,000 from plaintiff (cross-defendant) and as security therefor assigned to plaintiff all of his interest in certain contracts with his customers, and the right to collect all moneys, receivable from said customers; that plaintiff was authorized and instructed in accordance with the contract to credit defendant on his debt with such sums collected; that plaintiff has collected various sums, the exact amount of which is unknown to defendant; that defendant has demanded and has been refused an accounting. It is also alleged on information and belief that plaintiff has collected sums from such customers in excess of moneys which might be due it under the loans referred to in the contract. Accordingly, defendant prays for an accounting and judgment for such excess.

There can be no doubt but that the above allegations of breach of contract and necessity for an accounting sufficiently state a cause of action. The only questions are whether they may properly be pleaded in this action, and if so whether they should have been set up as counterclaims or by cross-complaint.

[12] Under the amendment to section 438 of the Code of Civil Procedure, adopted in 1927 and prior to the filing of the answer and cross-complaint herein, the sole requisites of a counterclaim are that it "must tend to diminish or defeat the plaintiff's recovery and must exist in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff between whom a several judgment might be had in the action." All of the other limitations were abolished by this amendment, and an intent on the part of the Legislature to avoid multiplicity of suits and to have all conflicting claims between the parties settled in a single action was most clearly manifested. In the instant case, obviously, both the claim for damages and the demand that plaintiff account for sums collected and not credited on defendant's obligation tend to diminish or defeat plaintiff's recovery. Under the amendment it is not necessary that there be any connection between the cause of action set up in the complaint and that which forms the basis of the counterclaim. Indeed, the statute contemplates the pleading of unrelated matters as counterclaims by providing that "the court may, in its discretion, order the counterclaim to be tried separately from the claim of the plaintiff." Code Civ. Proc. § 438; McBaine, Recent Pleading Reforms in California, 16 Cal. L. Rev. 366.

Even prior to the amendment, both causes would have been valid counterclaims. Section 438 formerly read as follows: "The counterclaim mentioned in the last section (section four hundred and thirty-seven) must be one existing in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff, between whom a several judgment might be had in the action, and arising out of one of the following causes of action: 1. A cause of action arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action; 2. In an action arising upon contract; any other cause of action arising also upon contract and existing at the commencement of the action."

The counterclaim for damages for breach of contract is not only a "cause of action arising also upon contract," under subdivision 2, supra, but also, under the facts alleged by defendant, "arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint," under subdivision 1, supra. The counterclaim for an accounting is set forth with allegations sufficient to bring it within subdivision 1. The courts have broadly interpreted the "transaction" clause. Thus, in Story & Isham Commercial Co. v. Story, 100 Cal. 31, 34 P. 671, 673, it is said:

"From an early day the tendency of judicial decisions has been to avoid circuity of action and multiplicity of suits, by permitting matters growing out of the same transaction, which might constitute an independent cause of action, to be given in evidence by way of defense; and the foregoing section of the Code of Civil Procedure is an additional legislative step in the direction of this judicial tendency. As a corollary therefrom, it follows that the form in which the plaintiff may set out his cause of action ought not to be conclusive upon the right of the defendant to set forth his counterclaim in his answer. The plaintiff is to set forth the facts which constitute his cause of action; but, if the other facts in the transaction are so connected with those set forth as to defeat their legal effect, the defendant is not precluded from setting them up by reason of the form which the plaintiff may have chosen for presenting his own side of the case. Pom. Rem. & Rem. Rights, § 772; Gordon v. Bruner, 49 Mo. 570; Brady v. Brennan, 25 Minn. 210; Bitting v. Thaxton, 72 N. C. 549; Thompson v. Kessel, 30 N. Y. 383; Chandler v. Childs, 42 Mich. 128, 3 N. W. 297.

"It is for the purpose of enabling the court to render a judgment by which the rights of the parties may be finally determined in the same action, rather than to compel another action, that the Code permits a defendant to set up in his answer any new matter arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim; and, if the plaintiff omits or fails to set forth in his complaint the entire transaction out of which his claim arose, the defendant may supplement this omission by setting forth in his answer the omitted facts, so that the entire transaction may be before the court. The plaintiff is not at liberty to select an isolated act or fact, which is only one of a series of acts or steps in the entire transaction, and insist upon a judgment on this fact alone, if the fact is so connected with others that it forms only a portion of the transaction." (Italics ours.)

See, also, 1 Sutherland, Code Pleading 379, § 633; Pomeroy, Code Remedies (5th Ed.) p.

[13-15] It is, of course, no objection to the demand for an accounting that it is equitable in nature, and is asserted in an action on a note, which is an action "at law." It is well settled that under the system of Code pleading equitable defenses and equitable counterclaims may be set up in actions at law, as well as legal defenses and counterclaims in suits in equity. Roberts v. Donovan, 70 Cal. 108, 112, 9 P. 180, 11 P. 599; Fighiera v. Radis, 180 Cal. 660, 182 P. 418; 1 Sutherland, Code Pleading 376, § 631; Pomeroy, Code Remedies (5th Ed.) p. 1035, § 640, p. 1083, § 668; Weinheimer v. Ross, 205 N. Y. 518, 99 N. E. 145; Wasserman v. Taubin, 129 App. Div. 691, 114 N. Y. S. 447. Nor is it a valid objection to a counterclaim that it is based upon an unliquidated demand. Neither the old nor the new statute requires that the claim be liquidated. Wheelock v. Pacific Pneumatic Gas Co., 51 Cal. 223; 1 Sutherland, Code Pleading, 376, § 631; Clark on Code Pleading, p. 439, § 98. It is likewise perfectly proper to seek affirmative relief by way of counterclaim, which may not only defeat plaintiff's recovery but result in an affirmative judgment for defendant on his counterclaim. Such a judgment was rendered in the case of Story & Isham Commercial Co. v. Story, 100 Cal. 30, 34 P. 671, supra. See, also, Williams v. Pacific Surety Co., 66 Or. 151, 127 P. 145, 131 P. 1021, 132 P. 959, 133 P. 1186; Singer Sewing Mach. Co. v. Burger, 181 N. C. 241, 107 S. E. 14; Clark on Code Pleading, p. 439, § 98; p. 449, § 99.

[16] It is apparent, therefore, that the demurrers were improperly sustained as to these portions of defendant's case. As already pointed out, it is immaterial that the counterclaims were incorrectly designated as parts of a cross-complaint. Plaintiff contends that in a number of instances the allegations of the answer and so-called cross-complaint are lacking in clearness and detail. Doubtless these pleadings could be improved upon, but it can hardly be said that they fail to apprise plaintiff of the defenses and demands for affirmative relief which defendant makes. It is sometimes a difficult task for the pleader to state enough facts to establish his cause of action or defense, and also to avoid the inclusion of confusing evidentiary matter. The Code has provided adequate means for the correction of an error in either direction; the adverse party may move to strike out the evidentiary matter or demur specially to an inadequate statement of the facts on the ground of uncertainty or ambiguity. But to deny the party his right to a trial, there must be an obvious failure of the pleadings to state a cause of action or defense. This is not the case here, and as against the general demurrers, they should stand. We are enjoined by statute to construe pleadings liberally (Code Civ. Proc. § 452), and such has been our practice. Mix v. Yoakum, 200 Cal. 681, 254 P. 557; Menefee v. Oxnam, 42 Cal. App. 81, 183 P. 379; Johnson v. Dixon Farms Co., 29 Cal. App. 52, 155 P. 134, 136.

It follows that the general demurrers were not well taken, and the judgment is therefore reversed with directions to the trial court to overrule the same.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 30, 1930.

1. Municipal corporations ⇨35.

Where consolidation proceeding was completed and municipal franchise admittedly exercised, exercise of control over consolidated territory is de facto and questionable only in appropriate proceeding (St. 1913, p. 577; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 803-810).

2. Quo warranto ⇨54.

Question whether territory was incorporated held not involved in quo warranto proceeding against alleged municipality to oust it from exercise of municipal franchise (St. 1883, p. 93).

Only issue properly involved in quo warranto proceeding was whether city was usurping, intruding into, or unlawfully holding or exercising municipal franchise at time of commencement of action.

3. Quo warranto ⇨61.

Part of judgment in quo warranto proceeding against municipality assuming to declare status of territory upon ouster of municipal franchise, being beyond legitimate issues, held void.

4. Municipal corporations ⇨35.

Consolidated city after completion of consolidation proceedings did not assume jurisdiction over territory subject to final adjudication in quo warranto proceeding against territory consolidated, as municipality (St. 1913, p. 585, § 10, as amended by St. 1915, p. 313, § 3).

5. Quo warranto ☞61.

Final judgment of ouster in quo warranto proceedings against municipality held not retroactive and of no legal effect upon prior exercise of municipal functions.

6. Municipal corporations ☞17.

De facto municipal corporation may participate in consolidation proceeding (St. 1913, p. 577, as amended).

Original proceeding in mandamus by George A. Bray against H. A. Payne, as County Auditor of Los Angeles County.

Peremptory writ denied, and alternative writ discharged.

C. A. Lindeman, of Los Angeles, and Loris V. Cady, of Santa Monica, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and Claude H. McFadden, Deputy Co. Counsel, Erwin B. Werner, City Atty., Sam H. Erwin, Deputy City Atty., Robert J. Stahl, and Arthur M. Ellis, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, J.

This is a proceeding in mandamus to compel the respondent, as county auditor of Los Angeles county, to extend on the appropriate assessment books of said county an assessment for county highway and county free library purposes. It is the obvious purpose of the petitioner by this form of proceeding to obtain an adjudication whether the territory embraced within the corporate limits of the former city of Barnes City in said county is incorporated or unincorporated territory. In response to the alternative writ the respondent has presented a general demurrer to the petition. Assuming, without deciding, that the problem presented may properly be determined in a proceeding in mandamus, we turn to a consideration of the merits.

Pursuant to an election held for that purpose in unincorporated territory of Los Angeles county, the board of supervisors of said county by resolution and order entered on its minutes on January 18, 1926, declared the territory described in the petition herein to be a municipal corporation of the sixth class under the name of the city of Barnes City, in accordance with the requirements of the General Municipal Incorporation Act (St. 1883, p. 93). Thereafter and on February 13, 1926, a certificate of such incorporation was filed in the office of the secretary of state. From that time until April 11, 1927, said city of Barnes City functioned as a municipal corporation of this state. Some time prior to February 14, 1927, an election was held in said city pursuant to the Consolidation Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 577), to decide whether the city of Barnes City should consolidate with the city of Los Angeles. A favorable vote was cast. After the election and still prior to February 14, 1927, the city council of the city of Los Angeles adopted a resolution accepting, authorizing and approving the consolidation of the city of Barnes City and the city of Los Angeles. A certificate of said consolidation was filed in the office of the secretary of state on April 11, 1927, whereupon the city of Los Angeles assumed to be the successor of the city of Barnes City and has since exercised municipal functions over and upon the territory formerly embraced within its boundaries and the people residing therein. No attack has been made upon said consolidation proceedings and the territory formerly within the limits of the city of Barnes City is a part of the city of Los Angeles unless the proceedings hereinafter related and discussed compel a contrary conclusion.

On February 14, 1927, which was after the consolidation election was held but before the consolidation proceedings were completed, the Attorney General, upon the relation of the petitioner herein, instituted quo warranto proceedings against the city of Barnes City to have it adjudged that the proceedings to incorporate the city of Barnes City were illegal and void and to oust said city from the exercise of the municipal franchise. Process was duly served in that action and stipulations were entered into between the officers of Barnes City and the plaintiff in said action extending the time of the defendant to plead to May 2, 1927. In the meantime the consolidation proceedings had been completed and had become effective on April 11, 1927. On May 7, 1927, the default of the defendant in said quo warranto proceeding was entered. On August 3d, following, the plaintiff therein submitted his proof, and on August 9th a judgment was entered adjudging that the defendant city of Barnes City was guilty of usurping, intruding into, and unlawfully holding and exercising the rights, privileges, and franchise of a municipal corporation and ousting the defendant therefrom. In addition, the default judgment contained a clause decreeing and establishing the territory included within the boundaries of the former city of Barnes City to be unincorporated territory. On August 12, 1927, the city of Los Angeles entered a special appearance by its city attorney and gave notice of two motions to be made on August 18th. One motion was for an order vacating the default and setting aside the judgment, upon the ground that the default and judgment were attempted to be taken against a defendant which by operation of law had prior thereto been dissolved and reincorporated and by reason whereof the court was without jurisdiction to entertain or pass upon any of the matters set forth in the complaint and upon the further ground that the judgment as entered directly affected lawfully incorporated territory of the city of Los Angeles over which that city had, since the completion of the consolidation proceeding, exercised municipal control and jurisdiction. The other motion sought to have the action dismissed on the ground that the issues tendered therein had become moot. Prior to the determination of either motion the plaintiff in said action, on November 4th, gave notice of motion to be made on November 10th for leave to substitute the city of Los Angeles as the party defendant in said action and for leave to file an amended and supplemental complaint. By stipulation the hearing on this motion was continued to November 29th. On November 9, 1927, the court entered an order vacating and setting aside the judgment. On December 30th the motion of the plaintiff for leave to substitute and to file an amended and supplemental complaint was denied. On January 7, 1928, the court dismissed the action. The plaintiff appealed from the order of November 9th vacating and setting aside the default judgment of August 9th, and from the judgment of January 7th dismissing the action. The order and judgment appealed from were reversed. People v. City of Barnes City (Cal. App.) 288 P. 442. A petition for hearing in this court was denied July 7, 1930, on the theory that, as matter of law, the provision in the judgment entered August 9th, declaring and establishing the territory formerly included within the boundaries of the city of Barnes City to be unincorporated territory, was not embraced within the issues properly tendered in the quo warranto proceeding and was void on its face; and that any statements made by the District Court of Appeal in its opinion which might be construed as an ouster of the city of Los Angeles in its then exercise of municipal functions over said territory were entirely without the scope of the action in quo warranto and involved in said appeals. This seemed especially to be true in view of the fact that the District Court of Appeal assumed in its opinion that the provision of the judgment entered August 9th, declaring and establishing said territory as unincorporated territory, was void and in its judgment affirmed the order of the trial court denying the motion of the plaintiff to substitute the city of Los Angeles as the party defendant in said action. It was therefore thought that no prejudice would be suffered in permitting the judgment of ouster against the city of Barnes City to stand. But whatever construction may be placed on the decision of the District Court of Appeal, we are now confronted with the contention that the city of Los Angeles has been ousted of its jurisdiction, de jure, if it has any, and de facto, which it concededly has, by reason of the judgment of ouster against the city of Barnes City.

[1-3] It cannot be questioned that, by reason of the completion of the consolidation proceeding and the admitted exercise of the municipal franchise in said territory by the city of Los Angeles, the consolidated city is de facto as to its exercise of control over said territory. Whether its jurisdiction be de facto or de jure might have been questioned in an appropriate proceeding under sections 803-810 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Coe v. City of Los Angeles, 42 Cal. App. 479, 183 P. 822), but such a proceeding was not instituted. Petitioner's contention is that such an inquiry is now foreclosed for the reason, it is claimed, that the question of whether said territory is incorporated or unincorporated is res judicata. The argument is grounded on the postulate that the judgment of August 9th, wherein said territory was declared to be and established as "unincorporated territory of Los Angeles county," has become final and binding upon the city of Los Angeles as the successor in interest of the city of Barnes City. But the question whether said territory was incorporated or unincorporated was not within the issues which could be determined in said quo warranto proceeding. The only issue properly involved therein was whether the city of Barnes City was usurping, intruding into, or unlawfully holding or exercising the municipal franchise at the time of the commencement of the action, to wit, on February 14, 1927. People v. Perrin, 56 Cal. 345, 349. When the judgment of August 9th assumed to declare the status of the territory upon the completion of the ouster, it proceeded beyond the bounds of the legitimate issues of the complaint. That part of the judgment is void for all purposes. Baar v. Smith, 201 Cal. 87, 255 P. 827. It cannot operate as an adjudication of the status of the territory and must be disregarded.

[4] The petitioner further contends that the city of Los Angeles assumed jurisdiction over said territory following the completion of the consolidation proceedings subject to the final adjudication in the quo warranto proceeding. This contention involves a construction of certain provisions of section 10 of the Consolidation Act as amended in 1915 (St. 1915, p. 313). The pertinent provisions of that section are as follows: "Except as in this act provided, any consolidation of municipal corporations effected under the provisions of this act shall not affect any debts, demands, liabilities or obligations of any kind existing in favor of or against any such municipal corporations so consolidated, at the time of such consolidation, or any action or proceeding then pending in any court in which any such debt, demand, liability or obligation of any kind may be involved, or any action or proceeding brought by or against any such municipal corporation prior to such consolidation; but all such proceedings shall be continued and concluded, by final judgment or otherwise, in all respects the same as if such consolidation had not been effected." The words which we have italicized indicate that the quoted portion of the statute contemplates beyond question that consolidation shall actually be effected as a prerequisite to the operation of the saving clause therein contained. If consolidation be not effected, the quoted provisions are not operative. The statute presupposes the power of each municipality to consolidate and by its terms preserves litigation appertaining to debts, demands, liabilities, and obligations of either municipal corporation unaffected and undisturbed by the act of consolidation. It would be going too far and beyond the intent of the statute to say that consolidation itself might be destroyed by the operation of the saving clause. Such self-destruction plainly was not contemplated.

[5, 6] As above stated, the favorable vote on consolidation in the city of Barnes City was recorded before the quo warranto proceeding was commenced and thereafter was carried to completion. The final judgment of ouster was not retroactive and had no legal effect upon the exercise of the municipal function prior to the entry of the judgment. Reclamation District No. 765 v. McPhee, 13 Cal. App. 382, 109 P. 1106. There is nothing in the Consolidation Act to prevent a de facto municipal corporation from effectually participating in an act of consolidation, and we are referred to no precedent to the effect that it may not.

There is therefore no duty enjoined by law upon the respondent county auditor to extend the assessment items as prayed for in the petition.

The peremptory writ is denied, and the alternative writ is discharged.

Ex parte SHULER.

Cr. 3355.

Supreme Court of California.

Oct. 1, 1930.

1. Contempt ☞9.

Course of conduct creating atmosphere of distrust and suspicion in public mind, thereby influencing action of court and judges with respect to causes pending and undetermined, constitutes "contempt."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Contempt," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Contempt ☞30.

Court has inherent power to punish for contempt, though committed out of its presence, notwithstanding statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 1209, subd. 13).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1209, subd. 13, providing that no speech or publication reflecting upon or concerning any court shall be treated as a contempt unless made in the immediate presence of such court while in session and in such manner as to actually interfere with its proceedings, in so far as attempt to deprive court of inherent power to punish for contempt, though not committed within its presence, has been held to be beyond power of Legislature.

3. Contempt ☞9.

Radio speeches by influential minister naturally tending and calculated to influence, control, and intimidate court and judges in certain causes pending and undetermined held to constitute "contempt."

While several criminal cases were pending and undetermined in superior court, influential minister broadcasted several radio speeches in which he commented expressly and by innuendo upon motives of named judge and upon his personal and political affiliations as affecting his past, present, and future acts and conduct with respect to such causes. Effect of radio speeches constituted threat of injurious consequences to be visited upon judge in event of his continuance to act and to maintain unchanged attitude with relation to conduct and disposition of cases.

4. Constitutional law ☞90.

Constitutional guaranty of freedom of speech does not protect citizen in making comment constituting attempted interference with orderly administration of justice.

It is only when expressions or utterances, in whatever form or forum, have for their intent, purpose, and manifest tendency an interference with the orderly administration of justice in pending causes that they can be held to so far exceed the constitutional boundaries to freedom of speech and of the press as to constitute contempt of court.

5. Contempt ☞28(1).

Fact that numerous utterances of influential minister commenting on proceedings in pending causes were truth would not be defense to contempt proceedings.

6. Contempt ☞9.

Public utterances to constitute "contempt" need not have actually influenced actions of court or judge.

7. Contempt ☞14.

Whatever manifestly tends to constitute interference with proper exercise of duties and functions of grand jury would constitute "contempt of court."

Grand jury is instrumentality of court, and as such is charged with quasi judicial inquisition into the conduct of citizens and of public institutions and officials, and must be as fully protected in exercise of its powers and functions in that regard as the courts themselves.

8. Contempt ☞14.

Public utterances by influential minister in radio speeches regarding investigation of sheriff's office by grand jury held to constitute "contempt of court."

Substance of speech was to effect that there was understanding between grand jury and sheriff that grand jury would not proceed further with charges against sheriff. At time speeches were made grand jury was duly impaneled and acting as such and engaged in investigating criminal offenses and alleged misconduct on part of public officers committed within county.

9. Contempt ☞72.

Several utterances by influential minister in radio speeches commenting on causes pending and undetermined before court and judges thereof held to each constitute separate offense.

Several broadcasted speeches occurred upon different dates and were delivered to different audiences and dealt in main with different phases of proceedings then pending in courts and before judicial officers against which broadcaster's animadversions were in each instance directed.

10. Contempt ☞72.

Courts in contempt cases may impose consecutive sentences for separate contempts (Pen. Code, §§ 11, 669).

Original application by R. P. Shuler for a writ of habeas corpus prayed to be directed to William I. Traeger, as Sheriff of Los Angeles County, to secure release of petitioner from custody on commitment for contempt.

Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Thomas S. Bunn and Schweitzer & Hutton, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Alexander Macdonald and Allen W. Ashburn, both of Los Angeles, for W. I. Traeger, sheriff.

RICHARDS, J.

The applicant herein applied for a writ of habeas corpus and was granted a hearing thereon upon his averment that he was imprisoned, detained, confined, and restrained of his liberty by William I. Traeger, sheriff of Los Angeles county at Los Angeles in said county, and that said imprisonment, detention, confinement, and restraint were and are illegal, the alleged illegality of which arises out of the existence of certain facts which are set forth in his aforesaid petition, and which may be stated as follows: On or about the 28th day of April, 1930, one L. Vaillancourt made and filed in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Los Angeles an accusation in the form of several affidavits, verified by said Vaillancourt, charging the applicant herein with having made a series of addresses to the public over and by means of a certain radio station, which addresses are set forth in hæc verba and seriatim in said affidavits, and upon the statements and substance contained therein it is alleged by the affiant they were intended and were calculated and were spoken and broadcasted by the petitioner for the purpose and with the intent that they should and would interfere with, influence, sway, and control the proceedings in a certain action numbered Criminal No. 35227 then pending in said court and in the department thereof presided over and conducted by Superior Judge Marshall F. McComb, and interfere with, sway, control, embarrass, and influence the action and decision of said Judge McComb, acting as said judge of the superior court in said cause, and of any other judge who might be called upon to take any action or make any ruling or decision therein, and also to interfere with, influence, sway, and intimidate any person or persons who might be called upon to act as jurors in said action, and also to bring into disrepute the said Judge McComb and the court over which he was at said time and in the conduct of said cause presiding, and expose him and it with respect to said action then pending to public disfavor, distrust, suspicion, ridicule, and opprobrium, and impute to said Judge McComb dishonest, corrupt, and unlawful motives, purposes, and actions in connection with his rulings and decisions of said action, and by so doing interfere with the orderly and due administration of justice in said court in respect to said action. Coincidentally with the filing of the aforesaid accusation and affidavits of said Vaillancourt, there were also filed and presented to said court certain further affidavits made and sworn to by one Walter S. Cox, setting forth certain further facts with respect to certain other utterances of the petitioner herein, also publicly broadcast over and by means of said radio broadcasting station, and having reference to certain other actions and proceedings pending in said court and before said Judge McComb and other certain judges of said court, and also having reference to pending proceedings of a grand jury then in session and functioning as a part of said court, and which statements and utterances of the petitioner, as set forth in detail therein, were also alleged to have had a like tendency and purpose to interfere with the orderly proceeding of said court and of said grand jury and the due administration of justice in said county.

Upon the filing and presentation of the foregoing accusation and affidavits before said superior court that tribunal on the 29th day of April 1930, issued its order and direction to R. P. Shuler, the petitioner herein, requiring him to show cause on May 8, 1930, in department 45 of said superior court, why he should not be adjudged guilty of contempt of said court. Said affidavits and order were duly served upon said Shuler upon said last-named date, and thereafter and prior to the aforesaid date of hearing thereon the said R. P. Shuler, appeared and filed in said court his verified answer to the aforesaid accusation and the affidavits filed in support thereof. A hearing upon said accusation and the answer thereto was thereupon, upon the request of said Shuler, advanced and set for hearing for May 2, 1930, at which time the matter was heard and evidence for and against the accusation and the answer thereto was duly received and said matter was thereupon submitted for decision to the court in department 45 thereof, Clair S. Tappaan, judge of said court then and there presiding in and over the aforesaid department thereof. Thereafter and on the 5th day of May, 1930, the judgment and commitment of said court and of the aforesaid judge thereof was given, made, and entered, adjudging that the petitioner herein by his aforesaid utterances, publishings, and broadcastings of the matters set forth in said affidavits, and each of them, had committed a contempt of said court and was thereby adjudged and declared to be in contempt of said court on account thereof, and should be punished therefor by such imprisonment and fines as were set forth and provided for in the aforesaid judgment and commitment, and that the terms of imprisonment set forth therein and designated as his punishment for the several and separate acts of contempt, as designated by the terms of said judgment, should run consecutively. Thereupon and upon the entry of the aforesaid judgment and commitment the petitioner was committed to the custody of the sheriff of Los Angeles for the execution thereof. Thereafter and pursuant thereto the petitioner was, as shown by his petition herein, imprisoned for the period of ten days immediately after the entry of said judgment, and in pursuance thereof, thereafter the petitioner having in the meantime offered to pay the portions of the several fines as specified in said judgment remaining due after such term of imprisonment, applied to this court for release upon habeas corpus upon the grounds hereinabove set forth. A writ of habeas corpus was thereupon issued out of this court and the petitioner was released upon bail pending the hearing thereon. Such hearing has been held, and the matters therein considered have been duly submitted to this court for decision. In order of such decision a more detailed statement of the facts and circumstances, as the same were presented to the superior court upon the aforesaid accusation and affidavits and the answer of the petitioner thereto, will be required. The facts about to be thus set forth, with sufficient of detail to form the basis of a correct conclusion thereon, are as follows:

On or about February 23, 1930, there was pending and undetermined in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Los Angeles, a criminal action numbered "Criminal No. 35227," in which the people of the state of California were plaintiffs and one Ben Getzoff and one Jacob Berman, alias Jack Bennett, were defendants, and in which action said defendants were accused by indictment of the crime of bribery. The acts of bribery in which said defendants were implicated directly involved one Asa Keyes and one Harold L. Davis, the former having been at the time of the occurrence of said acts of bribery district attorney of the county of Los Angeles, and the latter having been chief deputy district attorney under said Keyes. The accusation presented against said two officials arose out of and was directly connected with two other certain criminal actions in said superior court and in which a number of persons, including one S. C. Lewis, E. H. Rosenberg, and Jacob Berman, alias Jack Bennett, were accused of the crime of conspiracy to obtain money by false pretenses through an alleged violation of the Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673), otherwise known as the Blue Sky Law. Upon the trial of said two officials upon said charge, said Jacob Berman and said Ben Getzoff had been induced to appear and testify as to the part which they and each of them had taken in bribing said officials, with a view to procuring a dismissal of the charges against said S. C. Lewis and the others of said alleged conspirators, and it was doubtless by reason of their statements in the way of confessions as thus given and testified to that the said officials were convicted of their aforesaid crime. The immediate result of the accusation against these two officials was that of the appointment of Buron Fitts to succeed Asa Keyes as district attorney, with the consequent prosecution of said officials by said Buron Fitts. Following the conviction of said officials there remained upon the calendar of said court the cases of the several defendants who in the original actions had been accused of the crime of conspiracy to violate the Corporate Securities Act, and who, or some of whom, had been implicated in the aforesaid confessions of Berman and Getzoff in the alleged acts of receiving bribes of which said officials had been found guilty. During the considerable period of time following the exposure of the existence of the aforesaid conspiracy to violate the Corporate Securities Act, and in which the interests and fortunes of a very large number of people had become involved, there had come into existence a very acute and quite exasperated state of public opinion against the defendants who had been charged with said crime, and also against the officials who had been accused and convicted of corruption in office in respect to the prosecution of those who were charged with said conspiracy. The petitioner herein, who was, during said period and for some time prior thereto, the pastor of a certain church and congregation in the city of Los Angeles, became deeply and actively interested in the awakening, arousing, and in forming a state of public opinion with relation to the offenses with which the aforesaid persons had been charged and with respect to the proper prosecution of said offenses. The petitioner was accustomed during said period to make use of the radio, through one of its largest broadcasting stations in that region, in order to give widespread publicity to his opinions and utterances upon whatever subjects he sought by such means to discuss, particularly upon the subject of the public scandal which had arisen by reason of the alleged criminal acts of the defendants in said original actions and of said officials in connection with the prosecution of the same; and it may not be denied that the petitioner herein had acquired and occupied a very large sphere of influence in the way of arousing, directing, and leading public opinion with respect to said conspiracy and with respect to said officials who had been charged and who have been convicted of accepting bribes with a view to defeating public justice in the pursuit and conviction of the persons charged with said conspiracy. It was while local public opinion was being thus aroused to a state of great tension that the proceedings took place out of which grew the accusation which was made against the petitioner herein, to the effect that he had committed one or several contempts of court with relation to certain actions which were still pending in said superior court, and which alleged acts of contempt had consisted in those certain public utterances which the petitioner had been making and broadcasting in the manner above set forth with relation to certain of the proceedings which had taken place and which were yet to take place in said court before and on the part of several judges thereof to whom had been committed in their respective departments the conduct of such pending causes, and whose acts and conduct in relation thereto formed the chief subject of the petitioner's aforesaid public and publicly broadcasted utterances.

The particular facts which formed the background for the petitioner's broadcasted statements made from the pulpit of his church on or about the 23d day of February, 1930, and which are correctly set forth in the first affidavit of Vaillancourt are the following: On and prior to February 21, 1930, Marshall F. McComb was one of the judges of the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles, and was acting and presiding as such in department No. 45 of said court. Criminal action No. 35227, in which Ben Getzoff and Jacob Berman, alias Jack Bennett, were defendants, and as such were under indictment for the aforesaid crime of bribery, was called for trial; whereupon Buron Fitts, as district attorney of said county, rose to request a further continuance of the trial of these two defendants, and in so doing stated in substance that he was holding these two defendants with the expectation of using them and each of them as witnesses against certain of those persons who were under indictment upon the charge of conspiracy to violate the Corporate Securities Act, and that a present insistence upon the prosecution of these two defendants might have the effect of so far closing their lips that they would not repeat upon future trials their aforesaid confessions. Mr. Fitts did not state that he had promised these men immunity in order to secure their former testimony, but intimated that he had given them certain assurances in that direction which would be set at naught if their cases were to be then tried. Judge McComb thereupon refused to continue said cases for trial and ordered the trial thereof to proceed; whereupon Mr. Fitts moved a dismissal of the charges against these two defendants, which motion Judge McComb denied, and thereupon continued the trial of said causes to a later nearby day. Thereupon and on February 23, 1930, the petitioner herein broadcasted the utterances which, as we have seen, are set forth in full in the first Vaillancourt affidavit. In the course of said utterances and after relating substantially the facts with relation to the proceeding in Judge McComb's court which are above summarized, after a heated commentary upon the attitude of certain newspapers in Los Angeles with relation to the trials of the several causes above referred to, and which had been either completed or were still pending in said court, the petitioner proceeded to state that he had information "before Judge McComb's court convened on last Friday morning that had assured me as to every step the judge would take at that time, * * * nor was I misled in my conclusion. In fact it was well known about the courthouse for several days preceding the court battle Friday morning that the outcome would be exactly what it was." In describing the attitude and action of Judge McComb upon that occasion the petitioner stated: "But Judge McComb was adamant. Though Buron Fitts plead at times almost tearfully and at other times quite indignantly, the judge sat on the bench like a sphinx and every ruling was squarely against the district attorney." The broadcaster then proceeded to commend the attitude and action of Mr. Fitts in the premises, and to state that by his rulings thereon the judge "seeks to make the district attorney break his personal word and the word of the district attorney's office and try two men whom he has used as state's witnesses and whose testimony undoubtedly resulted in the conviction of the worst official offender against the law and decency that we have had in this country within a generation. The judge demands that the district attorney try these men in spite of the universal custom in such cases and in spite of the fact that he has to all intents and purposes promised them immunity because they appeared as state's witnesses.

"If Mr. Fitts shall proceed to prosecute Beraman and Getzoff as per the order of Judge McComb, it will place the district attorney's office, as Mr. Fitts stated, where its word of honor given to men who give evidence by which corrupt public officials are prosecuted, would be worth nothing whatsoever. By such a course the district attorney's office would be forced to a position whereby and wherein it repudiates its own promises and stultifies its own word."

The broadcaster then returns to his heated assault upon the aforesaid newspapers, in the course of which he charged that Judge McComb had been an appointee of Governor Young and that Governor Young was being supported in his effort to secure his re-election by the specific newspapers against which he was directing his passionate assault, while Buron Fitts was a candidate for governor in opposition to Governor Young. He asserts that said newspapers will gleefully welcome the decisions of Judge McComb, which, according to the statement of Mr. Fitts, in the event that the Keyes and Davis cases should be reversed, would leave him helpless in retrying those cases, and would result in Mr. Keyes and Mr. Davis both going free. He then proceeds to state: "We do not charge that Judge McComb is playing politics, but we do charge that the Los Angeles Record is playing politics and politics that is contemptible and vicious. We do not know the mind of Judge McComb. We have no way of understanding his processes of reasoning. He may or may not be honest in his decisions. That is between him and his own soul. It is also between him and the people who have a perfect right to scrutinize his official actions and pass upon them at the ballot box. We make no comment as to Judge McComb. The people can do their own thinking and reaching their own conclusions." He proceeds to say: "Affidavits have been filed charging the prejudice of Judge McComb and that must be passed upon before there can be further proceedings. In the meantime, the prosecution of a third public official hinges upon the outcome. These witnesses were to be used in this case, it being also a bribery case. The attorney for Getzoff arose in Judge McComb's court and stated that in view of the ruling of the judge he would advise his client not to testify, but to stand upon his constitutional rights. I understand that it will be impossible to convict without the evidence of this witness and that possibly Mr. Fitts will move the dismissal of the case rather than put the taxpayer to great expense with no possibility of a conviction. That much for what seems to have already resulted from the decision of Judge McComb. We doubt not that the Record is overjoyed that at least one bribe-taking public official may have been freed."

Regarding the discourse as a whole, it appears that the main burden of its criticism of Judge McComb would seem to have consisted in an attack upon certain of his rulings in the cases of the two defendants before him, which might be said to have reached such a point of finality as to form a proper subject of comment on the part of any citizen, under the broad terms of the provision of the Constitution guaranteeing liberty of speech, and of the press. The court is divided in opinion upon this subject and has, therefore, concluded that as to this first count in the charge and commitment herein it would give to the petitioner the benefit of the doubt, and hence absolve him of contempt of court as to said first count in the accusation and as to the commitment based thereon.

The second affidavit presented by Vaillancourt embraces by recital, not only much of the material which is set forth in the affiant's first affidavit, but proceeds to further set forth in full a succeeding address, delivered from his said pulpit, broadcasted by the petitioner through the medium of the same radio station, wherein the broadcaster further proceeded to discourse upon the judicial action and conduct of Judge McComb with regard to the matter detailed in the first affidavit. He asserts: "If the case of Keyes and the case of Davis should be reversed and Judge McComb is successful in what he is enterprising, it means the turning loose of Asa Keyes and Buddy Davis on the streets of Los Angeles, free men. Some folks think that kind of a tragedy cannot come to pass, but it came to pass in San Diego county, and, by the way, I will just call your attention to the fact that thus our courts are functioning here, and not only here but as well all over the United States. No wonder a Supreme Court justice stated not long ago that such functioning of the courts of the land was a public disgrace, and that law-enforcement through our courts has become a matter of actual scandal, and he told why; because our judges dealt with technicalities, points of law, infinitesimal in their actual value to the public, and to the enforcement of the law, and let actual justice trail in the dust, and drag itself like some wounded thing along the streets." He further proceeds to say: "I don't for a moment doubt the authority of Judge McComb or the authority of any other judge. Undoubtedly they have it, but undoubtedly when that authority was granted them by the people it was supposed that they would use it to further the ends of justice and not to promote injustice. It was supposed they would use it to convict criminals and not to protect criminals. It was supposed they would use it for the bettering of the conditions of the citizens of the community who were sorely beset by lawless influences and not to embarrass and interfere with those who are righteously trying to put down crime in their community. Mark my words. It is high time that those who have the ballots in their hands decide that judges with all their power and authority must at least work for justice or else retire to the ranks of private life. I call your attention to the fact that with enough superior courts and municipal courts in session to make a flock, a bunch of bankers, brokers and usurers have been able to steal millions of dollars of the people's money and, by ruling after ruling of the courts, technical rulings, rulings as to insufficiency of evidence and all that kind of thing, these criminals now walk out gleefully, scot free." After some complimentary reference to Buron Fitts, the broadcaster proceeds to say: "But it is a mighty poor bit of encouragement that he is having when a court deliberately gives him to understand that before he can go to work and gather his evidence he must come up and get on both knees, twine his fingers together and pray to the judge as if he were a god, and ask him whether or not he can do this, that or the other thing. A mighty poor policy!"

[1] Regarding this discourse also in its entirety we find that aside from its repetition of the former criticism of the rulings of Judge McComb with regard to the cases of Berman and Getzoff, the broadcaster goes much further than he had done in his previous discourse, to the extent of launching a general assault, both expressly and by innuendo, upon the court and judges of Los Angeles county, with the particular desire of influencing their attitude and conduct respecting the so-called Julian cases then pending and undetermined in said court and before certain judges thereof, including Judge McComb. We have no doubt that the manifest purpose and import of this address was that of creating such an atmosphere of distrust and suspicion in the public mind as would have the effect of influencing the mind, will, and eventual action of said court and the judges thereof with respect to said causes then pending and undetermined before them. That such a course of conduct and utterance on the part of this petitioner constituted contempt of court we entertain no doubt.

In the third of the affidavits of Vaillancourt filed upon the same date as the other two a somewhat different situation is presented. It appears therefrom that during the times mentioned therein, Walton J. Wood was the presiding judge of the master calendar department of the criminal division of said superior court, and that as such it was his duty to assign and reassign criminal cases for trial to the various criminal departments of said superior court, and from time to time as the occasion warrants or demands to transfer such causes from one criminal department to another; that on or about March 25, 1930, said Walton J. Wood as such presiding judge made and caused to be entered an order setting criminal actions numbered 40108, 40110, and 40111 for trial before Marshall F. McComb as judge of said superior court; that thereafter, and on March 27, 1930, said Walton J. Wood, as such presiding judge, made and caused to be entered an order transferring said actions and each of them from the department of said Marshall F. McComb to the department of Emmett H. Wilson, another judge of said court, for trial; that in the event said Emmett H. Wilson should not for any reason whatsoever be able to preside at the trial of said criminal actions, or any of them, it will become the duty of Walton J.

Wood as such presiding judge to reassign and retransfer for trial said actions, or any of them, which said Emmett H. Wilson might be unable to try to, himself, to Judge McComb, or to another judge of the superior court. The affidavit further proceeds to set forth that at the times mentioned therein there had been duly impaneled and acting in and as a part of said superior court a grand jury which was during said time continuously engaged in investigations of alleged criminal offenses committed within said county and had been holding periodical and almost daily sessions in such behalf. The affidavit proceeds to state that the petitioner herein on the evening of March 27, 1930, broadcasted another address dealing with Judge Marshall F. McComb and with the foregoing action of Judge Walton J. Wood with respect to said criminal cases, which cases, it may be said, were certain of the so-called "Julian" cases wherein certain defendants, indicted for the aforesaid conspiracy to violate the Corporate Securities Act, were to be put upon trial. It would seem that in the meantime Judge McComb had withdrawn voluntarily from trying any of the Julian cases, and that it was for that reason that Judge Wood had withdrawn said cases from Judge McComb's department and had, as above shown, transferred the same to the department presided over by Judge Wilson. The broadcaster proceeded to compliment Judge McComb in thus "voluntarily effacing himself as far as these cases are concerned. However, this does not excuse Judge Walton J. Wood at all, for Judge Wood took the position that had not Judge McComb voluntarily withdrawn, he would have stood pat on the placing of these cases in Judge McComb's court, knowing that Judge McComb was under grave suspicion of the things that happened a few days back." The broadcaster goes on to say: "I say that Judge Wood has taken a stand that is as full of holes as a sieve, for Judge Wood knows, as well as he knows his name, that no man with one iota of suspicion resting upon his official attitude should try the Julian cases." He proceeds to state: "The people are grim faced. They want justice done and they want the law vindicated, and they want men punished, big and little, high and low, and they don't want any judge or any court or anybody else throwing a monkey wrench into the machinery, and for Judge Wood to appoint Judge McComb, knowing the relationship between Judge McComb and the district attorney's office, that is working so hard now for the indictment of these big Julian wreckers and for their conviction; I say, knowing that relationship, knowing that Judge McComb is an appointee of Governor Young, knowing Judge McComb's relationship to the Hearst newspapers and to the Los Angeles Record and to Kemper Campbell and to others who have been very, very intensely interested all along the line, knowing these things, for Judge Wood to send these cases over to Judge McComb is almost unpardonable." The broadcaster concludes his rather long discourse with the statement: "Now, people, watch the courts; watch Judge Wood; keep your eye right on him; watch all of them. It is a pathetic day when all of a sudden we have to keep our eye on the courts for fear they play crooked and contemptible games in which criminals, big and vicious, are released and let to prey upon the public. It is a pitiful day, but we have sure got to do it; there is nothing else to do; we have got to do it. Keep your eye on the courts, watch them, and keep your eye on the district attorney's office."

The fourth affidavit in support of the accusation made against the petitioner was verified and filed by one Walter S. Cox, who, after repeating the preliminary averments made in said former affidavits, and after referring to the fact that the case of People v. Berman, alias Bennett, was on and after April 11, 1930, pending and undetermined in said superior court and in the department thereof over which Judge McComb presided, and after alleging that on or about April 11th Judge McComb, while acting as judge in said court, had remanded said Berman to the custody of the sheriff of Los Angeles county after fixing his bail at the sum of $250,000, and after reciting an application for a writ of habeas corpus had been made to the District Court of Appeal of the state of California, in and for the Second Appellate District, Division 2, 287 P. 373, on behalf of said Berman and for the purpose of obtaining his release from said custody, which writ had been issued by said appellate tribunal and made returnable at a date thereafter, proceeded to allege that, while said matter was pending and undetermined in each of said tribunals, the petitioner had uttered and broadcasted over the aforesaid radio broadcasting station certain statements about and in relation to said action and to said court and to said Marshall F. McComb as judge thereon, of which the following are some of the utterances thus given publicity: "And the lawyers and newspaper men; and the judges! and the judges! and the judges! They are doing everything on earth they can to shield this bunch of felons. Without their assistance Lewis and Berman could not have gotten started on their program of robbery and thievery. * * * When the Los Angeles Examiner, when Judge McComb, or these attorneys, or when the rest of them undertake to interfere with the district attorney in his efforts to put men like Flint in the penitentiary, I tell you they are playing a game good American citizens will not stand for. * * * I am going to say something else. When Judge McComb went back into the records and got a case—a case that some newspaper boys had tipped him off was there—when Judge McComb goes back and gets a case which arises out of a record they used for no purpose in the world except to get Jack Bennett back with it from France—a case they had no thought of ever trying—no proof of it if they had gone to trial, but simply did it, knowing that they were going to have a plan to send him over the road, and used it to get him back here—when they dig up that case and put it on the records without even notifying the district attorney's office to have a representative present, or to be present, and set a quarter of a million dollars bail against a man already under a bond of $50,000 and making no effort to get out of the country, and nobody believing that he was going to get out—it is just as plain as the nose on a man's face as to why it was done, and who is behind it and as to the purpose of the doing of it? If there is anybody in this city who actually misunderstands it, I am fooled on the mentality of the people of this city. Now, if Judge McComb were one of these wild-eyed, hot-brained fellows who go so mad because Buron Fitts beat him on that other thing in the Supreme Court, and just was mad—if he did it just because he was mad, that would be one thing. But he isn't one of that kind. He is as cool headed and as clear visioned as any man who ever sat on the bench. What Judge McComb did the other day was premeditated, deliberate, studied and purposely done, and don't you forget it. When the courts of the country begin to interfere with the process of justice and the district attorneys who go to the bat to put men in the penitentiary where they belong, it is time that the taxpayers rose up and said something about it. Unfortunately, we did not have anything to say in the selection of Judge McComb. He is an appointee of Governor Young. There is a lot of politics mixed up in this thing, just as sure as you are sitting here tonight, and don't forget it—absolutely lots of it."

The fifth affidavit in support of said accusation was also made by Walter S. Cox. After repeating by reference those preliminary matters which are set forth in the earlier affidavits, it proceeds to state that on April 22, 1930, and prior thereto and up to the time of the making and broadcasting of the utterances to which said affidavit refers, there was pending and undetermined in the said superior court and in the department presided over by Judge McComb a certain criminal action entitled People v. Charles H. Coffey, in which action the defendant was accused in two counts of violations of the Motor Vehicle Act, and in two other counts of violent assaults upon two certain persons, the four counts apparently having reference to the same incident, and that, upon the appearance of Charles H. Coffey to answer to these charges before Judge McComb, he had first entered a plea of not guilty as to all of said counts, but that later and on April 14, 1930, he withdrew his plea of not guilty as to count 2 and pleaded guilty as to said count, and thereupon made an oral application for probation as to count 2 in said information; that while said matter, and particularly said application for probation, was still pending and undetermined in said court and before said judge, the petitioner herein on April 22, 1930, broadcasted certain utterances with relation to said action, and also with reference to the rulings of Judge McComb in the matter of the fixation of bail in the Berman matter. Concerning the Coffey matter the broadcaster said: "I want to ask Judge McComb why he permitted this fellow Coffey, who was held on two counts of hit and run and one count of drunk driving by Judge Turney, to plead guilty to one count of hit and run and apply for probation and have the rest of the counts dismissed? I talked sometime ago on that question. One of the most terrible menaces we have out here in this city, I think, is this matter of the drunk driving charge. Judge McComb is a specialist on this proposition of bringing them to trial. He don't turn any of them loose, according to the record he is making. He don't want any immunity granted to anybody. He don't want any cases thrown out of court. He wants all of them tried by the law and evidence. I am going to ask Judge McComb whether or not it is true that this fellow Coffey came into court, and, without any evidence being brought in, pleaded guilty to a hit and run charge—the easiest one, you understand, to get by with from the standpoint of penalty—and he permitted him to escape trial on the second hit and run charge and a drunk driving charge. There is the real charge that we need to attend to in our courts. That is the thing that is imperiling these highways all over the city, with people being killed daily by drunk driving. I am going to ask Judge McComb whether or not he permitted that thing to happen in his court and then permitted this man to apply for probation and so forth. An officer called me this afternoon and told me that those were the facts. If they are, all these fine eulogies we have seen in the Los Angeles Record and in the Hearst papers concerning this marvelous man, Judge McComb, who don't allow any of them to get by him, who absolutely makes them stand up to meet the law, and who makes them toe the mark—No immunity favors granted in his court. He tries them all and puts the stuff to them—I say all these nice things they have all said about him are going to have to fall with a dull thud if he really did this thing. Of course, I don't know whether he did or not, but I would be mighty glad to turn this radio over to him and he can tell us next Thursday night whether or not he did. We are all interested.

Everybody is interested, because right now Judge McComb is before the public eye." Referring to the Berman matter the broadcaster said: "But there is this to say: That no more ludicrous thing ever happened in the superior court than when Judge McComb revived that old case, which I have already explained, and placed the bail at $225,000 or $250,000 against this fellow Bennett." The discourse proceeds at some length with the innuendo that the action of Judge McComb in the premises was inspired by the newspaper enemies of Buron Fitts.

The sixth affidavit, also made by Walter S. Cox, recites and realleges the preliminary matters which are set forth in the earlier affidavits, and then proceeds to set forth another broadcasted discourse of the petitioner on the evening of April 24, 1930, in which he takes up again the case of People v. Coffey, and, after certain sarcastic references to Judge McComb's disposition to hold drunk drivers strictly to account, proceeds to say: "Yet with this fellow Coffey, who, I understand, is a high Mason and a big Elk—and by the way that has nothing in the world to do with drunk driving, and I hope the judge will understand that, I hope he understands the fact that he is an Elk and a Mason does not keep bootleg liquor from making him drunk. Not at all. He is quite a wealthy man, I think, but that does not mitigate the offense in the least, as I see it. He takes those three offenses and on one of them, the least one, carrying the least sentence or penalty, he permits him to plead guilty and make an application for probation. Of course this probation business is up to him. I have no comment to make on that. That is the judge's funeral; it is not mine. Let me tell you this: Judge McComb is going to have to do some explaining. * * * Now, he stands up and takes this fellow with three crimes charged against him, forgets about the one that would carry the greatest punishment, the drunk driving, takes the least charge—dealing with this big Mason, this big Elk and influential man among us—and lets him plead guilty and apply for probation. That does not look very beautiful, and it doesn't smell good, either."

The seventh and last affidavit, also verified by Walter S. Cox, deals with a different situation. It proceeds to set forth that at the times mentioned therein there was a duly impaneled and acting grand jury, functioning as a part of the superior court of Los Angeles county, and engaged in investigating criminal offenses and alleged misconduct on the part of public officers, committed within said county, and holding protracted and almost daily sessions therein; that on or about April 24, 1930, the petitioner broadcasted a discourse with relation to certain matters which were either pending before or were about to be brought to the attention of said grand jury. Among these was the investigation of certain acts and conduct of Sheriff William I. Traeger of said county. In dealing with this subject the petitioner proceeded to set forth certain matters alleged to have come to his personal attention and which, if true, would constitute grave personal improprieties amounting probably to official misconduct on the part of Sheriff Traeger, and in relation thereto stated that he had had a conversation with one of the members of the grand jury who had stated to him that there would be no investigation of Sheriff Traeger by the grand jury. The petitioner proceeded to state his understanding of the charges against Sheriff Traeger and to suggest that there was some sort of understanding between the sheriff and the grand jury by virtue of which its members would not proceed further with the charges against him, and, after referring to this matter at considerable length, he states: "Now, isn't it a pretty mess that we are in when we have a mutual treaty between the sheriff's office and the sheriff—I mean the sheriff and the grand jurors, by which the sheriff is not to drink any more, not to run for reelection, and therefore they will let him alone?"

In each of the affidavits above referred to there is embraced and reasserted the charge against the petitioner that the statements therein contained naturally tended and were calculated to and were spoken, announced, uttered, published, and broadcast by the said petitioner for the purpose and with the intent that they should and would interfere with, influence, sway, control, and intimidate the said superior court, the said grand jury, and also interfere with, influence, sway, control, and intimidate any persons who might be called upon to testify as witnesses in the certain specified matters pending before said court and said grand jury, and by so doing interfere with the orderly and due performance of duty on the part of said court and of its several judges and grand jurors, and with the orderly and due administration of justice.

When the foregoing matters, together with the answer thereto made and filed on behalf of the petitioner, came on for hearing before said superior court and before a department thereof presided over by Superior Judge Tappan, a hearing was upon May 2, 1930, had thereon, and, the matter having been submitted to the said court and the said judge thereof for decision, the said court on the 5th day of May, 1930, made and entered, as hereinabove stated, its judgment and commitment, adjudging the petitioner to be in contempt of court upon each of the aforesaid seven counts, and with respect thereto made and entered the following judgment: As to the first count the court adjudged that the petitioner be punished for the contempt specified therein by imprisonment in the county jail of the county of Los Angeles for the period of five days. As to the second count, that the petitioner be punished for the contempt specified therein by fine in the sum of $50 and in default of the payment of said fine that the petitioner stand committed to the sheriff of the county of Los Angeles until such fine is paid, and that he be imprisoned in the county jail of said county for a term which shall be one day for each $2 of said fine or unpaid part thereof. As to the third count, that the petitioner be punished for the contempt specified therein by imprisonment in the county jail of the county of Los Angeles for the period of five days. As to the fourth count, that said petitioner be punished for the contempt set forth therein by a fine in the sum of $50, with the same alternative as that provided for in the second count. As to the fifth count, that the petitioner be punished for the contempt specified therein by imprisonment in the county jail of the county of Los Angeles for the period of five days. As to the sixth and seventh counts, that the petitioner be punished for the contempt specified in the affidavits in support thereof by imprisonment in the county jail of the county of Los Angeles for the period of five days, and that said terms of imprisonment above referred to should run consecutively.

The petitioner, as we have seen, having served a portion of the terms of imprisonment provided for in the foregoing judgment and commitment, and having offered to pay into court the amount remaining due upon the fines therein imposed, made application for release upon habeas corpus, which having been granted and the matter coming on for hearing upon its merits and having been heard, the questions involved therein are submitted to this court for its decision.

[2] It is the first contention of the petitioner that the contempt or contempts complained of having been committed out of the presence of the court, consisting of a series of broadcasted utterances allegedly reflecting upon or concerning the court and one or more of its judges, it is beyond the power of the court reflected upon to punish him for contempt. This contention is predicated upon the provisions of subdivision 13 of section 1209 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows: "But no speech or publication reflecting upon or concerning any court or any officer thereof shall be treated or punished as a contempt of such court unless made in the immediate presence of such court while in session and in such a manner as to actually interfere with its proceedings." The foregoing contention of the petitioner requires but brief consideration, in view of the fact that, in the case of In re Charles M. Shortridge, 99 Cal. 526, 532, 34 P. 227, 230, 21 L. R. A. 755, 37 Am. St. Rep. 78, the foregoing subdivision of said section of the Code of Civil Procedure came before this court for consideration as to the constitutionality of its provisions, and it was therein expressly held that courts of justice have the inherent right to punish as a contempt an act—whether committed in or out of its presence—which tends to impede, embarrass, or obstruct the court in the discharge of its duties; and that the Legislature had no power to enact the foregoing amendment (Stats. 1891, p. 7) to said section of said Code in so far as it was attempted thereby to deprive the court of power, in the exercise of its aforesaid inherent right to punish as a contempt any act, speech, or publication which had for its manifest purpose and obvious tendency an interference with the orderly administration of justice in causes pending before such courts. The foregoing decision of this court has been consistently followed and approved in later cases. McClatchy v. Superior Court, 119 Cal. 413, 51 P. 696, 39 L. R. A. 691; Lamberson v. Superior Court, 151 Cal. 458, 461, 91 P. 100, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 619; In re Lindsley, 75 Cal. App. 122, 124, 241 P. 934; Lindsley v. Superior Court, 76 Cal. App. 419, 245 P. 212; In re Arnold, 204 Cal. 175, 267 P. 316; Blodgett v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 290 P. 293.

[3] The petitioner's second contention is to the effect that the matters and things set forth in the several affidavits, which formed the basis of the accusation that the petitioner upon the various and separate occasions as recited in said affidavits was guilty of acts and conduct constituting a contempt of court, do not amount, as to either the facts set forth therein or the law applicable thereto, to such contempt. We are unable to give our concurrence to this contention as to the several counts in said accusation other than the first count thereof. We have hereinbefore undertaken to set forth in detail the several judicial proceedings which at the time of the petitioner's aforesaid utterances were pending and undetermined in said superior court and in one or other of the departments presided over by the several judges whose acts and conduct with respect to such pending cases were animadverted upon by the petitioner in his several broadcasted utterances. The cases of People v. Berman and People v. Getzoff, at the time of the utterances of the petitioner set forth in the second of said affidavits under the title of count 2 of said accusation, were in the actual course of coming on for trial before Judge McComb in department 45 of said court. It is true that as to the content of the first count in said accusation the matters chiefly adverted to by the petitioner related to certain rulings already made by Judge McComb which may have been a proper subject of his animadversions. It is also true that the defendants in said action had each made application for release upon habeas corpus to the District Court of Appeal, which applications had at the time of the petitioner's aforesaid utterances been undetermined in said court. But this fact did not interfere with the fact that each of said causes was pending before the superior court and that in each thereof the questions as to whether said defendants should presently be put upon trial and as to the rulings of the trial judge during the course thereof were each and all matters which the presiding judge of said department of said court was required to consider and pass upon in the orderly course of administration of justice as to these causes and the questions involved therein at the very time that the petitioner's utterances, as set forth in detail in count 2 of said accusation, were made. We entertain no doubt that the utterances of the petitioner, under the circumstances above detailed, had for their obvious intent and purpose that of causing said court and the judge to adopt the attitude which the broadcaster was insisting upon with relation to the present and future conduct of said causes before said court; and that the petitioner, in order to accomplish this result, was making use of his position as a minister and of his opportunity as a broadcaster and of his influence as an orator and of his access, through his aforesaid position and powers, to the public mind, to compel said court and the judge thereof to a course of action and conduct with respect to such pending causes in accord with the petitioner's views. In seeking to achieve this result the petitioner commingled in his aforesaid utterances, as set forth in count 2 of said accusation, a severe arraignment of said court and the judge thereof, as to rulings already made, and to be thereafter made, with respect to the conduct of said causes during the impending trial thereof, together with an assault, both expressly and by innuendo, upon the motives of Judge McComb and upon his personal and political affiliations as affecting his past, present, and future acts and conduct with respect to said pending causes and to other interlocked judicial proceedings which were also in a state of pendency in said court. The foregoing animadversions were coupled with both the expressed and covert threat of injurious consequences to be visited upon Judge McComb in the event of his continuance to act as the trial judge in said pending causes and to maintain unchanged his attitude with relation to the conduct and disposition thereof. These consequences were to become operative through the creation of an adverse and inflamed public opinion which petitioner by his aforesaid utterances was plainly seeking to arouse and intensify.

With respect to the utterances of the petitioner as set forth in the third count of said accusation, and as affecting the aforesaid pending causes, and also these other and more or less interlocked criminal actions also at said time pending in said court, and as affecting the judicial attitude not only of Judge McComb with relation thereto, but also of Judge Walton J. Wood, at that time presiding judge of the master calendar department of the criminal division of said court, and Judge Emmett H. Wilson, as one of the judges of said court, what we have heretofore said with respect to the obvious intent and purposes of the petitioner, as manifested in his aforesaid utterances, as detailed in counts 1 and 2 of said accusation, has full and precise application. The purpose of the broadcaster, as shown both expressly and by innuendo, was that of involving the several departments of the superior court then actually engaged in this or that phase of the judicial consideration of said pending causes, in such an atmosphere of suspicion as to the affiliations and attitude of the judges mentioned as would have the effect of compelling them and each of them to conform their rulings to the demands of the petitioner, or to suffer the results of an inflamed public opinion injuriously affecting them and each of them in the event of a noncompliance with the petitioner's demands.

With respect to the matters set forth in the affidavit of Walter S. Cox embraced in the fourth count of said accusation, a like conclusion seems irresistible. The assault upon Judge McComb, both by direct charge and covert innuendo, becomes increasingly intensive. When the broadcaster states that, "What Judge McComb did the other day was premeditated, deliberate, studied and purposely done, and don't you forget it. When the courts of the country begin to interfere with the process of justice and the district attorneys who go to the bat to put men in the penitentiary where they belong, it is time that the taxpayers rose up and said something about it," it is idle to argue that the intent and purpose of such an utterance as this was not precisely that set forth in the charging part of said accusation.

In the affidavit of Walter S. Cox, which forms the foundation for the fifth count in said accusation, another criminal proceeding, namely, that of People v. Coffey, pending in the department of the superior court over which Judge McComb presided, is made the subject of the broadcaster's animadversions. This cause at the time thereof was pending in said department and before Judge McComb, the immediate matter before said court being the question as to the propriety of the admission of the said defendant to probation upon his application therefor, which had not yet been determined before said judge and court. The petitioner, in his extended comment upon the situation in said cause, still pending, proceeded to discuss at length and from a most partisan viewpoint the nature of the case against the defendant and the conduct thereof under the direct administration of Judge McComb, the innuendo of the broadcaster's commentary being that Judge McComb, contrary to his past custom of treating with severity violators of the Motor Vehicle Act, was acting with deliberate partiality in the Coffey case, and that his action in that regard was of the same unworthy quality as that which had already characterized his theretofore criticized conduct in the case of Berman and Getzoff.

In the sixth count of said accusation the petitioner is shown in a subsequent broadcast to have again referred to the Coffey case, and in the course of such reference, and while said cause was still pending upon the defendant's application for probation before Judge McComb, to make the direct charge that the judicial action and attitude of Judge McComb with respect to the case against Coffey is being influenced by the fact that the defendant is a high Mason, a big Elk, and a wealthy man, and that, by reason thereof, "Judge McComb is going to have to do some explaining."

We have thus far been dealing with the several broadcasted utterances of the petitioner having chiefly to do with the course of pending proceedings in the superior court in the several criminal causes committed to the department thereof over which Judge Marshall F. McComb presides, and with respect to which those certain other judges referred to by the petitioner in his aforesaid utterances have been and may yet be called upon to exercise judicial functions.

[4] We are entirely satisfied that the broadcasted utterances of the petitioner with respect to the foregoing matters involved in pending proceedings in said court and before the said judges thereof, disclose throughout the existence on the part of the petitioner a persistent and intentional purpose to impose his own will and views with respect to said causes, and the facts, the law, and the conduct thereof, upon the said superior court, and not only the judges thereof particularly mentioned, but all of the judges thereof, and that such result was contemplated and intended to be achieved by the petitioner through his aforesaid public utterances, embodying his strenuous and repeated asseverations as to the facts and the law relative to these several causes, commingled with assaults, both express and by innuendo, upon the motives and integrity of the several judges having these matters in charge, and with threats of the injurious consequences to them of an adverse public opinion which, by means of his reiterated utterances, he was seeking to create. That such acts and conduct on the part of this petitioner constituted contempt of court we entertain no doubt. The constitutional guaranties of freedom of speech and of the press do not, in our opinion, and in the light of the authorities which we are about to cite, go so far as to protect the citizen in making such comment by either spoken or printed utterance with respect to causes pending before courts of justice, as have for their purpose and manifest tendency an attempted interference with the orderly administration of justice before such tribunals and in respect to causes pending and in course of conduct therein. No difference can be discerned between the rights of the citizen and the proper limitation thereof under his aforesaid constitutional guaranty, whether that citizen be a minister speaking from his pulpit, or a broadcaster through the radio, or an editor through his newspaper, or a curbstone orator from his soap box, or an anarchist from whatever forum he may find for the exploitation of his doctrines, the right and the limitation thereof being the same when the matter involved in the utterances of all or any of these affects or manifestly tends to affect the orderly administration of justice in pending causes before judicial tribunals and the judges thereof.

In the case of In re Shortridge, supra, this court epitomized the foregoing conclusions in the following apt words: "Liberty of the press must not be confounded with mere license. Liberty of the press stops where a further exercise would invade the rights of others. This provision of the constitution does not authorize a usurpation of the functions of the courts. Under the plea of the liberty of the press, a newspaper has no right to assail litigants during the progress of a trial, intimidate witnesses, dictate verdicts or judgments, or spread before juries its opinion of the merits of cases which are on trial. As stated before, what may be spoken may be written; and the converse of the proposition is true, that what may not be spoken under such circumstances may not be written." In the case of People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 209, 48 P. 75, 82, this court again put into apt and terse language its views upon this subject as follows: "A publication during the course of a trial which reflects on the court, or assails the litigants, or seeks to intimidate witnesses, or spreads before the jury an opinion upon the merits of the controversy, or threatens them with public odium, or attempts to dictate the decision, or in any improper way endeavors to influence the determination, is unquestionably a contempt of court." In the case of Patterson v. Colorado, 205 U. S. 454, 27 S. Ct. 556, 558, 51 L. Ed. 879, 10 Ann. Cas. 689, Mr. Justice Holmes says: "The theory of our system is that the conclusions to be reached in a case will be induced only by evidence and argument in open court, and not by any outside influence, whether of private talk or public print. What is true with reference to a jury is true also with reference to a court. * * * Judges generally perhaps are less apprehensive that publications impugning their own reasoning or motives will interfere with their administration of the law. But if a court regards, as it may, a publication concerning a matter of law pending before it, as tending toward such an interference, it may punish it as in the instance put. When a case is finished courts are subject to the same criticism as other people; but the propriety and necessity of preventing interference with the course of justice by premature statement, argument, or intimidation hardly can be denied."

[5] It is one of the contentions of the petitioner that this contempt proceeding must fail for the reason that it is nowhere stated or found therein that the public utterances of the petitioner with respect to the several causes and proceedings and to the judicial officers engaged therein were not the truth. To this contention Mr. Justice Holmes, in the case last above cited, furnishes a complete reply when he states: "In the next place, the rule applied to criminal libels applies yet more clearly to contempts. A publication likely to reach the eyes of a jury, declaring a witness in a pending cause a perjurer, would be none the less a contempt that it was true. It would tend to obstruct the administration of justice, because even a correct conclusion is not to be reached or helped in that way, if our system of trials is to be maintained. The theory of our system is that the conclusions to be reached in a case will be induced only by evidence and argument in open court, and not by any outside influence, whether of private talk or public print."

We do not intend to state or intimate in this opinion that the acts and conduct of courts with respect to matters in which they have performed their functions or exercised their judgments are not subject to the laws touching libel and slander, to be freely and fully subjected to both private and public comment and criticism on the part of every person or group of persons, whatever may be their station or instrumentalities of expression in our body politic, and whatever effect the comments, utterances, and expressions of these or any of these may have in the formation of either a friendly or an adverse public opinion. It is only when such expressions or utterances, in whatever form or forum, have for their intent, purpose, and manifest tendency an interference with the orderly administration of justice in pending causes that they can be held to so far exceed the constitutional boundaries to freedom of speech and of the press as to constitute contempt of court under the statutes of this state defining the same.

[6] It is not essential, in order to constitute such contempt, to show that the actions of the court or of the judge thereof were actually influenced by the public utterances of the petitioner herein complained of. In the case of Sinclair v. United States, 279 U. S. 749, 764, 49 S. Ct. 471, 476, 73 L. Ed. 938, 63 A. L. R. 1258, it was aptly stated by Mr. Justice McReynolds, in delivering the opinion of the court, that "It is said there is no proof that the mind of the judge was influenced or his purpose to do his duty obstructed or restrained by the publications and, therefore, there was no proof tending to show the wrong complained of. But here again not the influence upon the mind of the particular judge is the criterion but the reasonable tendency of the acts done to influence or bring about the baleful result is the test. In other words, having regard to the powers conferred, to the protection of society, to the honest and fair administration of justice and to the evil to come from its obstruction, the wrong depends upon the tendency of the acts to accomplish this result without reference to the consideration of how far they may have been without influence in a particular case. The wrongdoer may not be heard to try the power of the judge to resist acts of obstruction and wrongdoing by him committed as a prelude to trial and punishment for his wrongful acts."

We have thus far dealt with the acts, utterances, and conduct of the petitioner as the same are set forth in the first six counts of the accusation against him and in the findings, conclusions, and commitment of the trial court with relation thereto.

[7, 8] With respect to the seventh count in the accusation, but brief comment is required. The grand jury is an instrumentality of the courts of this state, and as such is charged with a quasi judicial inquisition into the conduct of citizens and of public institutions and officials, and is to be as fully protected in the exercise of its powers and functions in that regard as the courts themselves. Whatever, therefore, manifestly tends and is intended to constitute an interference with the proper exercise of the duties and functions of a grand jury while engaged in the consideration of such matters as may properly come before it would obviously amount to a contempt of court. We entertain no doubt that the broadcasted utterances of the petitioner as set forth in count 7 of said accusation, and as above recited with sufficient of detail, amounted to such contempt as would have subjected him to the pains and penalties thereof provided by law. In view of the fact, however, that the broadcasted utterances of petitioner in the foregoing regard formed a portion of a single address delivered by him, as hereinabove set forth, the trial court saw fit to consider such address as constituting a single act of contempt and to fix the penalty therefor accordingly.

[9, 10] It is the contention of the petitioner that the trial court in passing upon the accusation made against him ought to have treated the entire contempt of all of his several utterances as constituting but one contempt, and subject, as such, to but the single, or at most double, penalty provided and limited by law for the punishment of a contempt of court. We are unable to accede to the petitioner's contention in the foregoing regard. The several broadcasted addresses of the petitioner occurred upon different dates and were delivered, of necessity, therefore to different audiences, and dealt in the main with different phases of the proceedings then pending in the courts and before the judicial officers against which his animadversions were in each instance directed. They therefore, in our opinion, each constituted a separate offense and were properly dealt with as such by the trial court. The petitioner makes the final contention that, conceding this to be true, the trial court was still in error in making its judgment and commitment, and the punishment prescribed thereby, run consecutively instead of concurrently, in conformity to what it is insisted the law relative to such judgments and commitments intends. In making this contention, counsel for the petitioner concedes that section 669 of the Penal Code relative to concurrent penalties does not apply to cases of contempt, in view of the provisions of section 11 of the Penal Code. It is, however, insisted that, in the light of these provisions of the Penal Code, there is no law in California permitting consecutive sentences in contempt cases. No authorities, however, are cited on behalf of the petitioner in support of this contention. But from the briefs and arguments of counsel for the respondent herein it appears that from an early date in our judicial history courts have claimed and exercised the right to impose consecutive sentences in contempt cases, and have been upheld in that regard by the court of last resort. People v. Forbes, 22 Cal. 135, is the earliest, and Lindsley v. Superior Court, 76 Cal. App. 419, 245 P. 212, is the latest, decision of our appellate tribunals upholding this power and its exercise on the part of trial courts. The case last cited is instructive in its practical identity with the instant proceeding and in its exhaustive citation of authority in support of its conclusions. The case of Solano Aquatic Club v. Superior Court, 165 Cal. 278, 131 P. 874, is also instructive in its statement of what we deem to be the settled law with respect to the separate and consecutive penalties to be imposed upon several, though consecutive, acts, each amounting to a contempt of court.

The record herein discloses that the petitioner, prior to his application to this court for a writ of habeas corpus and to the granting of said writ, with the consequent release of the petitioner pending a hearing thereon, had been imprisoned for a period of the fifteen days covered by the four terms of five days each provided for in the aforesaid judgment and commitment, and that in addition thereto the petitioner in his application for said writ had offered to pay whatever portions of the fines imposed upon him should be found to remain due under his contention that but a single penalty for a single contempt should have been imposed. It appears, therefore, that, eliminating the penalty imposed under the first count in said accusation, he has served the periods of imprisonment lawfully imposed under said commitment, but that the fines imposed by the consecutive penalties thereof remain unpaid.

It is, therefore, ordered that the proceedings under and in conformity with the writ of habeas corpus heretofore issued herein be and the same are hereby discharged, and that the petitioner be and he is hereby remanded to the custody of the respondent herein.

PER CURIAM.

Appellant filed in the court below a complaint styled "Complaint for Declaratory Relief and Injunction." General demurrers thereto were sustained without leave to amend and judgment of dismissal was duly entered and an appeal taken to this court. Respondents move for an order dismissing the appeal, and/or an order affirming judgment, on a number of grounds, the substance of which is that appellant has not printed in its opening brief or in any supplement thereto such portions of the record as it desires to call to the attention of the court, as required by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, in support of its plea for a reversal of the judgment; and has not complied with rule 8 of this court relating to the same matters.

Appellant's short brief may be subject to some of the criticisms advanced by respondents, but the substance of the complaint and demurrers does quite clearly appear, and the court's attention is "attracted" to paragraphs 11, 13, and 18 of the long lease between the parties. It is stated in the brief "that there was an actual controversy relating to the legal rights and duties of the respective parties and the prayer of the complaint asked for a declaration of plaintiff's rights and duties in the premises, including a question of construction arising under such written instrument or contract." The brief concludes with a citation of authorities: Oldham v. Moodie, 94 Cal. App. 88, 270 P. 688, and McIntyre v. Cons. Water Co., 205 Cal. 231, 270 P. 444, which seem to support the contention of appellant that the complaint contains a sufficient statement of a cause of action to withstand a general demurrer.

The motion is denied.

WASTE, C. J.

[1] This action, to recover the sum of $999 and interest as damages arising out of the alleged wrongful conversion of an automobile by the sheriff of Los Angeles county, was commenced and prosecuted to judgment for the plaintiff in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles. Defendant appealed to the superior court of Los Angeles county, and, from the judgment of affirmance therein entered, he perfected an appeal to the District Court of Appeal on March 30, 1927. That court, of its own motion, has dismissed the appeal (285 P. 332; 286 P. 469) on the ground that an amendment to the Municipal Court Act, effective August 14, 1929, deprived the court of jurisdiction. St. 1929, p. 837. The cause of action arose outside the city, but within Los Angeles county. Prior to the 1929 amendment, supra, a distinction was made between cases arising within a city, and those arising outside the city, in which a municipal court is established, but within the county. In the former class of cases no appeal lay from the superior court to the District Courts of Appeal, while in the latter class of cases such appeal did lie. Johnston v. Wolf, 208 Cal. 286, 280 P. 980. The amendment had the effect of depriving the District Courts of Appeal of jurisdiction over appeals from the superior courts in any action within the jurisdiction of the municipal courts; but, at the time the amendment became effective, there were pending and undetermined before the several divisions of the District Courts of Appeal many appeals from judgments of the municipal courts, and it therefore became necessary to determine what effect, if any, the change of jurisdiction resulting from said amendment had upon appeals duly perfected prior thereto. Upon this jurisdictional question the several divisions of the District Courts of Appeal were unable to agree, with the result that this cause, among others, was transferred to this court.

[2-4] While it is the general rule that a cause of action or remedy dependent on statute falls with a repeal of the statute, even after the action thereon is pending, in the absence of a saving clause in the repealing statute (Callet v. Alioto [Cal. Sup.] 290 P. 438; Moss v. Smith, 171 Cal. 777, 155 P. 90; People v. Bank of San Luis Obispo, 159 Cal. 65, 112 P. 866, 37 L. R. A. [N. S.] 934, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1148), it is equally well settled and is a fundamental rule of statutory construction that every statute will be construed to operate prospectively, and will not be given a retrospective effect, unless the intention that it should have that effect is clearly expressed (Callet v. Alioto, supra; Pignaz v. Burnett, 119 Cal. 157, 51 P. 48; Montecito County Water Dist. v. Doulton, 193 Cal. 398, 224 P. 747). There is nothing in the 1929 amendment of section 29 of the Municipal Court Act, supra, indicating that it was intended to have a retroactive operation. The better reasoned cases, we believe, are those that support the view that the change in the appellate jurisdiction of the District Courts of Appeal, in so far as appeals from judgments of municipal courts are concerned, was not intended to apply retroactively, and hence does not take from the appellate courts jurisdiction of appeals perfected at the time the amendment became effective. In this connection, see the cases of Jones v. Summers (Cal. App.) 286 P. 1093, and Harris v. Moore (Cal. App.) 283 P. 76.

It is therefore necessary that we consider this appeal on its merits. The action is one for the conversion of an automobile. The findings establish the material facts. Plaintiff was the owner of the automobile involved. On April 11, 1924, he entered into a conditional contract of sale of the automobile with one V. H. Worl, under the terms of which the purchaser agreed to pay therefor $650 in stated installments. By the terms of the agreement, title remained in the seller until the purchaser fully complied with all the covenants and conditions of the contract. The pink certificate of ownership issued by the motor vehicle department and showing plaintiff to be the registered legal owner of said automobile, remained in the possession and under the control of the plaintiff, and no assignment or transfer thereof was made. On August 28, 1924, and for some time prior thereto, the purchaser, Worl, was in default, and had forfeited his rights under the contract, by the terms of which plaintiff was entitled to take immediate possession of the automobile. On or about that date the defendant, as sheriff of Los Angeles county, levied an attachment on the automobile in an action commenced by a third party against Worl, and took possession of the automobile from Worl without plaintiff's consent, and thereafter sold it at execution sale. Prior to such sale, the plaintiff, as provided by sections 549 and 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure, executed and caused to be served upon the defendant a notice of third party claim, notifying defendant of his ownership of the automobile, and demanding its immediate possession, but, notwithstanding such notice and claim of ownership and demand for possession, the defendant wrongfully sold and converted it.

[5-7] The findings are amply supported by the evidence and support the judgment for the plaintiff. There is no merit in appellant's contention that the trial court erred in failing to pass upon his motion for a nonsuit. The entry of judgment for the respondent worked a denial of the motion.

[8] It was not error to allow interest from August 28, 1924. The testimony is somewhat uncertain as to the actual date of the conversion, but a reading of the entire record, including the exhibits, satisfactorily establishes that it occurred between the dates fixed in the complaint, viz., August 20 and 28, 1924.

[9] It was not error to permit plaintiff to testify to the value of the automobile. The owner of personal property may properly testify as to its value. Willard v. Valley G. & F. Co., 171 Cal. 9, 14, 151 P. 286.

The judgment is affirmed.

[1] This cause was originally and properly appealed to the District Court of Appeal (285 P. 335; 286 P. 470), prior to the amendment of the "act authorizing the establishment of municipal courts," etc., effective August 14, 1929 (St. 1929, p. 837). That court, however, of its own motion, made and entered an order dismissing the appeal for lack of jurisdiction on the ground that the amendment should be given a retroactive effect, thereby working a dismissal of this and other pending appeals which had been perfected before the effective date of the change in the law. Our views upon the jurisdictional question involved are fully set forth in the case of Berg v. Traeger, 292 P. 495, this day filed. We need only direct our attention, therefore, to the merits of the appeal in this cause.

Plaintiff seeks to recover $430.10 as damages for the alleged conversion of two automobile truck tires. The answer denies the material allegations of the complaint, and by way of affirmative defense alleges that defendant's assignor, as lessor, had entered into a lease or conditional sales contract with one Lockhart, as lessee, for the sale and purchase of a five-ton autotruck; that, among other things, the contract provided that any accessories added to the property or improvements made thereon should become part of the property, and in event of the termination of the lease for default of lessee should not be removed from the property, but should belong to the lessor; that during the lessee's possession of the truck, and prior to his performance of the conditions of the contract, the plaintiff, at the lessee's request and with full knowledge of the terms of the contract, removed from the truck, without the defendant's consent, two tires then attached thereto, and placed thereon the two tires here in dispute, which thereupon became a part and parcel of the truck, and became the property of the defendant. The trial court's findings follow closely the allegations of defendant's affirmative defense, with the addition of a finding to the effect that the two tires in dispute cannot be removed without detriment to the truck. Judgment was entered for the defendant.

Supreme Court of California.

Sept. 26, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 23, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇐2.

Statute depriving District Courts of Appeal of jurisdiction over appeal from superior courts in any action within jurisdiction of municipal court did not take from appellate court jurisdiction of appeal vested at time amendment became effective (St. 1929, p. 837).

2. Accession ⇐1.

Conditional seller, with knowledge of lease contract, held not estopped to claim tires attached to leased truck repossessed by lessor.

No estoppel existed where it was not alleged, proved, or found that lessor was injured by any act of conditional seller of tires; finding that tires could not be removed without detriment to truck failing to show estoppel, where uncontroverted evidence disclosed that removal of tires furnished by conditional seller would leave truck in substantially same condition that it was prior to their attachment.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

The plaintiff appeals and urges, in substance, that it had sold the two tires to the lessee, Lockhart, under a conditional sales contract, retaining title to the tires in itself until full payment had been made therefor, and that, at the time defendant repossessed itself of the truck and "converted" the tires, Lockhart had not fully paid for them. From this premise appellant argues that it is still the owner of the tires and cannot be divested of title thereto by the provisions of the lease contract between defendant and Lockhart to which it is not a party, citing, among others, Meister, etc., Co. v. Harrison, 56 Cal. App. 679, 206 P. 106, Clarke v. Johnson, 43 Nev. 359, 187 P. 510, and Berry on Automobiles (5th Ed.) § 1593. These authorities support the contention of appellant as a general rule of law applicable in cases in which the title to the accessories and replacements had not passed to the purchaser of the automobile, but are not strictly applicable to the situation here presented. If the appellant had placed the tires on the truck in ignorance of the provisions of the auto lease contract, there would be no doubt as to its immediate right to recover in this action; but, in support of the findings, it appears from the evidence that, before attaching the tires to the truck, the appellant was told by Lockhart that the truck was not paid for, but was being bought under a lease contract with the defendant, to whom appellant was referred; and there is evidence that appellant sought to have the respondent finance the sale of the tires to Lockhart, but was refused, and that appellant was also notified by the respondent that the tires put on the truck would be claimed by respondent and would not be allowed to be removed.

[2] The allegations of the respondent's affirmative defense and the findings apparently proceed upon the theory of an estoppel, but it is not alleged, proved, or found that the respondent was in any way injured by any act of appellant. The finding that the tires cannot be removed without detriment to the truck fails to supply one element essential to support an estoppel. There is uncontroverted evidence to the effect that, at the time the appellant attached its tires to the truck wheels, the vehicle was in need of new tires, the old ones having "worn out." Therefore the removal of the tires furnished by the appellant will leave the truck in substantially the same condition that it was prior to their attachment, and the respondent will not suffer any injury. The cause must therefore go back for a second trial in order to permit the trial court to determine, upon competent evidence, whether or not the respondent in any way altered its position to its detriment in relying upon the appellant's apparent abandonment of title.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to proceed as herein outlined.

SCHMIDT, Justice pro tem.

On April 24, 1929, one John C. Flick filed in the superior court of Los Angeles county his action against one Maude Wheaton, petitioner herein, to foreclose a mechanic's lien in the sum of $917.20. On April 22, 1930, said petitioner herein moved the respondent court to dismiss the action on the ground that the property against which the lien was attempted to be foreclosed was within the city of Los Angeles and that by reason of the change in jurisdiction of the municipal court, as provided by act of the 1929 legislature (Deering's Gen. Laws, 1929, p. 3527), the superior court had lost jurisdiction of the action. The motion was denied. Subsequently the case was tried and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff, against petitioner, in the sum of $917.20, plus interest and costs, and provided that same be adjudged a lien against the land described in plaintiff's complaint. Subsequently an order of court was made appointing a commissioner to sell the real property described in the judgment; execution issued thereon, and the commissioner, pursuant to the execution, sold the property. Subsequently an order was issued to show cause why the judgment should not be vacated and set aside and why the commissioner should not be permanently restrained from selling the premises referred to in the judgment. The motions to vacate and set aside and to restrain the commissioner from selling were denied, and the order to show cause dismissed. Petitioner thereupon filed her petition in this court, asking for a writ of mandate compelling the respondent superior court to vacate said judgment and set aside the sale of the property by the commissioner.

[1, 2] Petitioner contends by reason of the change in the jurisdiction of the municipal court by the act of the 1929 Legislature that the superior court was deprived of jurisdiction to continue with the action. If this contention is correct, then the action should have been dismissed in the superior court and a new action would have to be filed in the municipal court. This would have become a useless act, for by the terms of section 1190, Code of Civil Procedure, the lien theretofore filed under section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, would have become ineffective, inasmuch as more than ninety days had elapsed from the filing of the lien to the bringing of the new action. Article 20, § 15, of the Constitution of the state of California, provides: "Mechanics, materialmen, artisans, and laborers of every class shall have a lien upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished material, for the value of such labor done and material furnished; and the legislature shall provide, by law, for the speedy and efficient enforcement of such liens." This makes it mandatory upon the Legislature to provide a remedy for the foreclosure of a lien.

The amendments of the 1929 Legislature changing the jurisdiction contained no saving clause; nor was any method provided for transfer to the municipal court of actions then pending in the superior court. This shows an entire absence of intent upon the part of the Legislature that the act should operate retrospectively upon the many cases then pending in the superior court. Surely, the Legislature, in changing the jurisdiction, must have had in mind the constitutional provision providing for liens, and, if it had intended that cases then pending in the superior court should be transferred to the municipal court, it without doubt would have provided the means for such transfer. As was said in Estate of Frees, 187 Cal. 150, at page 156, 201 P. 112, 114, "It is also a general rule of statutory construction that statutes should not be construed retrospectively unless it is clear that such was the legislative intention."

We conclude, therefore, that the amendment could apply only to new cases filed involving liens.

In Architectural Tile Co. v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 291 P. 586, recently decided by this court but not yet final, and in Berg v. Traeger (Cal. Sup.) 292 P. 495, similar questions were involved, and the reasoning in each case reached the same conclusion.

[3] Attack is made upon the form of judgment as rendered. We cannot consider same in this proceeding. The matter to which complaint is directed is at best an error at law, and, if an error at law, must be corrected upon appeal.

Petition for writ of mandate denied; respondent to recover his costs in this proceeding.

PEOPLE v. PANTAGES.*
Cr. 1922.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

Sept. 26, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 10, 1930.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Oct. 24, 1930.

1. Criminal law ⇨719(1).

In criminal case, argument of counsel should be based solely upon evidence.

2. Criminal law ⇨704.

Opening statement by defendant's counsel does not constitute evidence and is not binding, and therefore, in absence of bad faith, failure to make good such statement should not be argued.

3. Criminal law ⇨713.

Conviction should not rest even slightly upon dereliction of counsel, but should ordinarily be grounded upon acts committed by defendant.

4. Criminal law ⇨704.

District attorney may in argument direct jury's attention to defendant's failure to substantiate counsel's opening statement.

5. Criminal law ⇨1171(1).

In prosecution for statutory rape, prosecutors' argument, in effect, charging defendant's counsel with grossest bad faith in failing to substantiate part of opening statement, held prejudicial error.

Defendant's counsel, in opening statement, pointed out what defendant expected to prove in his defense. Defendant repeatedly but unsuccessfully attempted to introduce certain evidence to substantiate part of opening statement, whereupon district attorney and deputy in argument to jury pointed out that defendant's attorneys failed to make good fulfillment of their promise which represented only bunch of "unredeemed pledges" and in effect charged defendant's attorneys with the grossest bad faith.

6. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 730(1).

Instruction to disregard improper argument does not cure error, where it appears reasonably clear that harmful result could not have been remedied.

7. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 730(8).

In prosecution for statutory rape, prosecutors' argument giving their personal opinion with reference to witnesses' character or credibility held prejudicial error, notwithstanding instruction to disregard.

District attorney in substance told jury during argument that as long as he was district attorney he would not put named doctor on witness stand, and that wife of another witness appeared in desperation to support her husband's testimony. As to another witness prosecutor stated that he "is as clean as a hound's tooth and there isn't a thing against him," and as to still another that "he stands without the possibility of impeachment."

8. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 730(8).

In prosecution for statutory rape, district attorney's argument based on assumption that prosecutrix was a virgin held prejudicial error, notwithstanding cautionary instruction.

Based on assumption that prosecuting witness was a virgin, district attorney made dramatic appeal to jury. At close of case, trial court instructed jury that if counsel upon either side made any statements concerning facts of case "you must be careful not to regard such statements as evidence and must look entirely to the proofs in ascertaining what the facts are."

9. Witnesses $\Rightarrow$ 372(1).

Questions on cross-examination of witness, tending to show bias, are competent, and great latitude should be allowed in developing existence of bias (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1847, 2051).

If witness, directly or indirectly, be induced either to give false testimony or to color truth of sworn statements, jury should be placed not merely in possession of affirmative ultimate fact of bias or denial thereof, but, if necessary, should hear basic facts, if any, upon which such conclusion is founded.

10. Witnesses $\Rightarrow$ 372(2), 374(1).

Fact that witness may have received some favorable consideration from district attorney for favorable testimony may be disclosed by cross-examination or other evidence.

11. Witnesses $\Rightarrow$ 372(2).

In prosecution for statutory rape, refusing to permit cross-examination of state's witness, regarding motives or state of mind, held error (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1847, 2051).

Proposed cross-examination sought to inquire of witness whether he knew that he had been indicted in another state on various criminal charges, and whether any arrangement or promise had been held out to him by district attorney or police department or sheriff, whereby if witness should testify favorable to prosecution in instant case he might receive leniency or more favorable action in case of possible extradition.

12. Rape $\Rightarrow$ 40(2).

In prosecution for statutory rape, evidence showing previous acts of unchastity is inadmissible for sole purpose of attacking prosecutrix's character.

13. Rape $\Rightarrow$ 40(2).

In prosecution for rape, accomplished by force or violence, testimony showing prior unchaste acts of prosecutrix is admissible.

Evidence under such circumstances is admissible, not for direct purpose of impeaching prosecutrix's character, but for purpose of discrediting her testimony relating to use of force or violence by defendant in accomplishing his purpose.

14. Rape $\Rightarrow$ 40(2).

In prosecution for statutory rape, where prosecutrix testified defendant used force and violence, defendant's testimony showing prosecutrix was not virgin on date of alleged attack held admissible (Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 3).

Testimony complained of and excluded was admissible as supporting theory that prosecutrix prior to alleged attack was lacking in virtue, and that therefore her testimony relating to force and violence exerted by defendant was not to be believed, and consequently either that no crime was committed or that, if committed, prosecutrix consented thereto.

15. Rape Pen. Code § 264(2).

Testimony showing previous unchastity of prosecutrix held admissible as bearing on place of imprisonment to be recommended by jury (Pen. Code, § 264).

16. Rape Pen. Code § 264(2).

In prosecution for statutory rape, testimony showing prosecutrix was not virgin on date of alleged attack held admissible as bearing on question of penetration.

If from the evidence the jury believed that no penetration took place, defendant at most could have been convicted of no greater offense than attempt to commit rape.

17. Indictment and Information Pen. Code § 164.

Issue of fact in criminal cases arises from allegation of ultimate fact made by one of parties which is denied by other.

Generally only manner recognizable in court of law for determination of issue of fact is introduction of evidence made acceptable by statute or by established legal practice.

18. Criminal law Pen. Code § 857(1).

Jury in determining ultimate fact of either guilt or innocence should not be influenced by either pity or sympathy.

19. Rape Pen. Code § 13.

Generally in prosecution for statutory rape, consent of prosecutrix is not an issue.

Where prosecutrix, though under age of 18 years, testifies that rape was accomplished by force or violence exerted by defendant, evidence of consent becomes admissible, not only for purpose of impeachment as to manner in which act was accomplished, but also for purpose of laying foundation for impeachment as to whether crime was committed at all.

20. Rape Pen. Code § 59(8).

In prosecution for statutory rape, instruction that prosecutrix's consent was wholly immaterial held prejudicial error, where evidence showing consent was admissible for impeachment purposes.

21. Rape Pen. Code § 60.

Jury's recommendation, in rape case, as to place of imprisonment, is essential, inseparable part of verdict, and therefore binding upon trial court (Pen. Code, § 264).

22. Rape Pen. Code § 38(1).

In prosecution for statutory rape, testimony showing facts and circumstances attending commission of offense held admissible for jury's consideration on question of place of imprisonment (Pen. Code, §§ 17, 264).

Facts and circumstances surrounding offense, admissible, include degree of force or violence exercised by defendant, consent of prosecutrix, and any other circumstances throwing relevant and material light upon true situation of defendant and prosecutrix at and reasonably preceding time offense was alleged to have been committed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles W. Fricke, Judge.

Alexander Pantages was convicted of the crime of rape of a female person under the age of 18 years, and he appeals.

Reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

See, also, 286 P. 467, 469; 291 P. 831.

Le Compte Davis, Jerry Giesler, W. I. Gilbert and Earle M. Daniels, all of Los Angeles, and Louis Titus, of Washington, D. C., for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Robert P. Stewart, Chief Deputy Dist. Atty., and Harold Jones, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for the People.

HOUSER, J.

Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of the crime of rape of "a female person under the age of eighteen years." He also appeals from each of three several orders by which was denied respectively his motion for a new trial, his motion in arrest of judgment, and his motion for leave to file application for probation.

It is first contended by appellant that the evidence adduced on the trial of the action was legally insufficient to support the verdict. It would serve no useful purpose to herein set forth the facts which were presented by the prosecution in substantiation of the charge made against defendant. In that regard it may suffice to state that after careful consideration of the evidence, even viewed in the light as presented by appellant, this court is of the opinion that the contention as to its legal insufficiency cannot prevail.

[1-5] Misconduct of the district attorney and of his chief deputy is urged by appellant as a reason for the reversal of the judgment and the order by which the motion for a new trial was denied. In that connection, the first specification relates to comments made by the district attorney in his argument to the jury, particularly with reference to the failure of defendant to produce evidence in support of a statement made by one of the attorneys representing defendant in his opening statement to the jury as to what defendant expected to prove in defense of the accusation of the crime, for the alleged commission of which he was then on trial. The history of such several errors of which appellant first complains is that in his argument to the jury the chief deputy district attorney made the remark that defendant's attorneys had "failed to make good the fulfillment of their promise," which represented only "a bunch of unredeemed pledges"; and that "you saw how the court repeatedly called for an offer to make competent these innuendoes—" After objection thereto by defendant, the court instructed the jury to disregard "any remarks of counsel about offers of proof." Thereafter, in presenting his argument to the jury, the district attorney referred to the same matter as that which theretofore had been commented upon by the chief deputy district attorney, to which remarks defendant again objected. Thereupon the trial court ruled that "the district attorney may call attention to the opening statement and may mention the fact that that was not sustained by evidence, and that there was no evidence to that effect." On each of several other occasions following an objection by counsel for defendant to statements contained in argument presented by either the district attorney or his chief deputy, which statement injuriously reflected upon and criticized counsel for defendant for their failure to produce evidence in substantiation of designated portions of their opening statement to the jury, the judge of the trial court not only failed to rebuke the district attorney or his chief deputy, but indicated his approval of the remark in question. An illustration of objectionable remarks made by the district attorney is the following:

"Now, ladies and gentlemen, the only reason why I am stating this thing to this jury is this: They knew in their hearts they could not prove it, they knew they had no evidence and they knew in their hearts that there was no such evidence. They had to get something before this jury. They had intimated to you, they had insinuated it to you, they had to plant a seed in your mind, and the only way in God's green world that they could get it in front of you, in the absence of some testimony, was to say it to you in their opening statement, hoping that we would overlook it in closing argument. * * * They knew in their hearts they could not prove it, for they knew it was not true, but they had to get something of that type, they had to throw up a smoke screen, and that opening statement, ladies and gentlemen of this jury, is just about in keeping with the whole character of the insinuation, the innuendoes, the aspersions on the character of that old Mrs. Pringle as she sat on the witness stand here. * * * His whole conduct, the whole conduct of the defendant, from the moment that W. I. Gilbert stood in front of this jury, has been the protection of a defense based on insinuation and innuendo and indirection without one single effort, or one single word of testimony coming from the lips of any human being to this jury to back up their insinuations. They could not do it and they knew it, any more than when Mr. Gilbert said, as a positive fact, in the same statement, that the spots on her clothing will be accounted for by her own physical condition—by her own physical condition! Where is your testimony? * * *

Has there been produced before this jury one single word that would account for the presence of spermatozoan upon a dress of that girl other than from the organs of the defendant himself, Alexander Pantages? I say to you, with all the earnestness and all the candor that God has put in me, that they had no evidence, and they knew before they came here that they had no evidence as to anything of that sort. They had to implant it in your minds. They had to have it there in your mind when you heard the State's case come in, instead of waiting, as they usually do in these cases, for their opening statement at the beginning of their case they implanted the seeds of innuendo and indirection into your mind, all through the case. They have not lived up to their promise to you. They could not and they knew in their hearts that it was not true and they could not have lived up to it, and they knew when they stood here and made a positive statement of fact to this jury, and to this court, that they could not prove the things that they told you they were going to prove. * * *

In People v. Stoll, 143 Cal. 689, 77 P. 818, the rule is stated that the only purpose of an opening statement by counsel is to apprise the jury in a general way of what is expected to be proved; but that it has no binding force as against the party in whose behalf it is made; nor can it be considered as evidence of any fact. In each of several cases where no evidence was offered in support of an opening statement made by a district attorney, the court held that, in the absence of a showing of "bad faith" on the part of the district attorney in making such statement, no reversible error was present. People v. Wong Hing, 176 Cal. 699, 169 P. 357; People v. Lewis, 124 Cal. 551, 57 P. 470, 45 L. R. A. 783; People v. Donaldson, 36 Cal. App. 63, 171 P. 442; People v. Davis, 26 Cal. App. 647, 147 P. 1184.

In the instant case the record discloses the fact that on numerous occasions occurring during the trial, owing to objections which were interposed by the district attorney and which were sustained by the trial court, unsuccessful efforts were made in behalf of defendant to introduce evidence in support of the alleged facts which, in his opening statement to the jury, the attorney for defendant had said he expected to prove, and which statement was the subject of criticism and argument by the district attorney, from which it follows that, at least legally speaking, defendant may not be said to have presented his opening statement in "bad faith."

It is clear that in the trial of an action, proper argument should be based solely on the evidence, and that if the opening statement to the jury does not constitute evidence and is not binding upon the party making it, then, in the absence of "bad faith," his failure to "make good" should not be argued by the opposite party as a reason for a verdict. The conviction of a defendant of the crime of which he is accused should rest not even slightly upon the dereliction (if any) of his counsel, but ordinarily should be grounded upon acts committed by the defendant either actually or by law imputed to him. As ruled by the trial judge, and as indicated in State v. Boyce, 24 Wash. 514, 64 P. 719, the district attorney and his chief deputy were within their legal rights in plainly and simply directing the attention of the jury to the fact that, although counsel for defendant had stated to the jury that he expected to prove certain specified facts on behalf of defendant, nevertheless no evidence had been received by the court in substantiation thereof; but when, in substance, the district attorney and his chief deputy had thus far proceeded, the limit of legitimate quasi argument in that regard had been reached. To go further (and in the face of the fact that defendant had repeatedly, but unsuccessfully, attempted to introduce evidence relating to the situation which he had stated that he expected to develop) and to charge the attorney or attorneys who represented defendant with the grossest of "bad faith" in the matter, and thereupon, impliedly at least, to predicate an impassioned and compelling argument demanding the conviction of defendant, constituted an error which was prejudicial to the substantial rights of defendant. It is a well-known fact that intemperate and inflammatory language coming from the lips of a high officer of the county claims an attention from the ordinary juror which, if similarly given voice by the defense, it does not receive. When it is considered that what was said by the district attorney was apparently with the sanction and approval of the judge of the trial court, the prejudicial effect on the substantial rights of the defendant becomes apparent.

[6, 7] The next specifications of alleged misconduct by the district attorney relate to his argument to the jury wherein he either indicated, or by his language expressly stated, his personal opinion with reference to the personal character or reliability of each of two witnesses. The several remarks to which attention herein is directed were as follows:

(a) " * * * Doctor Beatty came on the witness stand here. I did not put Doctor Beatty on, and I say to this jury right now, as long as I am district attorney of this county I will never put Doctor Beatty on the witness stand."

(b) " * * * What does Mrs. Biffle say? Mrs. Biffle, ladies and gentlemen. I feel sorry for her. She is here trying desperately to do what any wife would do, to support her husband. Mrs. Biffle never appeared in this picture. She testified that she read Mr. Biffle's testimony in the newspaper at home and that out of desperation she came down here to support her husband, but she didn't quite support him for, listen,—"

(With reference to the statement that "out of desperation she came down here to support her husband," it is contended by appellant, and not denied by respondent, that "a careful review of the testimony of Mrs. Biffle, * * * will not disclose even a remote basis" for the inference drawn by the district attorney.)

In addition to the foregoing, appellant complains of remarks made on each of two separate occasions in argument by the chief deputy district attorney, wherein he said:

(c) " * * * How about Mr. Gilbert (one of the attorneys who represented defendant), just as skilful as any of them, and a little bit worse. You know what he did in your presence. He actually asked that man Hale, who is as clean as a hound's tooth and there isn't a thing against him, 'Don't you know there are ten felony charges pending against you, or were pending against you on August 9th?'"

(d) " * * * Then I recall another which is symbolic of the fairness of these three experts engaged in this arduous defense and simply speak of the innuendo when Mr. Gordon, who otherwise stands, and who stands without the possibility of impeachment, they asked him questions about his visit to Reno. It was ruled out; it is not in the case."

In the case of People v. Alpine, 81 Cal. App. 456, 254 P. 281, 286, the record shows that the deputy district attorney in charge of the prosecution of the action made various remarks which reflected upon each of several witnesses who had testified in behalf of the defendant. On appeal, in considering the question generally, among other things, the appellate court said:

"The remarks of the deputy district attorney to which appellant took exception constituted misconduct of an extreme type, and the trial judge erred in not instructing the jury to disregard them. They did not present a legitimate argument upon the evidence before the jury, and, moreover, they constituted an impeachment of appellant's witnesses in a manner not contemplated by the law."

In State v. Heaton, 149 Wash. 452, 271 P. 89, 91, a situation similar to that involved herein was given consideration by the court. It was there said:

"The declarations of counsel for the state in his argument to the jury (above quoted), referring to the credibility of certain of the state's witnesses, to the effect that he had worked with them long and was in a position to know their character, transcended the bounds of legitimate argument and amounted to an attempt on the part of counsel to testify as to the witnesses' good character. Such a statement as this cannot be met by any answering argument, and it is vain to attempt to do away with the prejudicial effect of such assertions by an instruction of the court to the effect that argument of counsel is not to be regarded as evidence." (Citing authorities.)

In the case of Gutzman v. Clancy, 114 Wis. 589, 90 N. W. 1081, 1084, 58 L. R. A. 744, wherein it appeared that in his closing argument to the jury, in referring to one of the witnesses, the attorney for the prosecution had personally impeached the integrity of such witness, the conduct of the attorney was denounced and the conclusion reached that the error was so prejudicial as to necessitate a reversal of the judgment. The following excerpts from the opinion of the court will serve to illustrate the view which is generally taken with reference to such conduct:

"* * * That the statement objected to, upon its face, is improper, as an attempt to state facts to the jury as of the knowledge of the counsel, and not by way of inference from the evidence which they had a right to consider, is obvious. * * * Counsel have no right to avail themselves of the opportunity of addressing the jury in argument to make assertions upon their own knowledge, which, if admissible at all, could be so only under the sanction of a witness' oath. * * * That solemn statements of fact, not by way of argument and deduction from the evidence, but as of the counsel's own knowledge, are likely to have weight with juries, cannot be doubted. The respectability and standing of counsel only serve to enhance the peril. * * *"

In People v. Lieska, 161 Mich. 630, 126 N. W. 636, 639, where on appeal error arising from a similar situation was specified, among other things, the court said:

"* * * It has been repeatedly held by this court that, * * * it is reversible error for the prosecuting attorney to make unwarranted attacks upon respondent's witnesses calculated to arouse in the jury an unjust suspicion of their character and truthfulness. * * * Juries very properly regard the prosecuting attorney as unprejudiced, impartial, and nonpartisan, and insinuations thrown out by him regarding the credibility of witnesses for the defense are calculated to prejudice the respondent. As was said in People v. Cahoon [88 Mich. 456, 50 N. W. 384], supra, these questions and insinuations reflected upon the character of the witnesses. The prosecuting attorney has no right to discredit the witness by innuendo."

And in People v. Huff, 173 Mich. 620, 139 N. W. 1033, 1036, in which the record disclosed the fact that the prosecuting attorney adopted methods not unlike those presented for consideration in the instant case, the Supreme Court of Michigan made the statement that witnesses were entitled to respectful consideration, and not only was it the duty of the trial court to protect witnesses from insinuation and unjust and unwarranted attacks of counsel, but that: "* * * It was highly improper and reversible error for the prosecuting attorney, in the absence of testimony on the subject, to thus praise and extol the skill and standing of a witness for the people. Juries are apt to consider the prosecuting attorney as unprejudiced and impartial, and statements of fact made by him are apt to have great weight. This court has held that it is improper for the trial court to call attention to the high character of a witness in the charge. Wisner v. Bardwell, 38 Mich. 278. It is equally improper for the prosecuting attorney to go outside the testimony and make such statements."

The record herein shows that as to each of the several remarks hereinbefore set forth timely objection thereto was made by an attorney representing defendant on the trial of the action, and that in each instance the judge of the trial court instructed the jury to disregard it. It is now urged by respondent that in such circumstances any erroneous conduct in the premises committed by the district attorney, or by the chief deputy, must be deemed to have been corrected and the error thus voided. Although authorities are not lacking in their declaration of the law in substance that the effect of such prejudicial misconduct may be cured by an instruction to the jury to disregard the remark of counsel, nevertheless an exception to such general rule is noted where the misconduct is of such a character that it is reasonably clear that its harmful result could not have been obviated or remedied by an instruction to the jury to disregard it. People v. Simon, 80 Cal. App. 675, 679, 252 P. 758, and cases there cited. It is apparent that repeated acts of misconduct of the same tenor may present a situation radically different from a single isolated transgression of the same general nature; also, that a stern rebuke by the judge of the trial court to the violator of the rule which forbids conduct of the nature of that here under consideration might possibly remove the impression initiated by the misconduct in question. But, to the contrary, that a mild suggestion from such judge as to the impropriety of several separated acts of misconduct, each of the same variety as the others, might produce no result other than a possible accentuation in the minds of the members of the jury of the specific remarks which constituted the several acts of misconduct and carry with them the conviction that in their essence, aside from technical rules of legal practice, the assumed misconduct was in fact praiseworthy and in reality should be considered as entirely proper and wholly exempt from just, adverse, judicial censure, or other criticism.

[8] Another specification of error presented by appellant relates to misconduct on the part of the district attorney in that in addressing the jury he prejudicially assumed the existence in the evidence of the fact that the prosecuting witness was a virgin; and thereafter, based wholly on such assumption, made a dramatic appeal to the passion and prejudice of the jury. An illustration of each of several of the remarks made by the district attorney are the following:

(a) " * * * What did that telephone call show you or this court, or show in this case, whether or not this man raped (the prosecutrix) on the night of August 9th? They put it there to do nothing more in God's world than to blame that girl's mother, to assassinate and destroy the character as that man destroyed her virginity and her body on the afternoon of August 9th, by insinuation, by indirection, by—under that guise and that camouflage. * * * "

(b) " * * * The girl sat there and finally, drive, drive, drive, when she came to the fact of the great moment of her life, and all that any woman holds dear is taken from her, not under the vows of the marriage bed, not under the vows of love given to her, but by brute force, at the hands of a fiend that afternoon, she finally broke down, and there wasn't a man, or woman in this courtroom whose heart did not know that that girl broke down honestly and sincerely because of what had happened to her at the hands of this man with the polluted body and polluted soul on the afternoon of August 9th. * * * "

(c) " * * * This is the insanity that lurked in that man's polluted mind, that is the insanity, and that is the thought that was harbored by his filthy body as he struck that girl down from her girlhood and placed upon her brow, or attempted to place upon her brow, the crown of infamy by branding her a blackmailer. What do you want him to do? Are the American jurors of today, are men and women of this country, going to stand here and let that man with all of his power or authority in America cover up and brand with infamy, by reason of the very power and wealth and strength that he has, after taking this girl's virginity, after destroying her character, then to brand her with the infamy of being a blackmailer by reason of the very position he holds? That is the insanity that lurked in that man's mind that afternoon, and this jury knows in your hearts that that is the insanity that lurked in this man's mind that afternoon as he took that girl's body."

However, in connection therewith it should be noted that at the close of the case, the trial court instructed the jury that:

" * * * If counsel, upon either side, or the court have made any statements in your presence concerning the facts in the case, you must be careful not to regard such statements as evidence, and must look entirely to the proof in ascertaining what the facts are."

In the case of People v. Fong Sing, 38 Cal. App. 253, 266, 175 P. 911, 916, in dealing with an analogous situation, in part, the court used the following language:

"There is nothing we can add to what has been said in the former opinion filed herein, except to express hearty concurrence in the general animadversion of the learned lawyer upon the practice too often resorted to in criminal cases by public prosecutors of lugging into their cases in argument matters having vital bearing upon the case which have not been brought in by evidence and which are calculated to deprive an accused of that fair and impartial trial which is guaranteed to him by the Constitution and the statute laws of the state. * * * And it is equally a mistake for such an officer to suppose that it is proper for him to present to the jury anything but strictly legal evidence in support of the charge, or that it is within the sphere of legitimate argument to prejudice the standing of the accused in the minds of those who are to determine an issue so serious to him by insinuating in the course of his address that some fact bearing strongly against the accused which has not been proved by proper evidence in reality exists."

The language of the Supreme Court of this state, used by it in the case of People v. Lee Chuck, 78 Cal. 317, 328, 20 P. 719, 723, is indicative of the general view held by the several courts of last resort throughout the United States with reference to the duty of the district attorney in the prosecution of a criminal action. It is as follows:

"We have been called upon many times to caution, sometimes to rebuke, prosecuting officers for the overzealous performance of their duties. They seem to forget that it is their sworn duty to see that the defendant has a fair and impartial trial, and that he be not convicted except by competent and legitimate evidence. Equally with the court the district attorney, as the representative of law and justice, should be fair and impartial. He should remember that it is not his sole duty to convict, and that to use his official position to obtain a verdict by illegitimate and unfair means is to bring his office and the courts into distrust. We make due allowance for the zeal which is the natural result of such a legal battle as this, and for the desire of every lawyer to win his case, but these should be overcome by the conscientious desire of a sworn officer of the court to do his duty, and not go beyond it."

Without citing further authority, it may suffice to state that, particularly in criminal actions, the practice of indulging in inflammatory remarks to the jury, especially where, as here, they are founded upon facts not in evidence, is universally condemned by reviewing courts and frequently assigned as the sole cause for reversal of judgments and the award of new trials to defendants. In this connection it may be noted that the case of People v. Hail, 25 Cal. App. 342, 143 P. 803, although following a well-beaten path with reference to misconduct of the district attorney in the particular here in question, contains many appropriate comments and suggestions which well might be the subject of careful consideration. For further illustrations of the judicial attitude toward infractions of the rule, see People v. Clayton, 89 Cal. App. 405, 413, 264 P. 1105; People v. Alpine, 81 Cal. App. 456, 467, 254 P. 281; People v. Adams, 92 Cal. App. 6, 10, 267 P. 906, and cases there cited.

Although great allowance should be and universally is made by the courts for the zeal of the district attorney, especially as may be displayed by him in the heat of argument, and although, as is stated in the case of People v. Branch, 77 Cal. App. 384, 246 P. 811, 814, the remarks ordinarily made by a district attorney may be considered by the jury as "argumentative rather than evidentiary in their nature," nevertheless such an assumption regarding the effect of any and every remark made by a district attorney in his argument to the jury, wherein, either directly or by insinuation, he personally testifies to some vital fact in the case, should neither escape deserved adverse criticism from the bench as well as from the bar, nor be universally cured either by regarding it as "argumentative, rather than evidentiary," or by a general and all-inclusive instruction to the jury to disregard it.

Appellant specifies several other alleged acts of misconduct by the district attorney, or by his chief deputy, but as in principle they are more or less covered by what heretofore has been stated herein, it becomes unnecessary to devote the attention to them which otherwise they might well deserve.

[9-11] Prejudicial error is urged by appellant in that the trial court refused to permit defendant to cross-examine a witness produced by the prosecution relative to the motives or "state of mind" of such witness. It appears that the testimony given by such witness was of extreme importance to the prosecution, in that to a great extent it was corroboratory of the testimony given by the prosecutrix. In connection with the question thus presented, the record discloses that, as was indicated by admissions or statements of counsel representing defendant, and which were developed in argument had in the absence of the jury, defendant proposed to inquire of the witness whether he knew, or had information to the effect, or suspected that he had been indicted in the state of Texas on ten separate criminal charges, or on any such charge or charges; and assuming the existence of such fact or facts, what arrangements, or promises, if any, had been either expressly or impliedly made or held out to him, especially by the district attorney of the county of Los Angeles, or by any of his deputies, or by any member of the police department of the city of Los Angeles, or by the sheriff of the county of Los Angeles, or by any of his deputies, by or through which he was either told directly, or was given to understand, that by testifying in any respect favorable to the prosecution in the instant case he might expect some leniency, or at least more favorable action from the district attorney with reference to the possible extradition of the witness on the Texas indictments against him, than though his testimony were not so favorable to the prosecution. Furthermore, that in and by such proposed cross-examination, even in the total absence of any substantial foundation for the existence of any such anticipated action by the district attorney, defendant claimed the right to ascertain whether the witness had then, or ever had, a belief, or hope, or "state of mind," that by reason of his giving testimony favorable to the prosecution in the instant action he would secure, or might be likely to obtain, any favor or advantage whatsoever at the hands of the district attorney.

It should require neither argument nor authority as the basis for an assertion that if it be established as a fact that by the use of direct or even by veiled threats, or through insinuations, or innuendo, or intimidation, or menace of any sort, or by means of promises of assistance, or of influence to be exerted in his behalf, expressly made, or but ambiguously suggested by or through any one either actually or assumedly in authority in the premises, or even by an utter stranger or interloper in the proceedings, or by any way, method, or manner whatsoever, a witness be thereby induced either to give false testimony, or to color the truth of his sworn statements, the jury should be placed not merely in possession of the affirmative ultimate fact of the bias of the witness, or his denial thereof, but, if necessary, should hear the basic facts, if any, upon which such conclusion be founded. In connection with the question of law presented for consideration by this court, it appears that the only material questions which defendant was permitted to ask of and to have answered by the witness were as to whether, on the day on which the offense of which defendant was charged was committed, the witness knew that ten felony charges were pending against the witness in the state of Texas; also as to whether, prior to such date, he was aware of that fact. Each of such questions was answered by the witness in the negative. All other questions proposed to be asked of the witness by counsel representing defendant, which had any direct bearing on the motive, or "state of mind" of the witness, at the time he was giving his testimony, were excluded by the trial court. Illustrative of the questions propounded to the witness, and to which objections thereto presented by the prosecution were sustained by the trial court, is the following:

"Did you discuss with any member of the district attorney's staff, or of the police department who were connected with this case, the question as to whether or not there were ten felony charges pending against you in Texas?"

In claiming the right to cross-examine the witness concerning the alleged indictments which were then or had been pending against him in the state of Texas, defendant relied, not upon the provisions of section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which relate particularly to the impeachment of a witness, but rather upon that portion of section 1847 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which, in effect, provides that, notwithstanding the rule of law that a witness is presumed to speak the truth, such presumption may be repelled by evidence affecting "his motives" in giving his testimony.

As relates to the impeachment of a witness in such manner as is provided by section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure, authorities emanating from various jurisdictions throughout the United States are not in harmony, one with the other; but as concerns the situation hereinbefore outlined, where the motive or "state of mind" of the witness is the objective of the cross-examination, the several authorities in this state are unanimous in the declaration that questions which would have a tendency to show bias of a witness are not only competent, but that great latitude in cross-examination should be allowed in developing its existence. A situation analogous to, if not identical with, that which is presented by the record herein has heretofore received consideration in each of several cases decided by the appellate courts of this state.

In perhaps what may be termed the leading case of People v. Dillwood, 4 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 973, 39 P. 438, 439, it appears that a witness for the prosecution "admitted that he had "pleaded guilty to stealing the Johnson cow," and had been sent to the Whittier Reform School." Thereupon he was asked if felony charges were not then pending against him and were not pending against him before he was sentenced to the reform school. In passing upon the admissibility of the questioned evidence, the Supreme Court said:

"* * * Before the enactment of section 2051, Code Civ. Proc., the conviction of a felony could only be proved by the production of the record, if objections were made. That it may now be shown by the admission of the witness upon the stand is an exception to the general rule that the record, being the best evidence, must be produced. It is competent to show the fact that other criminal charges are pending in the same court against the witness at the time he testifies, not, however, as evidence of particular wrongful acts, for as to these he is presumed to be innocent, but as a circumstance tending to show that his testimony is or may be influenced by a desire to seek the favor or leniency of the court and prosecuting officers by aiding in the conviction of the defendant. These charges should, however, be proved by the record if objection is made to oral evidence of them."

In the case of People v. Bennett, 79 Cal. App. 76, 94, 249 P. 20, 27, the defendant was charged with the crime of murder. Touching the question of the admissibility of evidence regarding the pendency of criminal charges against a witness testifying in the case on trial, the following appears in the opinion of the court:

"The next assignment under this head arose as follows: Against the prosecution's witness Penning, there had previously been filed and were pending in the superior court of Butte county, at the time the instant case was called for trial, two criminal charges based, respectively, upon the sale and upon the possession of intoxicating liquor. Counsel for the defendant sought to bring out by the cross-examination of said witness that such charges were pending against him, and that one had been set for trial for a date some 2 weeks prior to the date fixed for the trial of the present case, but was postponed, on motion of the district attorney, to a date 2 weeks subsequent to the date fixed for the trial of the instant case. An objection by the district attorney to this proposed cross-examination was sustained by the court. The cross-examination, as the attorney explained, was designed to disclose a circumstance tending to show that the testimony of Penning for the people was or might be influenced by a hope on his part that he would or might be leniently treated by the prosecuting officers in the criminal case or cases pending against him by giving testimony which would contribute to the conviction of the defendant. We think the proposed inquiry involved a proper subject of cross-examination for the reasons stated by the Supreme Court as follows, in People v. Dillwood, 4 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 974, 39 P. 438, and that the defendant would be entitled to prove the fact by the record if the witness denied it. 'It is competent to show the fact that other criminal charges are pending in the same court against the witness at the time he testifies, not, however, as evidence of particular wrongful acts, for as to these he is presumed to be innocent, but as a circumstance tending to show that his testimony is or may be influenced by a desire to seek the favor or leniency of the court and prosecuting officers by aiding in the conviction of the defendant.' [Citing cases.] Such testimony goes to the question of the credibility of the witness. * * *

A similar situation was involved in the case of People v. Blackwell, 81 Cal. App. 418, 253 P. 964, 965. There the court said: " * * * The fact that a criminal charge against the witness was then pending in the same court was competent evidence, not of the truth thereof, but as tending to show that the testimony of the witness was influenced by a desire to gain the favor of the district attorney by aiding in the conviction of the defendant and thereby escaping prosecution in her own case." (Citing cases.)

The principle is also recognized in the case of People v. Hoffman, 195 Cal. 295, 303, 232 P. 974. However, it was there held not error to refuse to admit evidence to the effect that a felony charge was pending against the witness in a county in the same state other than that in which he was giving testimony; the reason assigned therefor being that the fact that he gave "testimony for the prosecution" in one county could not have led him to expect favor or leniency from any official in the county in which the charge was pending against him. It is manifest that with reference to any possible "leniency" to the witness, such a situation as was presented in the Hoffman Case does not obtain in the instant case. On the trial of the action herein, in the course of the argument among respective counsel with reference to the admissibility of the questioned evidence, it was admitted by the prosecution in the absence of the jury that, although some time preceding the date of the trial of the instant action the witness had been placed under arrest by the Los Angeles police on suspicion of the commission by the witness of the crime of robbery, and although it was known to such police officers that several indictments were then pending against the witness in the state of Texas, regarding which some telegraphic correspondence had passed between the Texas officials and the police department of the city of Los Angeles shortly following the date of his arrest, the witness was released from custody and no "fugitive" or other complaint was ever filed against him, as might have been done in accordance with the provisions of law thereunto applicable. It is clear that if extradition of the accused witness had been sought or obtained by the Texas officials, many opportunities to extend "favor or leniency" to the accused would have been possible at the hands of the district attorney of this county.

But aside from what for convenience may be termed the assumed fact that, in exchange for favorable testimony by the witness, some one in actual or presumed authority in the premises had either directly promised some sort of advantage to the witness, or had led or permitted him to expect or hope that he would be the recipient of unidentified or unspecified favors, or material advantages, from the district attorney, authorities are not lacking in the view that however ungrounded in fact, or even if the "state of mind" of a witness be based upon pure delusion, nevertheless if such "state of mind" amount to an expectation, or even a lingering or forlorn hope, that in the event that his testimony, far from being distinctly favorable to the prosecution, be evasive, or never so slightly strained or colored in favor of the prosecution, he will or may receive some favorable consideration from the district attorney, such fact may and should be disclosed to the jury through either the channel of cross-examination, or by means of the introduction of other evidence. Indicative of such assertion of the law is the following excerpt taken from the case of People v. Thomson, 92 Cal. 506, 509, 28 P. 589:

"It is elementary law, supported by all authority, that the state of mind of a witness as to his bias or prejudice, his interests involved, his hostility or friendship towards the parties, are always proper matters for investigation, in order that truth may prevail and falsehood find its proper level. If the inner workings of a witness' mind are actuating his testimony, and the workings of that mind are brought forth to the light and held up in full view before the jury, results will be obtained much more in accord with truth and justice than though the witness' testimony is weighed and measured by his words alone. * * *

And in Farkas v. United States (C. C. A.) 2 F.(2d) 644, 647, it is said:

"The prosecuting witnesses, before the time of the trial, had pleaded guilty to an indictment in the federal court; the verdict of guilt or innocence in the instant case depended primarily upon their credibility as against that of defendant who testified in denial of the demands and threats. As bearing upon their credibility, motive for false accusations, as well as bias, was vitally relevant, and testimony tending to show such motive was entirely competent. Concededly promises of immunity are admissible; they are, however, rarely made. Inasmuch as the question involved is the motive for testifying falsely and therefore the state of mind of the prosecuting witnesses, the relevant evidence is not alone the acts or attitude of the district attorney but anything else that would throw light upon the prosecuting witnesses' state of mind. It is therefore entirely proper, either by cross-examination of the witness himself, or otherwise, to show a belief or even only a hope on his part that he will secure immunity or a lighter sentence, or any other favorable treatment, in return for his testimony, and that, too, even if it be fully conceded that he had not the slightest basis from any act or word of the district attorney for such a belief or hope. The fact that despite a plea of guilty long since entered, the witness had not yet been sentenced, is proper evidence tending to show the existence of such hope or belief."

It may also be noted that in volume 23 of American Digest (2d Dec. Ed.), and in volume 28, Third Decennial Digest, under key numbers 363, 372, and 374 of the title of "Witnesses," may be found references to many authorities which sustain the conclusion reached as to the question here under consideration.

[12-14] Further complaint is made by appellant in that the trial court refused to permit the introduction of evidence offered by defendant for the purpose of tending to show that on the date of the alleged attack herein the prosecutrix was not a virgin.

It is the contention of appellant that because the effect of all the evidence introduced by the prosecution, and especially the testimony given by the prosecutrix, was that the offense was committed, not by consent of the victim of the alleged outrage, but by force and violence used and exerted upon her person, and because the prosecutrix personally testified in great detail concerning the circumstances which, according to her testimony, surrounded the commission of the crime, and which testimony, among other things, included the statement that the last thing she remembered was the "pain" and that she "fainted," in the face of such circumstances, defendant was entitled to introduce evidence which would tend to establish the fact that on the date of the commission of the alleged offense the prosecutrix was not a virgin; from which facts appellant further contends that the jury would have the right to infer that the prosecutrix neither "fainted" nor suffered "pain" in the course of the claimed assault upon her; but, to the contrary, that her entire story of the alleged occurrence was false, and consequently that no crime was committed by defendant; or, failing in that conclusion, that if a so-called "statutory" rape of the person of the prosecutrix was committed by defendant on the date charged in the information, the act of defendant was had by consent of the prosecutrix; and which latter fact (in case the jury so found) became of great importance to defendant for the reason that by the provisions of section 264 of the Penal Code, in the event of a verdict of guilt of the defendant, the jury is charged with the duty of "recommending" to the trial court the place wherein the defendant shall be imprisoned.

Included within the corroboratory evidence which related to the commission of the offense of which defendant was accused was the testimony given by a policewoman who made statements concerning the physical appearance of the prosecutrix at a time supposedly within approximately one and one-half hours after the alleged crime had been committed. Among other things, she testified that on undressing the girl at that time, she noticed that there were spots on her dress and that as to "the appearance of her private parts, * * * the skin showed red through the hair; the hair was moist and sticky." A chemist testified that on four of the spots on the dress worn by the prosecutrix at the time when the alleged attack was made, he found "male sperm, known as spermatozoon."

Although the trial court admitted the testimony of one physician produced by defendant to the effect that a physical examination of the prosecutrix made by him within seventeen hours after the alleged attack had occurred disclosed the fact that the hymen of the prosecutrix was ruptured; that he found no "abrasions or irritations of the vagina—irritable spots"; that he saw no "signs of her (the prosecutrix) having had sexual intercourse during the preceding twenty-four hours"; that he found no "recent tear of the hymen"; nor any "tear of the perineum"—the trial court refused to permit that physician to answer either or any of the following questions which were propounded to him by counsel representing defendant, to wit: "Q. Was that a recent rupture or an old rupture? Q. Did you see any signs of any recent rupture? Q. Just describe the nature of the rupture you saw. Q. On the vagina, did you examine the vagina either before, in front of or anterior to the hymen or behind the hymen to discover whether or not there was any abrasions of any character? Q. Was there anything in your examination to indicate to you as a physician and surgeon whether or not that girl had had sexual intercourse with anybody 17 hours before or approximately 17 hours before you made your examination? Q. Are you able to tell whether a young girl of 17 years of age has been deflowered within 24 hours of a vaginal examination? Q. Describe this hymen that you discovered in this girl on the 10th day of August."

A second physician, who also had made a physical examination of prosecutrix, testified that in so doing he had used both a speculum and "two fingers." Thereupon he was asked by counsel for defendant each of the following questions, none of which, by order of the trial court, was he permitted to answer, to wit: "Q. Was there any pain or discomfort (referring to the digital examination and instrumental examination)? Q. How large size a speculum did you use, medium or small? Q. Did you find any new or any old ruptures of any kind? Q. Did you find any old ruptures of any kind?"

Similarly, by order of the trial court, a third physician, who likewise had made a physical examination of the prosecutrix, was not permitted to answer either of the following questions which were propounded to him by counsel for defendant: "Q. Did you discover any conditions, scars or broken hymen or anything that had been broken in your opinion within the last week preceding the examination? Q. Did you find any evidence that she had had intercourse within a month before? Q. Did you find any evidence that she had had intercourse before? Q. Did you find any old scars on the hymen? Q. Did you find any recent scars on the hymen? Q. What was the condition of the vagina?"

The authorities in this state appear to fairly establish the rule that on a charge of rape of a female person under the age of eighteen years, where the act is alleged to have been accomplished with the consent of the victim of the assault, evidence of previous acts of unchastity is inadmissible for the sole purpose of attacking her character. People v. Wilmot, 139 Cal. 103, 72 P. 838; People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 289, 39 P. 622. But equally well established is the principle that where the defendant is charged with the crime of rape alleged to have been committed on the person of a woman over the age of eighteen years, accomplished by means of force or violence, it is error to exclude evidence which tends to show prior unchaste acts of the prosecutrix either with the defendant or with other men. People v. Shea, 125 Cal. 151, 57 P. 885; People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 221, 65 Am. Dec. 506; People v. Degnen, 70 Cal. App. 567, 590, 234 P. 129; People v. Biescar, 97 Cal. App. 205, 275 P. 851. See, also, Lusty v. State, 97 Tex. Cr. R. 167, 261 S. W. 775; Weaver v. United States, 55 App. D. C. 26, 299 F. 893; Fields v. State, 47 Ala. 603, 11 Am. Rep. 771. The distinguishing principle between the two lines of authorities is that, as to a minor female child under the age of eighteen years, she is legally incapable of giving her consent to the act; while as to a woman over the age of eighteen years no such legal restriction obtains; and as to the latter, the evidence is admissible, not for the direct purpose of impeaching her character, but for the purpose of discrediting her testimony relating to the use of force or violence by the defendant in accomplishing his purpose. As is said in People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 289, 293, 39 P. 622, 623, and repeated in People v. Shea, 125 Cal. 151, 152, 57 P. 885; "This class of evidence is admissible for the purpose of tending to show the nonprobability of resistance upon the part of the prosecutrix; for it is certainly more probable that a woman who has done these things voluntarily in the past would be much more likely to consent than one whose past reputation was without blemish, and whose personal conduct could not truthfully be assailed. * * *

It is easily perceivable that if previous acts of unchastity on the part of a woman over the age of eighteen years tend to discredit her testimony to the effect that force was used by the defendant in the commission of the act, likewise would evidence of previous acts of unchastity by a girl under the age of eighteen years tend to discredit her testimony that in accomplishing his purpose the defendant exerted force and violence.

But, as is indicated in the opinion rendered by the Supreme Court of this state in denying a petition for hearing in that court after judgment rendered by the District Court of Appeal in the case of People v. Jones, 76 Cal. App. 144, 157, 244 P. 101, 106, evidence of consent on the part of the victim of the assault, even though she be under the age of eighteen years, if she claim that the act was committed by force and violence, is admissible not only for the purpose of "impeachment as to the manner in which the act was accomplished," but as well for the purpose of laying a foundation "for impeachment as to whether the crime was committed at all." In that case, the defendant was convicted of the crime of rape of the person of his stepdaughter, of the age of fifteen years. On the trial of the action, by order of the trial court, the defendant was precluded from ascertaining by cross-examination of the prosecutrix whether the act of which complaint was made was accomplished with her consent. On appeal, the District Court of Appeal upheld the ruling thereon made by the trial court. Thereafter, in ruling on a petition for hearing of the appeal by the Supreme Court, in part the latter court used the following language:

"As a matter of law, however, we would be constrained to hold as error the ruling of the trial court sustaining objections to the cross-examination of the prosecutrix as to whether she consented to the act of sexual intercourse or whether it was committed by fear or force and against her will. We can well understand that, if she had claimed the act was committed by force, how her claim might have laid the foundation, not only for impeachment as to the manner in which the act was accomplished, but also under certain circumstances it might have laid the foundation for impeachment as to whether the crime was committed at all. * * * As an abstract question of law, however, we cannot approve of the court's ruling in sustaining the objections to the questions asked as to whether she resisted the defendant's acts, for the reason that the evidence sought to be elicited tended to disclose the circumstances of the crime, and it could not properly be excluded on the theory that the prosecutrix, being under the statutory age, all inquiry as to the circumstances of the crime was therefore cut off. This evidence was not offered as a justification or excuse for the commission of the offense, but was offered as constituting a part of the crime charged. * * * See, also, People v. Fultz, 109 Cal. 258, 41 P. 1040.

In the instant case, the prosecutrix having testified to the effect that the alleged crime was accomplished by defendant by means of force and violence, this court is constrained to follow the suggestion made by the Supreme Court in the case last cited, in substance that evidence of consent on the part of the prosecutrix was admissible "not only for impeachment as to the manner in which the act was accomplished, but also * * * for impeachment as to whether the crime was committed at all." Although not conclusive evidence of unchastity, it is manifest that one of the items of evidence which would tend toward a conclusion that, prior to the date on which it was charged that defendant had committed the crime, the prosecutrix had been guilty of unchaste acts, would be that her hymen was ruptured, and that the scars, if any, were not of recent origin. But if with such and other evidence, which might possibly be introduced on the trial of the action, the jury should believe that preceding the alleged attack the prosecutrix was lacking in virtue, a conclusion that the testimony of the prosecutrix relating to the force and violence exerted by defendant was not to be believed, and consequently either that no crime was committed by defendant, or that, if committed, the prosecutrix consented thereto, might readily result. * * * For it is certainly more probable that a woman who has done these things voluntarily in the past would be much more likely to consent than one whose past reputation was without blemish, and whose personal conduct could not truthfully be assailed." People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 289, 293, 39 P. 622, 623; People v. Shea, 125 Cal. 151, 152, 57 P. 885.

[15] Assuming that the jury should so far discredit the story of the alleged attack as narrated by the prosecutrix as to produce the conviction in the "mind" of the jury that such testimony was wholly unworthy of belief, the acquittal of the defendant would naturally follow. On the other hand, if from the evidence in the case the jury should believe that under the provisions of the statute the person of the prosecutrix had been raped by defendant, but that the act was committed with the consent (in fact, if not in law) of the prosecutrix, in view of the provision of section 264 of the Penal Code that the crime of rape of the character of that here under consideration is punishable "either by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year or in the state prison for not more than fifty years," and that "the jury shall recommend by their verdict whether the punishment shall be by imprisonment in the county jail or in the state prison," evidence of the former unchastity of the prosecutrix became and was of vital importance to the defendant for the purpose, if possible, of ameliorating the punishment which the jury might recommend that defendant be obliged to suffer, that is, primarily, whether in the state prison or in the county jail. Furthermore, it will be remembered that the prosecutrix testified that when the act was being committed by defendant the last thing she remembered was the "pain" and that she "fainted." It is manifest that if evidence had been admitted which would have had a tendency to establish the fact not only that prior to the date of her alleged rape by defendant her hymen had been ruptured, but that therefore she had been guilty of acts of unchastity, the question of whether on the occasion here under discussion she suffered any considerable pain, or that she fainted, would have demanded the careful consideration of the jury; and if the jury had disbelieved her statement as to the pain which she said she suffered, or that she fainted, under the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure that "a witness false in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others," the jury might have cast aside her entire story, or adopted that part of it, if any, which from other evidence in the case it believed to be true, with a result or results similar to that hereinbefore indicated.

Adverting to the combined testimony given by the policewoman and the chemist, who were introduced by the prosecution, to the effect that four certain spots found on the dress of the prosecutrix contained "male sperm, known as spermatozoon," together with the further assumed fact, as later appears from the testimony of the same chemist, that such sperm came from the person of one about the age of defendant, it becomes plain that a third reason exists for the legal admission of the evidence proposed to be elicited by defendant with reference to the virginity of the prosecutrix. It should be apparent that defendant was not bound or concluded by the whole or any part of such testimony. Nor should his negations or disavowals, if any, necessarily be limited to a personal general denial on his part either of the commission by him of the offense of which he was accused, or to a specific denial that the "male sperm, known as spermatozoon," which assumedly were found on the dress of the prosecutrix came from the defendant. In other words, defendant was entitled to combat and refute the effect of the evidence against him in any legitimate manner—either by direct or by circumstantial evidence—which, in its logical conclusion, either might or would imply either a direct contradiction of the damaging evidence, or amount to a denial thereof by way of inference. And so, if by establishing, if he could, that the ruptured hymen of the prosecutrix was not of recent origin; that the prosecutrix was not a virgin; and that circumstances existed in the comparatively recent life of the prosecutrix from which it legally might have been inferred that she had indulged in acts of unchastity with some person other than defendant—possibly the jury might have doubted that the questioned spots on the dress of the prosecutrix resulted from the alleged rape of the prosecutrix by defendant—which conclusion necessarily would have resulted in the destruction of an important link in the chain of circumstances tending to prove the guilt of defendant.

[16] It is also apparent that several of the questions to which reference hereinbefore has been had, which were asked of the physicians who were called as witnesses by defendant, and which questions, by order of the trial court, were not permitted to be answered, were proper for the reason that on the answers thereto might have depended a conclusion by the jury as to whether any penetration in fact had resulted from the alleged attack by defendant on the prosecutrix. If, from the evidence, the jury had believed that no penetration took place, at most, defendant could have been convicted of no greater offense than attempt to commit rape.

Several different specifications of error presented by appellant which are closely related to the question last hereinbefore given consideration by this court may be grouped together. They concern, first, the giving of several instructions which are to the effect that in trying issues of fact in the case, the jury should not be influenced by sympathy or pity for defendant; and that whether the victim of the alleged assault consent to the act, or resist the attack made upon her, is wholly immaterial; secondly, the question is presented whether, in the event of a verdict of guilty, for the purpose of enabling the jury to determine either the place where the defendant should be imprisoned, or, in effect, the extent of the punishment which he should suffer, the court erred in excluding evidence from which the jury would have had the right to infer that the act was not committed by or through the use of force and violence, but, to the contrary, was accomplished by and with the consent of the prosecutrix.

[17, 18] In considering whether sympathy or pity of the jurors for defendant should be legally declared to have no part in a determination of the "issues of fact," in order that a better understanding of the situation may be had, it becomes advisable to more clearly define what is meant by the expression "issues of fact." Having reference to legal practice, an issue of fact arises from an allegation of an ultimate fact made by one of the parties to the controversy which is denied by the other. Ordinarily, the only manner recognizable in a court of law for the determination of an issue of fact is by the introduction of evidence made acceptable by the statutes or by established legal practice. Nowhere, at least in civilized countries, is a solution of the ultimate facts or the "issues of fact" upon which a judgment may rest made dependable upon human emotions, or particularly upon the sympathy or the pity for either of the litigants by any person who may be called upon to judicially decide the controversy. If such were the case, no necessity would exist for, nor convenience or social protection require, laws, rules, or regulations of any sort. The more needy or distressed the litigant, the more certain would be the assurance of a judgment in his favor; and the more affluent or powerful suitor would be an easy financial prey to his impecunious or afflicted legal antagonist. From a legal standpoint, it would appear plain that in performing the duty of determining the ultimate fact of either the guilt or the innocence of a defendant, the jury should be uninfluenced by, and unmindful of, either pity or sympathy.

[19, 20] The relevancy of whether in the instant case the prosecutrix consented to the accomplishment of the act for which defendant herein went to trial in the lower court has hereinbefore received some attention. It is well settled that on the trial of a so-called "statutory" rape case, ordinarily the consent of the prosecutrix is not an issue; but, as was decided by the Supreme Court in its order denying a hearing therein in the case of People v. Jones, 76 Cal. App. 144, 157, 244 P. 101, 106, where the prosecutrix, although under the age of eighteen years, testifies that the rape of her person was accomplished by force or violence exerted upon her by the defendant, evidence of consent becomes admissible not only for the purpose of "impeachment as to the manner in which the act was accomplished," but also for the purpose of laying a foundation "for impeachment as to whether the crime was committed at all." It would follow that, at least as far as concerns "impeachment" in those respects to which attention has been particularly directed, it is not true, as stated in the instruction, that whether the prosecutrix "consented" to the accomplishment of the alleged act of which defendant was accused was "wholly immaterial"; and at least to that extent, the instruction in question was erroneous and prejudicial.

With reference to the point that, assuming a situation where, under the evidence relating strictly to whether the offense was committed by the defendant, the jury has unanimously agreed upon a verdict of "guilty," the question of whether thereafter, for the purpose of reaching a conclusion as to the place where the defendant shall be imprisoned, or, in effect, the extent of the punishment which shall be imposed upon him, the jury has the right to consider the circumstances which surrounded the commission of the act, remains for consideration.

[21, 22] On examination of the language of section 264 of the Penal Code, it will appear that a defendant who is convicted of the crime of rape is punishable either by imprisonment in the county jail or by imprisonment in the state prison; that the term of imprisonment in each place is indeterminate, in that if it be in the county jail, it may be for any length of time not more than one year; and if in the state prison, it may be for any period of time not exceeding fifty years. Furthermore, that it becomes the duty of the jury to "recommend" by its verdict whether the imprisonment shall be in the county jail or in the state prison.

In considering the provisions of the statute, perhaps the first question which suggests itself is whether the "recommendation" is in fact a part of the verdict of the jury and as such is binding on the trial court. In a rape case, as far as concerns the exercise of discretion by the jury in its determination as to the place of punishment of the defendant, it is not unlike the "discretion" which is likewise conferred upon the jury where a verdict of "guilty in the first degree" has been reached in a murder case. Among other things, section 190 of the Penal Code provides that "every person guilty of murder in the first degree shall suffer death, or confinement in the state prison for life, at the discretion of jury trying the same. * * *

On the trial of the action in the case of People v. Hall, 199 Cal. 451, 249 P. 859, the jury returned a verdict by which it found the defendant guilty of the crime of murder, but that it could not "come to an unanimous agreement as to degree of punishment." On appeal, it was held by the Supreme Court that, as returned, the verdict was incomplete; that necessarily a proper verdict in the premises should embrace two constituent elements, "first, a finding that the accused is guilty of murder in the first degree; and, secondly, legal evidence that the jury has fixed the penalty in the exercise of its discretion."

In the case of People v. Sachau, 78 Cal. App. 702, 248 P. 960, in returning a verdict of "guilty" against a defendant who was charged with the crime of rape, the jury failed to make any "recommendation" as to the place where the defendant was to be imprisoned. Held, that the verdict was so defective as to constitute it a nullity and that a new trial should be granted. To the same effect, see Weatherford v. State, 43 Ala. 320.

And in People v. Pratt, 67 Cal. App. 606, 228 P. 47, 48, in which it appeared that the appeal was taken from a judgment which followed a conviction of the crime of rape, in commenting on the language employed in section 264 of the Penal Code, it was remarked that "it will be observed that under this section a minimum sentence may be imposed by the jury"; also, that the last amendment by the Legislature of the statute "emasculated" from the former statute "the age of the female, leaving it discretionary with the jury to determine by their verdict whether in any case * * * an offense charged under subdivision 1 of section 261 was a misdemeanor or a felony."

That in a prosecution of a defendant for the commission by him of the crime of rape, the jury has power to "recommend" the punishment which shall be inflicted, and that such "recommendation" must be carried into execution, is decided in the case of People v. Rambaud, 78 Cal. App. 685, 248 P. 954.

From the foregoing authorities it may safely be deduced that in a prosecution of a defendant on the charge of rape, in the event of a verdict of guilty, the "recommendation" by the jury as to the place where defendant shall be imprisoned is an essential, inseparable part of the verdict and as such is conclusive and binding upon the trial court as far as the pronouncement by it of the ensuing judgment is concerned.

As hereinbefore indicated, the provisions of section 190 of the Penal Code which deal particularly with the discretion of the jury in determining the penalty which shall be inflicted upon a person found guilty of murder in the first degree, are not unlike those terms of the statute here under consideration which provide that "by their verdict" the jury shall recommend whether the punishment of a guilty defendant shall be by imprisonment in the county jail or in the state prison. In that connection it becomes relevant to consider the view taken by the courts of appeal of this state where the question submitted has had to do with murder cases.

In People v. Atherton, 51 Cal. 495, following a statement in substance that it is the duty of the jury to determine whether the defendant shall suffer the extreme penalty of the law, or imprisonment in the penitentiary, it is asserted in the opinion that in reaching a conclusion as to what penalty shall be inflicted the jury should be influenced by "a consideration of the degree of atrocity with which the particular murder has been attended."

The case of People v. Hong Ah Duck, 61 Cal. 387, among other questions, involved that of the admissibility of evidence of the fact that at the time the murder was committed the defendant was an inmate of the state prison where he was already serving a "life sentence." It was ruled that, in order that the jury might exercise the discretion vested in it by the statute "in a wise and intelligent manner, the jury should be put in possession of all the facts of the case," which included the particular evidence in question.

In the murder case of People v. Perry, 195 Cal. 623, 639, 234 P. 890, 897, in which was involved the question of the materiality of the assumed mental deficiency of a defendant on the punishment which, under the provisions of section 190 of the Penal Code, the jury was authorized to prescribe, among other things, the court said: "* * * It is the jury's right and duty to consider and weigh all the facts and circumstances attending the commission of the offense, and from these and such reasons as may appear to it upon a consideration of the whole situation, determine whether or not, in the exercise of its discretion, life imprisonment should be imposed rather than the infliction of the death penalty. * * *"

However, in People v. Troche, 206 Cal. 35, 47, 273 P. 767, 772, the rule is declared to be that the insanity of a defendant cannot be used for the purpose of reducing his crime from murder in the first degree to murder in the second degree; and in People v. Golsh, 63 Cal. App. 609, 219 P. 456, evidence of sunstroke of the defendant, which rendered him subject to "blinding fits of passion," was held inadmissible for the purpose of enabling the jury to determine what punishment the defendant should be compelled to suffer for the commission by him of the crime of murder; it being substantially declared in each case that if the defendant was mentally responsible, he should suffer the same penalty which any sane person would be obliged to suffer, and, if mentally irresponsible, he should be acquitted. But in the Troche Case the court repeated and affirmed the general rule that "the only evidence admissible for the purpose of enabling the jury to determine whether the death penalty or life imprisonment should be imposed in the event the defendant should be found guilty of murder in the first degree was the evidence which the court did admit, and which concerned 'the circumstances connected with the offense.' * * *"

In the case of People v. Dice, 120 Cal. 189, 202, 52 P. 477, 483, it appeared that in instructing the jury upon the two several degrees of murder, as well as upon the crime of manslaughter, the trial court stated to the jury the punishment which, upon a verdict of guilty as to either of such offenses, it would be the duty of the court to impose in pronouncing judgment. In commenting upon such practice, the Supreme Court said in part that "to do so is, of course, necessary in instructing the jury upon their power and duty in the event that they should render a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree. * * *"

The only cases to which the attention of this court has been directed which in any manner militate against the rule that for the purpose of determining the extent of punishment which should be prescribed for a guilty defendant the jury should "be put in possession of all the facts in the case" are those of People v. Witt, 170 Cal. 104, 148 P. 928, 930, and People v. Clayberg, 26 Cal. App. 614, 147 P. 994. On examination of each of such cases it will be disclosed that the situation therein differs somewhat from that in the instant case, and that the principle of law therein announced may be distinguished from that announced in the authorities hereinbefore cited. On the trial of the action in the former case, in mitigation of any possible punishment for the commission of the offense, the defendant claimed the right to introduce evidence relative to his character and habits. It was not contended by the defendant that the offered evidence was relevant or material on an issue of either the guilt of the defendant, or the degree of the crime, but that it was offered on the theory that it was competent because the jury had the right "to assess the punishment." The ruling was that: "* * * We are of the opinion that our law does not contemplate any such independent inquiry on a trial for murder, and that the determination of the jury, under the provisions of section 190, Penal Code, as to death or life imprisonment, is necessarily to be based solely on such evidence as is admissible on the issues made by the indictment or information and the plea of the defendant. * * *"

In the instant case, the issues of the virginity of the prosecutrix, as well as of her consent to the act of which she complained, as hereinbefore has been declared, were particularly before the court by reason of the fact that the prosecutrix testified that the offense was committed by defendant by means of force and violence. (People v. Jones, 76 Cal. App. 144, 157, 244 P. 101); from which circumstance it would follow that the case of People v. Witt, 170 Cal. 104, 148 P. 928, far from being an authority against the rule by which the questioned evidence became admissible for the purpose of determining the punishment to be inflicted upon the defendant, is at least a negative statement of affirmance of the rule. In the latter case (People v. Clayberg, 26 Cal. App. 614, 147 P. 994, 997), which was a prosecution for "statutory" rape, the decision related to an instruction requested by the defendant to be given to the jury, but which was refused by the trial court. With reference thereto the following excerpt from the opinion of the appellate court will disclose several objectionable features which appear upon the face of the requested instruction, and which alone should have justified its refusal by the trial court, to wit: " * * * Said instruction related to the power vested in juries by section 264 of the Penal Code (Stats. 1913, p. 212), in cases arising under subdivision 1 of section 261 of said Code, to determine practically the nature and extent of the punishment which may be inflicted. By the terms of the former section, it is incumbent upon the jury, where the prosecution is based upon subdivision 1 of section 261, to determine whether the defendant, if convicted, shall be punished by imprisonment in the county jail or the state prison. The rejected instruction explained the law as it is declared in those sections of the Code, and proceeded to declare that it was the duty of the jury to consider all the circumstances of the present case with a view to a just determination of which mode of punishment authorized by said section 261 'will best conserve the interest of society and the interest of the defendant,' in the event that they found the defendant guilty. The instruction also had something to say about the policy of the law being opposed to the infliction of 'unusual or severe punishment,' etc., which statement could have no just place in the court's charge; it being argumentative in character. The instruction was properly refused. * * *

However, after having decided that the defendant was not entitled to have the instruction, as offered, given to the jury, the appellate court made the following comment:

" * * * The court, in its charge, told the jury of the power and duty resting upon them by virtue of the provisions of section 264 of the Penal Code in the matter of designating the prison in which the defendant should be incarcerated in case of his conviction of the crime charged (the crime charged here being based on subdivision 1 of said section 261), and the jury, heeding that instruction, by their verdict, designated the state prison as the place of punishment. * * *

It will thus be noted that the opinion contains no limitation upon the principle announced in People v. Hong Ah Duck, 61 Cal. 387, to the effect that (syllabus) "in order to exercise the discretion vested in them as to the penalty in a wise and intelligent manner, the jury should be put in possession of all the facts in the case. * * *

Upon further examination of the language of section 264 of the Penal Code, it will appear that it provides that if a defendant should plead guilty to the accusation, the punishment for the commission of the offense "shall be in the discretion of the trial court"; similarly as the punishment therefor is vested in the jury where the defendant has been found guilty after trial by jury. It also may be remembered that under the provisions of section 7 of article 1 of the Constitution, "a trial by jury may be waived in all criminal cases." Assuming that a defendant charged with the crime of "statutory" rape should either plead guilty, or that he should waive a jury, and after trial by the court without a jury, should be found "guilty," it would seem unlikely that it would be seriously contended that for the purpose of determining the place where the defendant should be incarcerated, the trial judge would be powerless to inquire into "the degree of atrocity with which the particular (rape) had been attended" (People v. Atherton, 51 Cal. 495), or that in order to exercise the discretion vested in the trial court "in a wise and intelligent manner, the (trial court) should (not) be put in possession of all the facts of the case" (People v. Hong Ah Duck, 61 Cal. 387). If, in a murder case, in determining the penalty which should be imposed for the commission of the crime "the jury should be influenced by the degree of atrocity with which the particular murder has been attended," it is difficult to understand why in a rape case the same rule should not obtain; that is, why the jury in determining the place or extent of confinement should not be influenced by the degree of brutality, if any, which was exerted by defendant in the commission of the offense; or if there was no brutality, but, to the contrary, the "rape" was accomplished either by the consent of the prosecutrix, or by her solicitation, or by her insistence, or by her procurement in any way, why the jury should not properly be influenced by such a circumstance. It is apparent that in order that the jury may determine the matter "in a wise and intelligent manner," it should "be put in possession of all the facts of the case." People v. Hong Ah Duck, 61 Cal. 387. It is but reasonable that, if in the administration of justice it be desirable or essential that in determining the punishment which a defendant should suffer, the trial court should inquire into all the facts in the case, just so should the jury be likewise enlightened in order that its quasi-judgment be just to the defendant. Neither the judge nor the jury, acting in his or its several judicial capacity, should be either required or expected to act blindly in the premises. No relevant light, however small or apparently insignificant, which might aid the tribunal or the judicial arm of the court in the conscientious discharge of its respective duty should be withheld or denied. To the contrary, everything relevant and material to the inquiry should be placed before the judge or the jury in order that the proper judicial discretion may be wisely, fairly and intelligently exercised. Because no exact words may be found in the particular statute by which such a power is conferred on the judge or the jury, does not constitute a barrier or a sufficient reason why a reasonable and humane view should not be taken of the intent of the Legislature in enacting the statute. To say that with no knowledge of attendant circumstances the jury should be called upon to nominate the place, only, where the defendant should expiate his crime, would be not only unjust to the defendant, but would amount to the recognition of a principle in the administration of justice that would be founded upon pure conjecture.

Even though in length of time a county jail sentence, following a conviction for the commission of a given crime, might be equal to or even exceed a sentence in the state prison rendered in pursuance of conviction of a like offense, as a matter of statutory provision the one would amount to a misdemeanor only, while the other would be a felony. Section 17, Pen. Code. Nor aside from its lack of knowledge of the duration of the sentence which must follow its "recommendation" as to the place of imprisonment, and the consequent statutory effect thereof on the social standing of the defendant, is the jury presumed to be cognizant of the condition, treatment, or hardships to which such convicted person may be subjected in either place of confinement. Although as to possible length of service, by the terms of the statute the county jail sentence is much less severe than is the state prison sentence, it is manifest that, in the wisdom of the Legislature, the term in the respective places of confinement of a defendant might have been made just the reverse of what the statute now provides in that regard. It is inconceivable that as far as concerns the consequence or the effect of the "recommendation" by the jury, the intention of the Legislature was to keep the jury in ignorance and thus compel it to act blindly, unjustly, and unreasonably. The record in the instant case discloses the fact that the evidence introduced by the prosecution tended to prove that the act of which defendant was accused was accomplished by means of force and violence. In the "statutory" rape case of Lusty v. State, 97 Tex. Cr. R. 167, 261 S.W. 775, 776, in the course of the opinion it is remarked that "the proof of force tends to cause the jury to assess a high penalty, and when it is relied on by the state the accused should be permitted to combat by the evidence usual in force cases." In the murder case of Fields v. State, 47 Ala. 603, 11 Am.Rep. 771, the question of the admissibility of evidence for the purpose of enabling the jury to properly determine what punishment the defendant should be required to suffer received careful consideration by the Supreme Court. Among other things, it was there said: "* * * Testimony is as necessary and important, to enable the jury to exercise this discretion prudently and properly, as to enable them to determine the guilt or innocence of the defendant. The jury have two important duties to perform, and both are to be governed and controlled by the evidence, and neither can be wisely or rightly discharged without evidence. As these duties are different, the evidence must necessarily be different. After the guilt of the defendant is settled, the proper evidence, to determine the degree of his crime, and what should be the extent and severity of his punishment, must, in great measure, depend upon a careful examination of the circumstances, not those only immediately attendant on the killing, but those also which may reasonably be supposed to have led to it. * * *

As in effect is announced by the provisions of section 26 of the Penal Code, a boy of fourteen years of age is capable of committing the crime of "statutory rape." An illustration of what might be the result to a defendant were the rule adopted that no evidence is admissible for the purpose of reducing the punishment which under the statute may be inflicted, may be shown by considering the assumed situation of a young woman just under the age of eighteen years, who is a notorious prostitute and who has lured or enticed the boy of fourteen years into an act of sexual intercourse with her. In accordance with the letter of the law, on a trial of the criminal action in which the boy might be prosecuted for the crime of rape, if the fact of the notorious unchastity of the prosecutrix, or all the circumstances connected with the commission of the offense could not be brought to the attention of the jury, it would not be impossible that the "recommendation" of the jury would be that for the commission of the offense the boy should be punished by imprisonment in the state prison, which "recommendation" would carry with it a sentence "for not more than fifty years." Section 264, Pen. Code. Would any sane, fair-minded person contend that such a result was in accord with the true intent and spirit of the law? Would it seem reasonable that the purpose of the law was that all the disgrace, humiliation, and hardships coincident with and necessarily attendant upon the sentence and service of a defendant in the penitentiary "for not more than fifty years" might follow the conviction of the defendant of the crime of "statutory" rape, without reference to the situation of the parties thereto and the circumstances connected with the commission of the offense?

This court is of the opinion that in enacting section 264 of the Penal Code the intent of the Legislature was that after a jury has passed upon the evidence relating to the commission of the offense and has found the defendant "guilty," thereafter for the purpose of determining whether the defendant shall be imprisoned in the county jail or in the state prison the jury shall be entitled "to consider and weigh all the facts and circumstances attending the commission of the offense," together with any other evidence which will throw relevant and material light upon the true situation of the defendant and the prosecutrix at and reasonably preceding the time when the alleged offense was committed.

Because of the errors to which attention hereinbefore has been directed, it becomes unnecessary for this court to give consideration to either of several other specifications of error which it is claimed by appellant was committed in the course of the trial and was prejudicial to his substantial rights in the premises.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial. The appeal from the order denying the motion in arrest of judgment and the appeal from the order denying defendant leave to file an application for probation are and each of them is dismissed.

DANIEL v. SISNERO et al.
Civ. 240.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.
Oct. 7, 1930.

1. Trusts $\S$ 89(1).

Direct testimony of interested parties that no gift or advancement was intended by father to son, though competent, is not conclusive.

2. Trusts $\S$ 86.

There is presumption of law that, where father pays consideration, and title to property is taken in name of son, gift, advancement, or bounty is intended.

3. Trusts $\S$ 86.

Presumption that no gift or advancement was intended by father paying consideration for property purchased by son was sufficient to sustain finding that son was owner thereof.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 1011(1).

Appellate court will not disturb finding based on presumption that no gift or advancement was intended, where opposing evidence merely raises conflict.

5. Fraudulent conveyances $\S$ 299(13).

Evidence sustained finding that son was owner of property on date of conveyance to father without consideration.

6. Fraudulent conveyances $\S$ 298(2).

Evidence sustained finding that conveyance of property by son to father was for purpose of defrauding judgment creditor (Civ. Code, $\S$ 3442).

In addition to facts properly found by court that property belonged to son and not to his father, it was admitted by the son that transfer complained of rendered him insolvent, and he himself testified that he received no consideration for the deed to his father.

7. Trusts $\S$ 373.

Court's finding in double negative, in addition to positive finding, sustained conclusion of law that no resulting trust was created.

The finding in the double negative was: "It is not true that Simon Sisnero did not intend a gift, advancement or bounty in paying said consideration." While the additional finding in the positive was: "And it is true that the defendant Jose Sisnero did not take title to said property as trustee for the defendant Simon Sisnero."

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; James L. Allen, Judge.

Action by Jesus Daniel against Jose Sisnero and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

George R. Nichols, of Riverside, for appellants.

Sarau & Thompson and Robert E. Nelson, all of Riverside, for respondent.

BARNARD, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment declaring void and of no effect a deed dated February 15, 1927, whereby Jose Sisnero conveyed certain real property to his father, Simon Sisnero. The plaintiff herein, on July 13, 1927, obtained a judgment against the said Jose Sisnero in a tort action for $6,151.25. That action was begun January 3, 1927, and before judgment therein was rendered the conveyance referred to took place. The judgment in that action was partially satisfied on August 12, 1927, leaving a balance due thereon of $6,082. Thereafter, this action was filed against both parties to the conveyance mentioned, seeking to have said transfer of real property set aside as fraudulent. The answer of defendants admitted the relationship of father and son; the existence of the other judgment; that the same was only partially satisfied; that the defendant Jose Sisnero had not sufficient property out of which the judgment could be satisfied; and that the conveyance sought to be set aside had been made on February 15, 1927. The answer denied, however, that Jose Sisnero had ever been the owner of the real estate in question, it being alleged that Simon Sisnero, the father, had furnished the money with which said real estate was purchased; that he had always been the owner thereof, and that the son had always held the same as trustee for his father; and that in giving said deed the son was not attempting to render himself insolvent, but was only performing an act which he was legally bound to perform. After a trial the court found that at the time the original action was begun on January 3, 1927, Jose Sisnero was the owner of the property in question; that on February 15, 1927, he conveyed the same to his father, Simon Sisnero; that this transfer was made without any consideration, and that by virtue thereof the said Jose Sisnero intended to and did become insolvent; that after said transfer was made he had no property out of which said judgment could be satisfied; that the plaintiff was thereby defrauded of the sum of $6,082; and that the whole of said property does not exceed in value the sum of $6,082. From the judgment that followed this appeal is taken.

[1-3] The principal question raised is whether there is sufficient support for the findings of the trial court to the effect that the appellant Jose Sisnero was the owner of the property in question on January 3, 1927; that it is not true that said defendant never had any interest in said real property; that it is not true that the equitable ownership in said property was always or ever that of Simon Sisnero; that it is true that the consideration for the transfer of said real property to Jose Sisnero was paid in advance by Simon Sisnero, but that it is not true that the defendant Simon Sisnero did not intend a gift or bounty in paying said consideration; and that it is true that Jose Sisnero did not take title to said real property as trustee for Simon Sisnero. It is true that the record shows that both the father and the son testified that the several pieces of property in question were purchased by the son with money furnished by the father, for the purpose of having property purchased for himself. While this direct testimony that no gift or advancement was intended was competent, it was not conclusive. Gilmour v. North Pasadena Land, etc., Co., 178 Cal. 6, 171 P. 1066. On the other hand, there is a presumption of law that, where a father pays the consideration, and title to property is taken in the name of the son, a gift, advancement, or bounty is intended. Quinn v. Reilly, 198 Cal. 465, 245 P. 1091; Lezinsky v. Mason Malt W. D. Co., 185 Cal. 240, 196 P. 884. This presumption was, in the instant case, sufficient to sustain the action of the trial court. In Miller v. Miller, 82 Cal.

App. 657, 255 P. 1099, it is said: "On the other hand, aside from the oral testimony given by defendant's witnesses, the deeds themselves, which were introduced in evidence, together with the relationship of mother and son is sufficient to warrant the conclusion of the court." See, also, Motor Investment Co. v. Breslauer, 64 Cal. App. 230, 221 P. 700.

[4] Nor will an appellate court disturb the finding of a trial court, based upon such a presumption, where the opposing evidence, in effect, goes no farther than raising a conflict in the evidence. In Cox v. Schnerr, 172 Cal. 371, 156 P. 509, 513, the court said: "The presumption arising from the confidential relations of the parties to the purported conveyance might of itself, and in spite of the evidence offered by plaintiff, be sufficient to justify the court's findings of fraud. There may have been in the manner of the witnesses or the circumstances attending the giving of their testimony that which justified the court in disregarding it. It is within the province of the trial court to determine what weight and credit shall be given to the testimony of any witness and this court may not control the conclusion or finding of the superior court denying credence to the testimony unless it appears that there is nothing which at all impairs its accuracy. Blanc v. Connor, 167 Cal. 719-722, 141 P. 217; Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121-128, 113 P. 147."

[5] Not only are the findings supported by the presumption referred to, but additional support is found in the unconvincing character of some of appellants' evidence. Among other things, the son testified to the following effect: That in 1913 he got $500 from his father at Clifton, Ariz., telling him that Blythe was a good town; and that he returned to Blythe and bought the first pair of lots for $250. When asked if this $500 was a gift, he replied: "He gave me that to put into business for himself, to buy properties for him." The lots had two small shacks on them. When asked if he ever paid his father interest, he replied: "No, I just sent him money to live on, is all." He then built three more houses on the lots, which he says he paid for from the rents received. Two or three years later he bought another pair of lots for $200, paying for them out of the original $500 given him by his father "and the rent money." When asked if there were any buildings on those last two lots, he replied: "No sir, I put everything in there." Two or three years later he bought another lot for $150, paying for it out of the rents from the rest of the property. He further testified that in 1918 or 1919 his father gave him an additional $2,000 at Clifton, Ariz.; that he did this because the witness told him the town of Blythe was a good business town. When asked if he paid any interest on this money he replied: "No, we did not take no accounts that way at all." When asked if it was a gift, he replied: "It was a gift for himself, his own business, not for myself." When asked if he had told his father about buying any property, he replied: "About the first ones I bought, yes sir, he knew about it." When asked what he did with the last $2,000 he stated that he went to Ely and then to El Paso, carrying the money on his person; that he spent $250 of the money at Ely, and sent $900 to Blythe; that when he returned to Blythe he built a pool room building on the last lot purchased, putting about $1,500 into this building. He then stated that his father came to Blythe in 1925, and, when he told him there was $800 left, his father requested him to buy another lot adjoining the pool room, which he did. Again, in 1926, he bought two more lots for $150, and improved them until there were four houses thereon. When asked where he got this money he replied: "From the business." He further testified that during all these years he occupied the property, rented the houses, and paid the taxes, and that throughout these same years he sent money to his father on which to live.

The father testified that he gave the money to his son to buy property for him, but could not remember the dates, and did not know whether it was one year or ten years ago; that he had the money in a grip and gave it to his son in bills; that he had never been in Blythe previous to giving his son the money; that no one was present when the gift was made; that he never asked his son what rents he was getting; and that he did not know the town of Blythe, nor what was to be bought with the money. In this connection he stated: "I know he had a couple of lots there and when I came over there to see them, then I seen what Blythe was and the property that they had."

We have read the entire transcript and feel that the findings of the court are amply sustained, not only by the presumption of law referred to, but by the unsatisfactory character of appellants' own evidence. The reading of the evidence leaves little doubt that the property in question belonged to the son, and was transferred to avoid the impending judgment. While appellants testified to the contrary, their entire evidence is not so convincing as to justify setting aside the findings of the trial court.

[6] The next point raised is that the evidence is not sufficient to support the court's finding that the conveyance of the real property in question was made for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiff, in order to prevent the plaintiff from collecting the judgment, and that the plaintiff herein was defrauded out of $6,082 by said transfer. The defendant Jose Sisnero admitted that the transfer complained of rendered him insolvent, and he himself testified that he received no consideration for the deed to his father. These circumstances, together with the fact, as properly found by the court, that the property in question belonged to him and not to his father, sufficiently show fraud under section 3442 of the Civil Code. Knox v. Blanckenburg, 28 Cal. App. 298, 152 P. 59.

[7] The point is raised that the court's finding, "It is not true that Simon Sisnero did not intend a gift, advancement or bounty in paying said consideration," is a negative pregnant, and, therefore, not sufficient to sustain the judgment. Not only is this a double negative rather than a negative pregnant, but the additional finding, "And it is true that the defendant Jose Sisnero did not take title to said real property as trustee for the defendant Simon Sisnero," in connection with the other findings, was a sufficient finding to sustain the conclusion of law that no resulting trust was created. We have already held that these other findings are supported by the evidence and by a presumption of law.

It is not necessary to consider an objection that the court erred in refusing to permit certain conversation to be brought out, for the reason that the error complained of was later cured and the conversations in question given in full and without hindrance.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte CRAWFORD.
Cr. 1591.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Oct. 10, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 24, 1930.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 3, 1930.

1. Criminal law ☞1216(2).

Where sentences under different counts were not ordered to run concurrently, sentences operated consecutively (Pen. Code, § 669).

2. Criminal law ☞878(1).

Information in two counts, one charging possession of still and the other operation, held to charge but one offense, namely, that of operation of still, precluding double sentence (St. 1927, p. 497).

Information under St. 1927, p. 497, in first count, alleged that defendant, on or about the 10th day of January, 1929, did wilfully, unlawfully, knowingly, and feloniously have in his possession and under his control one still, and in count 2 alleged that defendant, on or about January 10, 1929, and for a period of about three weeks continuously next prior thereto, did wilfully, unlawfully, and feloniously operate or cause to be operated a certain still.

3. Criminal law ☞1209.

Habeas corpus ☞4.

If two separate acts constitute but single crime, double sentence cannot be imposed, and sentence may be attacked on habeas corpus.

4. Prisons ☞9.

Sentence for offense embodied in another offense charged in same indictment being void proceeding by prison board fixing maximum statutory penalty thereon was invalid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Habeas corpus proceeding by E. B. Crawford to secure release of petitioner from custody. From an order discharging petitioner, the People appeal.

Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

Thomas P. Boyd, of San Rafael, for petitioner.

KNIGHT, J.

The petitioner, E. B. Crawford, a prisoner in the state prison at San Quentin, was ordered discharged therefrom on a writ of habeas corpus granted by the superior court in and for the county of Marin. From the order made in that behalf, the people have taken this appeal. Pen. Code, § 1506.

[1] At the time the order for the writ was granted, the prisoner was serving two consecutive sentences imposed by the superior court in and for San Bernardino county, after having entered pleas of guilty to two counts of an information charging him jointly with one Woody with having had possession of, and with having operated, a still. On the first count the sentence was that he pay a fine of $1,000 and be imprisoned in the state prison for the term prescribed by law, and a like sentence was imposed on the second count. He entered the prison on March 6, 1929, and thereafter the prison board fixed the period of his sentence on the first count at three years and the period of his sentence on the second count at one year. No order was made by the superior court that the sentences should run concurrently, and consequently they operated consecutively. Pen. Code, § 669.

[2] Both charges were founded on a statute enacted by the Legislature in 1927, declaring it to be a felony for any person to "operate or cause to be operated or knowingly have in his possession or control, any still," etc., used or intended to be for the manufacture or production of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes (St. 1927, p. 497), and the legal ground upon which the writ was obtained was that the act of operating the still charged in the second count necessarily included the act of having possession of it, as charged in the first count; in other words, that the acts charged in both counts related to the same transaction and constituted but one offense, and that therefore the superior court was without jurisdiction to impose a double sentence for the one offense.

Briefly stated, the first point urged for reversal is that the matters set forth in the judgment roll are legally insufficient to warrant the conclusion reached by the trial court that the acts charged in the two counts related to the same transaction. We are of the opinion that the case of People v. Clemett (Cal. Sup.) 280 P. 681, 682, is decisive of this point. There the defendant was charged by an information, containing two counts, with the same offenses here charged, and the allegations of the two counts were identical in form, except as to dates, with those set forth in the two counts of the information in the present case, and it was held that the information charged but a single offense; that is to say, by count 1, in the present case it is alleged that the defendants "on or about the 10th day of January, 1929, * * * did wilfully, unlawfully, knowingly, and feloniously have in their possession and under their control one still," etc., and by count 2 it is alleged that the defendants "on or about the 10th day of January, 1929, and for a period of about three weeks continuously next prior thereto * * * did wilfully, unlawfully, and feloniously operate or cause to be operated a certain still," etc. "By count one" in that case, says the court in its opinion, "it is alleged that the defendants on or about the 3d day of January, 1928, and prior thereto (not stating whether it was one day or more prior to January 3, 1928), did wilfully, unlawfully, and feloniously have in their possession and under their control one still, etc. By the second count it is charged that said defendants on or about the 3d day of January, 1928, and for a period of about five months continuously next prior thereto, did wilfully, etc., operate and cause to be operated one certain still," etc. And in holding that the foregoing allegations related to the same transaction, and therefore constituted but one offense, the court says: "If he operated and caused to be operated said still, it was indisputably in his possession and under his control. The operation of the still includes a longer period than is included within the averment that the still was under his control. It is alleged that he operated it for about five months prior to January 3, 1928, a definite fixed period, while it is alleged in the other count that he had it in his possession and under his control on or about January 3, 1928, and prior thereto. Under the rule of pleading, the possession and control clause may be limited to one day prior to January 3, 1928, or at most a reasonable time prior thereto, and could under no rule of construction be extended backward beyond the period of five months, during which time it is alleged the defendant was operating the same still. Clearly the possession and control period is covered by the period during which the defendant operated said still. The defendant may have had a still in his possession or under his control without operating the same, but he could not have operated it without having it under his control and in his constructive possession. The possession and control period is included in the period of operation, inasmuch as possession and control were incidental to operation."

True, as pointed out by the people, the question in that case was raised and decided on an appeal by the defendant from the judgment, which admittedly included a transcript of the evidence; and it is also true that, after giving its reasons for holding that the two counts of the information stated but one offense, the court said that the conclusion it had reached thereon was "confirmed" by a reading of the evidence; but, as will be noted from the portion of the court's opinion hereinabove quoted, its decision on the point at issue was not based on the evidence, but was founded on a construction of the allegations of the information; and therefore, aside from the court's brief reference to the confirmatory effect of the evidence, that portion of its decision dealing exclusively with the question of construction of the allegations of the information, which as shown are identical with those found in the information in the present case, is manifestly controlling here. In further support of the trial court's conclusion that the acts of possession and operation as charged in the two counts related to the same transaction, the petition for the writ in substance so alleged, and no denial thereof was made in the return to the writ; nor is it anywhere claimed on this appeal that the two counts do in fact relate to separate transactions; merely that it cannot be so determined from the matter set forth in the judgment roll. The form of the judgment also indicates that but one transaction is involved, for it is therein recited that the defendant was duly informed by the court of the nature of the information filed against him "for the crime of possession of a still or distilling device and operating a still," etc. (Italics ours.) For the reasons stated, we believe that the trial court was justified in holding that the act charged in the first count was merged in the act charged in the second count, and that therefore the judgment of sentence pronounced on the first count was and is void. People v. Clemett supra.

[3, 4] The people further contend, however, that, even assuming that the two counts do relate to the same transaction, the limited effect thereof is that one portion of the judgment is erroneous, and that, while such erroneous portion might have been corrected by a reversal, if an appeal had been taken, it cannot be declared void on habeas corpus; also that, since the prison board might have fixed the maximum statutory penalty of five years for each offense, but fixed a period of four years only for both, which was within the maximum for one, the prisoner is not entitled to his discharge until he has served the equivalent of a four-year sentence. The case of In re Mann, 192 Cal. 165, 219 P. 71, is cited in support of this latter contention.

We are unable to sustain either of the foregoing contentions, for it is fundamental that, if two separate acts constitute but a single crime, a double sentence therefor cannot be imposed. If it is, one of the sentences must necessarily be void; and there is no law to compel a person to serve a void sentence. We find nothing in the case of In re Mann, supra, at variance with this fundamental rule. In the present case the void sentence is obviously the one relating to the possession of the still because the act of possession is included in the act of operation (People v. Clemett, supra); and, the sentence being void, the proceeding taken by the prison board pursuant thereto in fixing the term of such sentence is likewise void. Therefore the only valid judgment of sentence pronounced was the one based on the second count, and, since the prisoner has already served more than the full term of one year, fixed by the prison board as a punishment therefor, he is entitled to his discharge.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

PACKER v. WAGNER (two cases).
Civ. 233.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.
Oct. 9, 1930.

1. Automobiles ⇨244(35).

Testimony automobile was going 22 miles an hour 30 feet from intersection, and crossed intersection at speed less than 20 miles, warranted finding speed was not, as plaintiff testified, 15 miles.

2. Appeal and error ⇨907(4).

Map or blackboard used at trial, but not reproduced in record, must be assumed to have guided court to some extent in determining responsibility for accident.

3. Appeal and error ⇨931(1).

On appeal, every substantial conflict must be resolved in favor of finding.

4. Negligence ⇨136(8, 10).

When evidence is conflicting, or reasonable men might differ respecting inferences from undisputed evidence, negligence or contributory negligence is question of fact.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1).

Reviewing court may not disturb judgment unless there is no sufficient substantial evidence, upon any hypothesis, to support it.

6. Appeal and error ⇨996.

Court may not review finding based on reasonable inference, although believing opposite inference is more probable.

7. Automobiles ⇨245(80).

Whether motorist, seeing automobile 200 or 300, and then 100 feet away, apparently increasing speed, justifiably crossed intersection, held for court, in trial without jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; James L. Allen, Judge.

Separate actions by Armenia B. Packer, and by Hartley C. Packer, against John Wagner. While the second action was pending, plaintiff died, and by stipulation, Armenia B. Packer, administratrix of the estate of Hartley C. Packer, deceased, was substituted as party plaintiff, and the actions were consolidated for trial. Judgments for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

WARMER, Justice pro tem.

The court ordered the above-entitled actions consolidated for the purposes of trial, after a stipulation of counsel that the court might make such order, and both causes come here on the same record. The plaintiff in each action charges negligence. The answer denies the allegations of negligence and sets up a plea of contributory negligence. During the pendency of the action entitled Hartley C. Packer v. John E. Wagner, plaintiff Hartley C. Packer died, and by stipulation of counsel Armenia B. Packer, administratrix of the estate of Hartley B. Packer, deceased, was substituted as a party plaintiff in said action. Both causes of action arose out of a collision between automobiles at the intersection of Lemon street and Broadway in the city of Anaheim, Orange county, Cal. Lemon street runs north and south; Broadway east and west, said streets crossing at right angles. On May 26, 1926, plaintiffs were driving an automobile south on said Lemon street and the defendant Wagner was driving a Cadillac 59 roadster east on Broadway. A stranger to this action was driving a Franklin automobile north on said Lemon street. Plaintiffs were proceeding south on Lemon street at a rate of speed of 22 miles per hour when they were 30 feet from the intersection and the defendant was traveling east at about 30 miles per hour. Defendant saw the Franklin car and observed that it was going to stop on the south side of Broadway, and as he said when he saw the Franklin car was going to stop: "I stepped on it. You know what a Cad will do." Defendant did not see plaintiff's car until it was right in front of him, too close to stop or avoid collision. The plaintiff Armenia B. Packer testified that she first saw the Cadillac automobile between 200 and 300 feet west of Broadway as they approached the intersection. As to what was done by plaintiffs after beginning to cross said intersection, plaintiff testified as follows:

"We gave the car that was so well to the west no further consideration because it was too far away to be considered and continued across, and as we reached slightly south of the center of the button I realized this car approaching was coming at a great rate of speed, and instead of slowing as one would suppose a car would do, as it approached the intersection it seemed suddenly to leap in speed,—at least it was coming toward me at a great rate of speed and I thought 'If that car doesn't stop quick he is going to come very close to us,' and before another thought could formulate itself this car with a big blue hood on it was coming closer as though he were going to crumple the fenders, and that is the last I knew was seeing the great big blue hood coming straight for presumably our hood. * * *

"As you saw the car approaching you as you were crossing Broadway and when you saw this car approaching near to you would you be able to form any estimate of the speed?"

"A. Not miles, no,—but at that point it seemed the Cadillac then was as far back as the westerly line of the Huddle property, the Undertaking corner,—it was that far back when I was conscious and instead of slowing as he should have done he was coming very fast at that point.

"Q. That would be in feet about how far?"

"A. I presume in the neighborhood of 100 feet."

The car of the defendant collided with the car of plaintiff, striking plaintiff's car almost in the middle. Plaintiff's car rolled over, striking on the radiator of the Franklin car, which was stopped a little south of a white line extending across Lemon street on the south side of Broadway and somewhat easterly from the center line of Lemon street. The plaintiffs were injured as a result of the collision.

[1] The plaintiff, Armenia B. Packer testified that they proceeded across the intersection at from 10 to 15 miles an hour. Another witness testified that they were proceeding south on Lemon street in the usual lane of traffic at about 22 miles an hour when 30 feet from the intersection. Another witness testified that they had proceeded across the intersection at less than 20 miles an hour. From the above statement of facts we are of the opinion that there was substantial evidence from which the court might find that the plaintiffs were driving across the intersection at a greater rate of speed than 15 miles per hour. The deceased was driving plaintiff's car.

[2] There was a blackboard used by counsel for the purpose of illustrating the testimony of witnesses. No map or reproduction of such diagram is in the record.

In an action where a map or blackboard is used in the trial court to illustrate the testimony of witnesses and such map or copy of such diagram and markings upon the blackboard are not a part of the record on appeal the appellate court must assume that the trial court in reaching its conclusions as to the possibility of the responsibility for the accident was guided to some extent at least by such diagram. Godeau v. Levy, 72 Cal. App. 13, 236 P. 354.

[3] On appeal every substantial conflict in the evidence must be resolved in favor of the finding. Robertson v. Finkler, 27 Cal. App. 322, 149 P. 784.

"In examining the sufficiency of the evidence to support a questioned finding, an appellate court must accept as true all evidence tending to establish the correctness of the finding as made, taking into account, as well, all inferences which might reasonably have been thought by the trial court to lead to the same conclusion; and every substantial conflict in the testimony is to be resolved in favor of the finding." Bancroft-Whitney Co. v. McHugh, 166 Cal. 140, 134 P. 1157.

[4] When the evidence is conflicting, or when reasonable men might differ as to the inferences which ought to be drawn from the undisputed evidence, the question of negligence or contributory negligence is not one of law, but of fact. Davies v. Oceanic Steamship Co., 89 Cal. 280, 26 P. 827.

"Especially is this rule applicable when the negligence of the plaintiff depends upon * * * a comparison of his conduct with that which may be assumed to be the conduct of an ordinary man. * * * 'Where the essential fact in a case is whether contributory negligence did or did not exist, and this depends upon the credibility of witnesses or inference from facts and circumstances about which honest and impartial men might differ, such a case should be submitted to the jury.'" Smith v. Occidental & Oriental Steamship Co., 99 Cal. 462, 34 P. 84, 85.

[5, 6] A reviewing court is not justified in disturbing a judgment unless it appears that upon no hypothesis is there sufficient substantial evidence to support it (People v. Tom Woo, 181 Cal. 315, 184 P. 389), nor can it review a finding based upon a reasonable inference, though in its judgment the opposite inference is the more probable. 2 Cal. Jur. Appeal and Error, § 549, p. 935; Ryder v. Bamberger, 172 Cal. 791, 158 P. 753; Skaggs v. Wiley (Cal. App.) 292 P. 132.

See Sites v. Howrey (Cal. App.) 291 P. 597, to the effect that where plaintiff was riding in an automobile which her husband was driving, and the husband observed the approach of defendant some distance from the intersection, but believed that he had ample time to cross the intersection ahead of defendant, and after the husband had entered the intersection he again observed defendant approaching about 30 feet from the intersection and traveling at a high rate of speed, and the husband then applied his brakes and swerved to the right in an attempt to avoid the collision, whether or not plaintiff or her husband were guilty of contributory negligence under the circumstances was a question for the jury, and its verdict was conclusive on appeal.

Kienlen v. Holt (Cal. App.) 288 P. 866, is a case where plaintiff saw defendant's automobile coming when it was approximately 365 feet distant from the intersection and plaintiff had 110 feet to travel to cross the intersection, and plaintiff's wife saw defendant's automobile coming when it was 165 feet from the intersection and when plaintiff's automobile had approximately 55 feet to travel before passing out of the intersection, plaintiff had a right to assume that defendant would operate his car at a careful and prudent speed, and under the circumstances, it cannot be said that plaintiffs were guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in continuing across the intersection after observing the approach of defendant's machine.

In the case of Donat v. Dillon, 192 Cal. 426, 221 P. 193, 194, the court said: "Assuming, therefore, that the defendant had the right of way, he was required to proceed across the intersection in a careful and prudent manner, ever watchful of the direction in which danger was most likely to be apprehended. He could not close his eyes so far as south-bound traffic on Chester avenue was concerned. To the contrary, having observed Riddle's car approaching at an exceedingly fast rate of speed for that vicinity, the defendant was no longer entitled to rely upon the presumption that the driver of this machine would comply with the rules of the road, and he was bound to take such reasonable measures as he could under the circumstances to prevent the injury. It was, therefore, a question for the trial court to determine upon all the evidence and the reasonable deductions therefrom whether the defendant, after having seen the approaching machine, continued to exercise the care and prudence which a reasonable man would have exercised under the circumstances."

In the case of Flores v. Fitzgerald, 204 Cal. 374, 268 P. 369, the court held that in an action for damages for personal injuries received by plaintiff in a collision between his motorcycle and an automobile at the intersection of two city streets, the fact that plaintiff failed to observe the movements of defendant's machine after first seeing it 150 feet west of the intersection did not make him guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, but the question was one of fact for determination by the court, as the motorist was obligated to proceed across the intersection in a careful and prudent manner and to take such reasonable measures as he could under the circumstances to prevent the injury.

[7] In the case at bar the plaintiff proceeded across the intersection after seeing defendant's car 200 or 300 feet distant. They next saw defendant's car about 100 feet away apparently suddenly increasing its speed. They proceeded at the same rate of speed in the same direction, or, in other words, did nothing to avoid the collision. Whether they were justified in so doing under all the conditions and circumstances present depends upon a comparison of their conduct with that which may be assumed to be the conduct of an ordinarily prudent man. Under the circumstances here presented we cannot say that reasonable men might draw but one conclusion. The question was therefore one for the trial court, and its finding adverse to the appellant is conclusive upon this court.

The judgment is affirmed.

DANZIGER v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.
Civ. 7462.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Oct. 17, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 15, 1930.

1. Master and servant ⇨415.

Industrial Accident Commission is vested with full power and authority to regulate and prescribe nature and extent of proofs and evidence (St. 1917, p. 831, § 57(a), (6)).

2. Master and servant ⇨417(7).

Findings and conclusions of Industrial Accident Commission on ultimate facts are conclusive and final, and subject to review in proper proceedings (St. 1917, p. 831, §§ 19, 67(c)).

3. Master and servant ⇨417(7).

Findings of Industrial Accident Commission will not be disturbed when supported by substantial evidence (St. 1917, p. 831, §§ 19, 67(c)).

4. Master and servant ⇨419.

Finding that employee unreasonably refused to submit to surgical treatment for hernia under award held supported by evidence, warranting termination of employer's liability (St. 1917, p. 831, § 11(e)).

5. Master and servant ⇨348.

Workmen's Compensation Act should be construed in favor of employee (St. 1917, p. 831).

6. Master and servant ⇨419.

What constitutes reasonable diligence by employee in submitting to surgical treatment under award is question of fact (St. 1917, p. 831, § 11(e)).

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act by Harry Danziger, employee, against the Southern California Telephone Company, employer. On certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission, terminating employer's liability under award of surgical treatment and compensation after employee's unreasonable refusal to submit to treatment.

Order affirmed.

J. E. McAndrew, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Edward O. Allen, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CRAIG, J.

The petitioner was injured in the course of employment. Upon application to the Industrial Accident Commission for adjustment of his claim, stating that he had asked for an operation and for a truss to relieve a hernia, it was found and awarded that he be compensated by a surgical operation with necessary incidental medical and hospital treatment and a weekly allowance for temporary disability. The applicant having refused surgical treatment when tendered, a petition to terminate liability was filed, which, following a hearing and repeated refusals to submit thereto, was granted. Upon a petition for a writ of certiorari it is asserted that the commission acted in excess of its authority in terminating liability, that such order was unreasonable, and that the evidence does not justify findings of fact requiring or warranting the same.

Section 11(e) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831), provides as follows: "No compensation shall be payable in case of the death or disability of an employee if his death is caused, or if and so far as his disability is caused, continued, or aggravated, by an unreasonable refusal to submit to medical treatment, or to any surgical treatment, the risk of which is, in the opinion of the commission, based upon expert medical or surgical advice, inconsiderable in view of the seriousness of the injury."

[1-3] The commission is vested with full power and authority to regulate and prescribe the nature and extent of proofs and evidence. Section 57(a) (6). It may find therefrom upon ultimate facts, and its findings and conclusions in that respect shall be conclusive and final, subject to review in proper proceedings. Sections 19, 67(c). And its findings will not be disturbed when there exists any substantial evidence to support them. State Comp. Ins. Fund v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 195 Cal. 174, 231 P. 996; Smith v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 26 Cal. App. 560, 147 P. 600. Upon his application reciting that he had requested from his employer a surgical operation and truss which had been refused, the petitioner was accorded a hearing, the treatment was ordered, and for a period of three years the employer tendered and held itself ready, able, and willing to comply with the award. He was then notified that, unless he responded to such offer, the employer would seek proper relief. Upon a petition to terminate liability, a hearing was again held, expert and other evidence was received, and petitioner at that time declined to submit to the prescribed treatment. A physician consulted by petitioner certified that he "would not consider him a very good risk for any major surgery at the present time"; a clinical abstract from an eastern hospital where he had been treated some twenty-four years previously indicated the existence of chronic diffused nephritis, and a chemical analysis furnished by a local druggist revealed a "slight trace of albumen," and a condition which "may not be serious now, but a delay may make it so," shortly before the hearing. A doctor designated by respondents, following an examination, certified petitioner to be "a well developed and nourished man," suffering from a left inguinal hernia "easily reducible," and reported that he found the albumen and sugar tests both negative. Another physician who reviewed the medical reports stated that he found no good reason "so far as his physical condition is concerned, why he should not submit to operation, and I believe his refusal is unreasonable." There was medical evidence before the commission that he "should have a surgical repair," and that the "outlook for complete recovery is good." The petitioner testified that he would not submit to an operation after receipt of the druggist's report mentioned. Upon the foregoing evidence the commission found as a fact that the applicant had unreasonably refused to accept the awarded treatment, and entered its order accordingly.

[4-6] Many authorities are cited from other jurisdictions which we think cast little if any light upon the issue here presented. Under the statutory and judicial authority mentioned above, it is not for this court to say as a matter of law upon conflicting evidence, and as against the conclusion of the commission upon competent medical and surgical testimony, that such conclusion was unreasonable. Nor can it be said upon the record presented that the commission acted in excess of its authority, or that there was not substantial evidence tending to support the finding. It is true that the act has been consistently construed as one requiring interpretation in favor of the employee. However, that an order of the commission is "unreasonable" is nowhere in the statute specified as a ground for nullification of its action. It must be assumed that the intent of the Legislature was that the applicant should exercise within a reasonable time and with reasonable diligence a tendered right to medical or surgical treatment, in the interest of his own well being. A further reason for this is that the employer might be advised as to whether existing compensation and the proffered treatment were to be accepted or rejected. That the question as to what constitutes reasonable diligence is a question of fact requires no citation of authority. "As a proposition of general law, it has been affirmed in innumerable cases that a person's responsibility for his conduct will depend on whether the injurious consequences thereof might have been or ought to have been foreseen and prevented by him; and there seems to be every reason for the belief that, in cases arising under the workmen's compensation acts, this constitutes the true test, not only as to whether responsibility does or does not exist in the particular case, but also as to the extent to which the actor is to be deemed responsible for the consequences of his conduct." 28 R. C. L., § 101, p. 814. In logical concord with these principles, the supreme court of Kansas, following a review of numerous authorities of all the states where the subject has been discussed, concluded: "The reasonableness of the refusal of an injured employee to submit to an operation has been considered in most, if not all, the cases where he has been denied compensation on account of such refusal. That reasonableness has been disposed of in those cases as a question of fact. It is a question of fact that must be determined by the trier of facts, and when he has determined it, and his conclusion is supported by evidence, that conclusion is binding on this court the same as the determination of any other question of fact." Strong v. Sonken-Galamba Iron & Metal Co., 109 Kan. 117, 198 P. 182, 186, 18 A. L. R. 415.

The order terminating liability is affirmed.

Insurance 435.

Husband of assured driving assured's automobile at time of accident with knowledge and consent of assured held "assured" within automobile liability policy (St. 1919, p. 776).

Injured person obtained judgment against husband, but did not obtain judgment against assured, and thereafter instituted suit against insurance company under St. 1919, p. 776, to recover amount of policy and interest. Insurer contended that under policy it contemplated no indemnity liability to any person except named assured designated in schedule of statement. Omnibus clause of policy provided in substance that, in addition to assured named in policy, any person while riding in or operating automobile shall be deemed to be included within meaning of the word "assured."

Action by Mary Lahti against the Southwestern Automobile Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

TYLER, P. J.

Action to recover indemnity under a policy of automobile liability insurance.

The policy which was issued by defendant company in the sum of $5,000 covered a Chevrolet sedanette automobile of which one Margaret McMenamin was the owner and the assured named in the policy. Thereafter, and when the policy was in full force and effect, William McMenamin, her husband, while driving the automobile with the knowledge and consent of his wife, struck and injured the plaintiff, who brought suit against William McMenamin and recovered judgment in a sum in excess of $16,000. Margaret McMenamin was not made a party to the action, and no judgment has been recovered against her. Thereafter the present action was instituted against the insurance company, as authorized by statute (St. 1919, c. 367, p. 776), to recover on its policy in the sum of $5,000, together with interest on the judgment against William McMenamin.

Under the authority of the statute referred to and based upon the judgment recovered against William McMenamin, the court below rendered judgment for plaintiff on the theory that William McMenamin was included in the provisions of the policy, and that defendant was therefore liable to plaintiff on that instrument. From this judgment and from an order denying a new trial this appeal is taken.

The sole question here presented is whether or not defendant company is bound under the terms of the policy to pay a judgment rendered against William McMenamin where none was rendered against Margaret McMenamin.

The pertinent parts of the policy provide as follows:

"(Defendant) Does hereby agree:

"(1) To Indemnify the person * * * named in Statement 1 of the Schedule of Statements and herein called the Assured, against loss from the liability imposed by law upon the assured * * * as the result of an accident * * * caused by reason of the use, ownership, or maintenance of any of the automobiles. * * *

"(2) To defend in the name and on behalf of the assured any suit brought against the assured. * * *

"In addition to the assured named in the policy, any other person while riding in or operating any automobile covered hereunder, and any other person * * * while responsible for the operation of any such automobile, shall be deemed to be included within the meaning of the word 'assured' wherever used in this policy, provided (1) That such person * * * is not covered by any other valid and collectible insurance against an accident covered by this policy. * * *

"(3) That the word 'Assured' in the cancellation condition (G) and in the other insurance condition (N) of the policy shall be limited to the assured named in the schedule; (4) That the insurance under this policy shall be applied first to the protection of the assured named in the schedule, and the remainder if any shall alone be applicable to the protection of any person * * * entitled to indemnity under the provisions of this paragraph. * * *

"K. The Company shall not be liable * * * until a final judgment shall have been recovered against the assured in a suit covered hereby. The insolvency or bankruptcy of the assured shall not release the company * * * and if such insolvency or bankruptcy shall occur, * * * the judgment creditor shall have a right of action to recover the amount of such judgment against the Company to the same extent that the assured would have had to recover against the company had the assured paid the said judgment. * * *

"R. * * * The expenses incurred by the company in defending any suit, including the interest on any verdict or judgment and any costs taxed against the Assured, will be paid by the company irrespective of the limits expressed above."

The person named as the assured in schedule 1 of the schedule of statements is Margaret McMenamin. It is appellant's contention that the defendant under its policy contemplated no indemnity liability to any other person except Margaret McMenamin, the person named in the schedule of statements. There is no merit in the contention. In plain and unambiguous language, the omnibus clause of the policy provides that, in addition to the assured named in the policy, any person, while riding in or operating the automobile covered by the policy, shall be deemed to be included within the meaning of the word "assured." William McMenamin was within the defined group, being the operator of the car, and, this being so, the policy contemplated indemnity liability for his acts as an unnamed assured with the same force and effect as if he had been expressly named therein. That appellant contemplated giving benefits to persons other than the named assured, Margaret McMenamin, is further evidenced by the clause in the policy providing that the insurance shall be first applied to the protection of the assured named in the schedule, and the remainder, if any, shall alone be applicable to the protection of others entitled to indemnity. To hold that the policy covered only liability incurred by the insured herself by reason of the driving of the automobile by a third person with her consent and did not cover the liability of the third person when the named insured was not herself liable would be to disregard entirely the express provisions of the omnibus clause. See Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corp. v. Bear, 220 Ala. 491, 125 So. 676; Horn v. Commonwealth Co., 105 N. J. Law, 616, 147 A. 483; Odden v. Union Indemnity Co. (Wash.) 286 P. 59.

The terms of the policy are plain and explicit and the meaning clear and free from doubt, and need no construction. The declared intention was to insure, not only the named assured, but all the defined group named in the omnibus clause as well.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PER CURIAM.

[1] In the surety company's petition for the rehearing of this case it is claimed that our opinion overlooks the failure of appellant bank to establish that no part of the contractor's indebtedness to it has been repaid to it. That matter was in fact expressly dealt with, and in reversing the judgment we distinctly left it to the trial court to hereafter ascertain the facts in that behalf to the end that appellant should have credit from the fund assigned to it only for an amount equivalent to whatever remains unpaid on the contractor's obligation to it with the interest thereon. The surety company's real point is not so much that the matter was overlooked as that appellant bank was not required to prove a negative, namely, that the obligation to it had not been paid. No such burden rested on it. Light v. Stevens, 159 Cal. 288, 292, 113 P. 659; Levey v. Henderson, 177 Cal. 21, 23, 169 P. 673.

[2, 3] It is also claimed that we assumed without evidence that the maturity of the contractor's obligation to appellant bank was extended by the taking of a new note for it coincidently with the taking on September 13, 1927, of the collateral to secure the obligation, and that we have also erroneously assumed that the original indebtedness was paid by the taking of the renewal note, and that it is on the basis of these assumptions that we have held that appellant bank changed its position to its detriment when it took the assignment. That there was on the part of the bank a forbearance to press for payment of the contractor's obligation to it following its receipt of the collateral is, of course, unquestionable. True, such forbearance alone will not amount to such a change in a creditor's position to its detriment as to raise an estoppel. It is, of course, otherwise when there is a promise to forbear, and that may be implied as well as express, and, as pointed out in our original opinion, it will be implied when a new note payable in futuro is taken for the original obligation. The surety company claims that there is no evidence in this case that the new note was payable in futuro, and that it may be a mere demand note. Though the record is bare of any such suggestion, the evidence does not exclude that as a possibility. Regardless of that phase of the matter, however, the portion of the record printed in the supplement to the surety company's petition for rehearing includes, inter alia, the following (page 10) from the testimony by the managing officer of appellant bank:

"We would loan them (i. e., loan the contractor) on an assignment, and when that assignment was paid off we would take another assignment; kept the fund revolving. * * *

"They (i. e., the contractor) paid off probably some assignment, and then a new assignment was made, and a new note made. Any old indebtedness was paid off at that time and a new note was made."

In the light of this testimony it cannot successfully be claimed that the evidence is insufficient to show that when the present collateral was taken the position of appellant bank was changed to its detriment. King v. Mellon Nat. Bank, 227 Pa. 22, 75 A. 832; Crawford v. Dollar Sav. F. & T. Co., 236 Pa. 206, 84 A. 694.

Up to this point we have, in discussing the petitions for rehearing, done so on the basis which would apply were it necessary for appellant bank in order successfully to rely on an ostensible agency, to make out a strict case of agency by estoppel, that is to show the presence of each of the elements referred to in the passage from 2 C. J. 464, quoted in our original opinion. We adhere to the view that the showing made was sufficient for that purpose.

In view, however, of the doctrine laid down in Smitton v. McCullough, 182 Cal. 530, 189 P. 686, 689, we are not prepared to hold that appellant bank was under any obligation to go so far as that, because it is there held, as noted in our original opinion, "that not only does an antecedent indebtedness constitute a valuable consideration for a transfer in satisfaction and discharge of said indebtedness, but it is also a valuable consideration, within the protection of the equitable doctrine of bona fide purchase, for a transfer merely as security for a preexisting debt." In commenting on our reference to that opinion, counsel for the surety company assume that we gave significance only to the earlier part of the language quoted. It is necessary, however, to give effect to the rule embodied in the part of the quotation above italicized. We have recently had occasion to comment on this same language in Schumann-Heink & Co., Inc., v. U. S. Nat. Bank, 291 P. 684, as well as in our opinion denying a rehearing in that case.

[4] The point is made that we did not in our original opinion notice the contention that the pleadings of appellant bank, in effect at least, alleged an actual agency in Smart to accept in Fairbanks' behalf the assignment from the contractor to the bank, whereas our decision sustains the position of the bank on the basis of an ostensible agency not pleaded as such. But, as pointed out by counsel for the bank in his brief, even if his pleading could be construed as alleging an actual agency, proof of an ostensible agency could not amount to a variance. Donnelly v. S. F. Bridge Co., 117 Cal. 417, 421, 422, 49 P. 559.

[5, 6] A considerable part of the surety company's petition for rehearing is devoted to the claim that we failed to pass on its assertion of the right to be subrogated to the right of the owner under the doctrine of Castro v. Malcolm, 66 Cal. App. 635, 226 P. 976, and the cases therein relied upon. So far as the controversy between the surety company and appellant bank is concerned, that matter was expressly and necessarily passed on to the extent of holding that neither the owner nor the surety company have any right to deprive the appellant bank of the $5,000 covered by the assignment, in so far as the indebtedness from the contractor to the bank, for which that assignment was made security, may remain unpaid. To these views we adhere. We declined on the present appeal to pass on the respective rights, as between themselves, of the surety company and the claimants under material and labor liens, saying that their rights as between themselves had not been argued. To this we might have added that such a discussion would hardly be relevant to the present appeal, which is one by the bank to gain relief from a judgment against it. The surety company now asserts that all these matters were in fact argued. What it means is that they were necessarily implicated in its claim to be subrogated to Fairbanks' rights under the doctrine of Castro v. Malcolm, supra, and it apparently asks us to hold at this time, despite its joinder with such of the claimants of material and labor liens as were represented at the trial, in a stipulation that they should be paid pro rata with it, that because the other lien claimants, who did not appear at the trial, did not join in the stipulation, therefore it binds nobody, and that, by reason of the surety company's subrogation to the rights of Fairbanks, it must now be allowed its claim in full, from whatever is left if the bank is to be paid, to the exclusion of the material and labor lien claimants. It would be grossly unfair to the latter, who have had no reason to suppose any such question involved in the present appeal and have not discussed it before us to undertake to decide any such questions at this time. Their initial solution must be left to the trial court in its further hearing of this case and it will be time enough for us to deal with them when they are properly before us.

The petitions for rehearing are each denied.

Oct. 17, 1930.

1. Mandamus ☞28.

Application for inspection of records is within trial court's discretion, which will not be controlled in absence of abuse (Code Civ. Proc. § 1000; Const. art. 1, § 19).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1000, provided for application for order for inspection of records and books, and Const. art. 1, § 19, prohibited unreasonable searches and seizures.

2. Mandamus ☞187(9).

All intendments are indulged in favor of validity of trial court's order permitting inspection of record (Code Civ. Proc. § 1000; Const. art. 1, § 19).

3. Discovery ☞97(1).

To obtain order for inspection of records, documents must be described so as to be readily recognized and must be shown to contain material and competent evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 1000).

4. Discovery ☞97(4).

Affidavit to obtain inspection of record, alleging specific material evidence known to be in defendant's possession was sought, not "fishing expedition," stated mere conclusion insufficient to confer jurisdiction (Code Civ. Proc. § 1000).

5. Discovery ☞97(4).

Affidavit for inspection of records, not sufficiently describing documents and showing documents were incompetent as hearsay, except for leases to which plaintiff was not party, held insufficient (Code Civ. Proc. § 1000).

6. Searches and seizures ☞7(25).

Affidavit to inspect records showing mere "fishing device" violated constitutional immunity against unlawful searches (Const. art. 1, § 19; Code Civ. Proc. § 1000).

Application for writ of mandate by the Shell Oil Company to restrain the Superior Court of Los Angeles County and Douglas L. Edmonds, Judge, from enforcing order permitting inspection and right to copy certain records.

Writ granted.

McCutchen, Olney, Mannon & Greene, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

J. Edward Johnson and Chas. Mitschrich, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SCHMIDT, Justice pro tem.

In an action pending in the superior court of the State of California, in and for the county of Los Angeles, Josephine Cook, as plaintiff by her second amended complaint against Shell Oil Company, alleged that she was the owner of certain fractional royalty units under a certain oil and gas lease known as the Shell-Coseboom-Dabney lease, a copy of which was attached to the complaint; that there were certain breaches of covenants, express and implied, under said lease by the Shell Oil Company, petitioner herein, and by which action she claimed damages in a large amount. Subsequent to the filing of answer by the defendant therein, and pursuant to section 1000, Code of Civil Procedure, said plaintiff made her motion before the respondent court for an order of inspection and copy of records alleged to be in the possession or under the control of petitioner, and upon the hearing of said motion the respondent court granted same and made its written "order to permit inspection and right to copy certain records and documents" whereby it ordered petitioner, the Shell Oil Company, to "give to the plaintiff and/or her attorneys * * * an inspection and permission to take copies of each and all the following described records and/or documents in possession of and/or under control of said defendant Shell Oil Company containing the information specified in said notice of motion for order for inspection and copy, to-wit:

"1. The location records showing the precise location in distance in terms of feet from the boundaries of the tract of land on which were located and drilled the following described oil and/or gas wells to-wit:

"(a) wells numbered 1-9, inclusive, located on" (here follows description of the two ten-acre pieces in which plaintiff claimed her unit interests and more than 40 additional wells described in a similar manner, all of which additional wells were on property other than the twenty acres covered by said lease).

"The evidence desired by plaintiff to be obtained from said records on each of the here-inabove described oil and/or gas wells is: The precise location and distance in terms of feet and direction from the nearest boundary line of said Shell-Coseboom-Dabney Lease, and the precise location in terms of feet and direction from each of the two nearest boundary lines of the particular lease upon which each of said wells is located.

"2. The drilling records of each and all the foregoing oil and/or gas wells as to each of said wells:

"(a) The date actual drilling commenced;

"(b) The date of first completion;

"(c) The date first placed on production;

"(d) The depth in terms of feet when completed;

"(e) The depth in terms of feet at which each string of casing is set;

"(f) The size and length of such casing;

"(g) The length in terms of feet of perforated casing;

"(h) The depth in terms of feet from the surface of the land to the bottom of such perforated casing;

"(i) The depth in terms of feet from the surface of the land to the point where each oil and/or gas bearing strata was encountered both in the original drilling and/or in deepening;

"(j) The thickness in terms of feet of each oil and/or gas bearing strata encountered and/or penetrated;

"(k) The depth in terms of feet of open hole below the bottom of the deepest casing set;

"(l) The date at which actual drilling to deepen a well commenced;

"(m) The depth in terms of feet at which completed after redrilling or deepening;

"(n) The depth and/or thickness in terms of feet of each oil and/or gas bearing strata from which oil and/or gas has been produced or is now being produced;

"(o) The dates between which any and/or all of said wells were off production and the reason why said well was off production during such period.

"3. The production records on which is recorded the daily, weekly and monthly production of each and/or all said wells showing among other things:

"(a) The quantity of oil in terms of barrels and/or of gas in terms of cubic feet produced each day and/or each week and each month from each and/or all said wells from the time that the same began producing oil or gas to date hereof;

"(b) The specific gravity of the oil produced each day from each oil bearing strata penetrated by such well from which production was taken;

"(c) The monthly market price in terms of dollars per barrel of oil and in terms of dollars per thousand cubic feet of gas on which royalties were based which have been paid by the defendant to the owner of the fee or of the royalties from the production of each well;

"(d) The period for which said wells or any of them were off production and the reasons therefor.

"4. The tracings and/or blue prints containing a chart showing the formation and/or structure penetrated in each such well during the drilling thereof from its commencement to its completion.

"5. The record of each and every survey and/or acid bottle test made on any and/or all of the above designated wells.

"6. The complete drilling log of each of said above designated wells.

"7. The lease and/or drilling contract and/or contract for the purchase of production under and/or by virtue of which the said defendant, Shell Oil Company, drilled and/or operated and/or is operating the wells on the following described tracts of land, to-wit: (here are enumerated eight leases).

"Also each and every contract and/or agreement which the defendant has heretofore made concerning the payment of royalties and/or the sale of production from each and every of the said wells hereinbefore described."

By its petition to this court the Shell Oil Company is seeking to restrain the respondent court from enforcing in any manner whatsoever the aforementioned order, claiming that the respondent court, under the facts in this case, was without jurisdiction to make the order.

[1.2] Without doubt, section 1000, Code of Civil Procedure, affords the trial court judicial discretion in passing upon any application made for inspection of books and records. We must indulge all intendments in favor of the validity of the order of the trial court, and the action of the trial court being discretionary, the writ here asked cannot issue unless the action of the trial court amounts to an abuse of discretion. Maclay Rancho v. Superior Court, 81 Cal. App. 471, 254 P. 287.

The question presented involves the constitutional right of the people to "be secure in their * * * papers and effects, against unreasonable seizures and searches." Const., art. 1, § 19.

As was said in Kullman v. Superior Court, 15 Cal. App. 276, at page 285, 114 P. 589, 593: "The right of the people to be secure against unreasonable or unnecessary seizure of their private papers and documents is justly regarded as a highly sacred one—so much so, in fact, that the people themselves have taken the pains in express written terms to guarantee and safeguard its perfect enjoyment. Const. art. 1, § 19. In no case, therefore, should a person be forced to surrender his private books and papers to another who does not claim to own or have any interest in them except upon convincing proof that such books or papers contain evidence which materially affects the rights in litigation of the person demanding them." Citing and quoting from Ex parte Clarke, 126 Cal. 238, 58 P. 546, 46 L. R. A. 835, 77 Am. St. Rep. 176.

[3] As a condition precedent to support such an order of inspection there must be shown, by clear and unequivocal proof, two essential facts:

(1) That the precise book, paper, or document containing the evidence material to the issue be described or designated so that it may be readily recognized; and

(2) That such book, paper, or document contains evidence material to the issue to be tried by the court. Such evidence must be competent evidence, not hearsay.

Again quoting from Kullman v. Superior Court, 15 Cal. App. 276, at page 286, 114 P. 589, 593, it is said: "Nor is it enough, as is said by the court in Morrison v. Sturges, 26 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 179, 'that the party believes or is advised that the paper contains material evidence. Facts must be shown to support it.'"

The Kullman Case was approved in Funkenstein v. Superior Court, 23 Cal. App. 663, and at page 667, 139 P. 101, 103, we find this significant language:

"If any of such books, papers, or documents so made, issued, or taken would be admissible upon any theory of the case, it was the duty of the affiant to set forth the facts and reasons showing wherein their materiality and admissibility consist; and it was not sufficient in his affidavit to merely rely upon the legal conclusion stated in general terms that such books, papers, and documents would be material.

"Finally, the entire failure to the affiant to identify with any particularity of description any specific book or paper or document constitutes, in our opinion, a fatal objection to the jurisdiction of the trial court to make the order in question."

See, also, Pyper v. Jennings, 47 Cal. App. 623, 191 P. 565; People v. Nields, 70 Cal. App. 191, 232 P. 985; Commercial Bank v. Superior Court, 192 Cal. 395, 220 P. 422.

The record in this case stands uncontradicted that: (1) Written demand was made upon plaintiff and her attorneys for a bill of particulars specifying in detail the precise respects in which petitioner was supposed to be in default under its lease, including a statement of the wells it was supposed to have failed to offset and a statement of the wells it was supposed to have completed under the leased premises. A bill of particulars was not forthcoming; several months later petitioner made a motion in respondent court for an order directing plaintiff to furnish a bill of particulars substantially in accord with the original demand, in response to which plaintiff filed an affidavit with the court, stating that she had no knowledge of the particulars demanded and that she would need an inspection of petitioner's records before she could give the bill of particulars; the motion was denied. And (2) in her deposition taken prior to the hearing resulting in the order plaintiff admitted she had no knowledge of any facts in connection with the wells mentioned in her complaint; that she had verified her complaint on the "say so" of her husband. Likewise her husband in his deposition admitted he did not have any knowledge of the facts involved in the allegations charged in the complaint.

[4] In support of the motion for the order plaintiff below presented to the respondent court the affidavits of J. Edw. Johnson and Chas. Mitschrich, each of whom are counsel for plaintiff. The one affidavit of J. Edw. Johnson states "that said plaintiff's demand for an inspection of records * * * is only for the purpose of obtaining specific evidence which affiant knows to exist and which has a material bearing on the issues and which affiant knows to be in the possession of said defendant; that said demand for an inspection * * * is not a 'fishing expedition.'" In another affidavit he states "that each and all of the said records, * * * specified in said notice * * * are material to the proper presentation of plaintiff's case and are in the possession or under the control of said defendant and cannot be procured elsewhere." These statements of the affiant are mere conclusions, and under the decisions hereinbefore referred to could not confer any jurisdiction on respondent court.

Two affidavits were filed by Charles Mitschrich, one dated May 26, 1930, and the other June 12, 1930, which second affidavit substantially includes all that is in the first affidavit; we shall treat the two as one affidavit. The affidavit alleges, among other things:

"That affiant has been engaged in the actual practice of law since April 2, 1889, and that approximately twenty-five years of his practice has been to a large extent in connection with litigation connected with the oil and gas industry, and that affiant knows from personal experience that every successful oil operator in the regular course of his business makes and preserves records of all drilling operations and of the daily, weekly, monthly and yearly production of each and every well drilled and/or operated by it or him; and that the said defendant has in the regular course of its business made and preserved such records concerning each and every oil and/or gas well drilled and/or operated by it and particularly those certain oil and/or gas wells named and described in said written

'Demand for Inspection and Copy'; that said records so made and preserved by said defendant contain all of the information requested, set forth and described in said 'Demand for Inspection and Copy'; that all of said records and documents and the information contained therein are accurate, relevant, material, and essential to the proper presentation of this action and are admissible in evidence upon the trial thereof as is more fully hereinafter set out; that said records and the information contained therein and an inspection thereof by plaintiff are necessary to enable plaintiff to present her case to the court and that said information is not in the possession of plaintiff nor her attorneys and cannot be obtained by plaintiff elsewhere than from the said records of defendant." (Here follows mention of the more than fifty gas wells hereinbefore in this opinion referred to, followed by the words):

"That all of the oil and/or gas wells located on said lands were drilled and are owned and/or operated by said defendant and so near to the boundaries of said Shell-Coseboom-Dabney Lease as to drain and that they do drain oil and/or gas from beneath said demised land leased to defendant by said Shell-Dabney-Coseboom Lease.

"That the said Location Records demanded from said defendant will show the exact location of each of said oil and/or gas wells in relation to the boundaries of said demised premises and are material, relevant and necessary to show and will show that said wells are located so near to the demised land as to drain and that the same do drain oil and gas from beneath the said demised premises, and that the Court can ascertain therefrom that the same do drain oil and/or gas from beneath the demised premises.

"That the said 'Drilling Records' and 'Tracings' and/or 'Blue Prints' demanded from said defendant will show all of the information as set forth in * * * said written demand * * * and are material and relevant and admissible in evidence to show and do show the manner and diligence or lack of diligence with which the demised land was explored and developed for oil and gas; the particular sand or sands from which each of said wells have produced and are now producing oil and/or gas; the thickness of each particular oil and/or gas sand encountered * * * the size of the casing used in each well; the amount and exact location of perforated casing in each of said wells and the other information set forth in said demand, all of which is necessary and material to show and will show, and therefrom the court can determine whether or not the said wells on the said adjacent and nearby lands which were drilled and are owned and/or operated by said defendant are properly or at all offset by any well or wells on the said demised premises and to determine whether or not said demised premises were properly and adequately explored for gas and/or oil and whether or not wells drilled, owned and operated on surrounding land by defendant company have drained and/or do drain oil and/or gas from beneath the demised premises, and that each and all of said records are admissible as evidence tending to prove the truth of the allegation in plaintiff's complaint.

"The said 'Production Records' demanded from said defendant will show the quantity of oil * * * produced * * * and the period during which same was so produced; the quality of the oil * * * price obtained * * * and the royalties * * * paid; that said records are necessary and material to show and do show the quantity of oil and gas produced * * * and it can be determined therefrom and the same will tend to prove how much of it if any produced from wells on the adjacent or nearby lands was drained from beneath the said demised premises, and will enable the court or jury to compute * * * the amount of damage if any to which plaintiff is entitled by reason of said drainage and that the same are admissible in evidence as tending to prove the truth of the allegations of plaintiff's complaint herein.

"That the said Tracing and/or Blue Prints demanded * * * will show the cross-section of each formation * * * penetrated * * * and the same are proper, necessary and material and admissible in evidence to prove the character of formations penetrated * * * the exact location of the strata * * * the length of time necessary to drain said wells * * * and whether or not production was or is now being taken from each sand or which particular sand from which it was and/or is taken and by comparison will tend to prove that defendant has neglected to protect the demised premises from drainage."

"The Record of each survey and/or acid bottle test * * * will show the general course and direction taken by the drill in the drilling of each of said wells and will show whether or not said hole or well is straight and if not straight the degree of deflection and the direction in which it veered from the point at which it entered the surface of the ground and the distance, and is necessary and material and admissible in evidence in this cause as tending to show and will show whether or not any one or more of said wells located on adjacent or nearby premises * * * are in fact completed * * * at a point underneath the said demised premises and in fact draining oil directly from beneath said demised premises, and to aid the court or jury to determine that fact.

"The 'Drilling Log' of each of said wells * * * will and does show a complete history of each well * * * and in addition to the information contained in the drilling record will and does tend to prove and to show what if any delays there were in drilling the same; the cause of the delay; the length of the delay * * * whether or not delays in drilling were necessary or due to negligence or carelessness and are admissible in evidence to aid the court in determining whether or not diligence was used * * * and whether or not delays in drilling on the wells in the demised lands were intentional or unavoidable by the use of due skill and diligence, and by comparison with the logs of wells drilled by the defendant on adjacent lands will show whether defendant purposely or otherwise delayed the drilling of the wells drilled by it on the demised lands and are admissible in evidence as tending to prove the truth of the allegations in plaintiff's complaint.

"That the documents * * * contain evidence relative to the merits of this action which is material, relevant and competent and admissible in evidence in the trial of this cause in that such documents specify and prove among other things, the amount of royalties which defendant company agreed to pay to the respective owners of the lands surrounding and adjacent to the demised lands and affiant is informed and believes they will disclose that in some instances the royalties which defendant company agreed to pay * * * produced by it through wells on such adjacent and/or surrounding lands were less than those which defendant agreed to pay * * * on the demised land and will tend to prove that one of the motives of defendant in neglecting and failing to drill offset wells on the demised premises * * * was to secure as much as possible of the oil and/or gas from beneath the demised premises through such surrounding wells for a less royalty than that it agreed to pay * * * on the demised premises and to avoid the payment to the lessors of the demised premises and their assigns of the royalties it would otherwise have been compelled to pay therein; and will tend to show that defendant's contention that it has properly offset surrounding wells is not made in good faith and tends to prove the truth of the allegations in plaintiff's complaint, that defendant has wilfully and negligently failed to drill offset wells on the demised premises. * * *

"That the drilling records, location records, production records, tracings and blue prints above described and drilling log are all records which the defendant made in the usual course of business and taken together contain accurate evidence showing that defendant has during all of the times mentioned in the complaint drained, and still continues to drain oil and gas from beneath the demised premises through the wells * * * on adjacent premises and that it has failed and neglected to offset the same on the demised premises and are admissible in evidence and will tend to prove that offset wells could have been profitably drilled and operated and should have been drilled and operated by defendant on the demised premises within a reasonable time after producing wells were brought in by defendant in surrounding lands for the mutual advantage of both parties hereto and that the same has not been done within a reasonable time or at all.

"That the record of surveys of its wells in adjacent lands contains evidence that some of such wells were completed under the demised premises and that the production therefrom is at a point under the same notwithstanding the top of such wells is on other lands, and the same is admissible in evidence as tending to prove and will prove whether or not defendant has produced and/or is producing oil and/or gas from underneath the demised lands through wells which were commenced in adjacent lands but completed under the demised land.

"That the material issues in this cause are whether or not wells drilled by defendant on adjacent lands drained and/or drain oil and/or gas from beneath the demised premises and if so, whether or not proper and/or necessary offset wells were drilled by defendant on the demised lands to properly protect the same from drainage, whether or not the defendant used diligence in protecting the demised premises * * * whether or not it used due diligence in exploring and/or developing the demised premises * * * how much if any oil and/or gas has been drained * * * and how much if any loss plaintiff suffered by reason of such drainage; whether or not wells commenced by defendant on adjacent lands were completed in the producing oil and/or gas sands underneath the demised lands and if so, how much and the quality and value of such production." (Italics ours.)

Taking this affidavit section by section, it will be noted throughout the affidavit, as was repeated toward the end thereof, appears affiant's conclusion that "each and all of said records are necessary, proper and admissible in evidence to aid the court in determining said issues and each of them and the inspection of said records by plaintiff is necessary and proper to enable plaintiff to properly and expeditiously present her evidence."

[5] Tested by the decisions hereinbefore referred to, not any of the documents, excepting the leases, is described or designated with sufficient particularity so that it can be readily recognized, and, secondly, it is not shown that any of the documents contain evidence material to the issue to be tried by the court. The affidavit of Mr. Mitschrich shows throughout that he has not any knowledge whatsoever as to the actual facts contained in the proposed records. Furthermore, each of the records referred to would not in and of itself be competent evidence, except the leases; his affidavit shows that each thereof is mere hearsay. As to the leases, the record shows that plaintiff is not a party to any of them and has no interest whatsoever in any of them.

[6] The affidavit further shows, through its length, that it is a mere "fishing device," as contended for by petitioner. Being a fishing device, it is in direct violation of the constitutional immunity against unlawful searches and seizures. As was said in Ex parte Clarke, 126 Cal. 235, at page 240, 58 P. 546, 548, 46 L. R. A. 835, 77 Am. St. Rep. 176:

"In Morrison v. Sturges, 26 How. Prac. [N. Y.] 179, the court say: 'It is not enough that the party believes or is advised that the paper contains material evidence. Facts must be shown to support such belief.' Moreover, it was, in effect, a general omnibus order for the production of all defendant's books, which has always been held to be unauthorized; * * * the order was in the nature of what Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, over a century ago, called 'a mere fishing bill,' and such bills have been universally condemned. It is quite evident that these books were not required to be produced for the direct purpose of introducing them in evidence. Plaintiff would not have offered them, or any part of them, in evidence, unless he found something in the part offered that was relevant and material in support of his side of the case; and, indeed, they would not have been otherwise admissible. He merely intended to draw his dragnet of inspection through all these books under the ostensible motive of trying to catch something which his witness had testified was not there. In the meantime all the private business of the defendant—all its dealings with persons other than plaintiff, its methods of conducting its affairs, perhaps its financial condition, and other matters vitally important to its welfare—would have been exposed. There is no warrant in the law for such a forcible wholesale violation of a person's privacy upon such a showing as was made in this case. A man does not lose all his civil rights because he is brought into court as a party to a suit. As was said by Lord Hatherley: 'A court is bound to protect the defendant against undue inquisition into its affairs' (7 Ch. App. 97, and notes); and it would be difficult to imagine a more striking instance of such 'undue inquisition' than an order compelling a defendant to produce for inspection all his books upon the mere suspicion—against positive evidence to the contrary—that they might possibly contain some evidence favorable to the plaintiff, and without pointing to any particular part of all these books over which this suspicion was supposed to hover."

In the case at bar petitioner filed affidavits in opposition to the application for order of inspection, in which it was positively set forth that the petitioner did not have any record of any violations of the terms of the lease upon which plaintiff brought her suit, and further, that they knew of no such violations.

There is not any merit in the contention of respondent that the letters referred to in the affidavits presented at the hearing contain admissions upon which the respondent court was justified to make the order of inspection.

A peremptory writ of mandate will issue as prayed.

LAURITZEN et al. v. H. L. JUDELL &
CO. et al.
Civ. 4150.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Oct. 24, 1930.

1. Time $\S$ 10(7).

That last day for granting new trial fell on New Year's Day held not to extend time (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 12, 660).

Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 660, limits the power of the court to grant a new trial to a period of 60 days from service on moving party of written notice of entry of judgment. Notwithstanding section 12, which is the only section specifying how time shall be computed, the last day of the 60-day period must be counted, even though a holiday.

2. New trial $\S$ 116(2).

If notice of judgment entry is defective, it is inoperative to set 60-day period within which court may grant new trial (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 660).

3. New trial $\S$ 116(2).

Where notice of entry of judgment contained error as to date, held, it was ineffective to set 60-day period within which court may grant new trial (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 660).

The record showed that the judgment was entered on October 30, and the notice of entry of judgment served upon party moving for new trial set forth that judgment had been entered on October 31.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

& Company and another. Verdict for both plaintiffs, and from order granting new trial after judgment in favor of plaintiff last named, defendants appeal.

Derby, Sharp, Quinby & Tweedt, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J.

This cause is before us upon an appeal by the defendants from an order granting a new trial after judgment in favor of the plaintiff Andrew Lauritzen in the sum of $350. The jury in the above-entitled cause rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff Florence Lauritzen in the sum of $12,000 and in favor of her husband, against the defendants, in the sum above named. The motion for new trial was made by the plaintiff Andrew Lauritzen only in so far as it affected the judgment in his favor, and the order granting a new trial related only to that part of the judgment.

[1] It is contended by the respondents that the trial court had no jurisdiction to make the order granting a new trial to the plaintiff Andrew Lauritzen, by reason of more than sixty days having elapsed from and after service on said plaintiff of a written notice of the entry of judgment. The appellants rely upon the provisions of section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure limiting the power of the court to grant a new trial within the period named. This contention is met by the respondents with the statement that as the sixtieth day fell upon the 1st day of January, a nonjudicial day, the court had all of January 2 within which to make the order. This contention, however, on the part of the respondents is answered in the negative by the following cases: Dolan v. Superior Court, 47 Cal. App. 235, 190 P. 469, and Shepherd v. Superior Court, 54 Cal. App. 673, 202 P. 466. While the opinions in both of the cases just cited fail to give any consideration to the fact that section 12 of the Code of Civil Procedure is the only section specifying how time shall be computed, yet in view of the fact that hearing in the Supreme Court was denied in both cases, the holding that the last day of the 60-day period must be counted, even though a holiday, must be considered as definitely settled.

[2, 3] It is further contended on the part of the respondents that in order to set the 60-day period in operation, the requirement of the sections relative to giving notice of the entry of judgment must be strictly complied with. The record in this case shows that judgment in the case of plaintiffs against the defendants named in this action was entered on the 30th day of October, 1929. The notice of the entry of judgment served by the appellants upon the respondents reads as follows (omitting the title): "You and each of you are hereby advised and you will please take notice that judgment in your favor and against the above-named defendants has heretofore, to-wit, on the 31st day of October, 1929, been entered in the above-entitled action by the clerk of the above-entitled court." (Signed by attorneys for appellants.) Service of this notice was made on the 2d day of November, 1929. The notice of intention to move for a new trial was filed November 8, 1929. The order of the court granting a new trial in favor of the plaintiff Andrew Lauritzen was made and entered on the 2d day of January, 1930. If the notice of the entry of judgment in this action was and is defective, then and in that case the court had jurisdiction to make the order granting a new trial.

In the case of Carpentier v. Thurston, 30 Cal. 123, the Supreme Court had before it a similar question and held that an error in the date of the entry of the judgment, or of the decision, rendered it inoperative to set the 60-day period in operation.

A very similar case is that of Weeks v. Coe, 36 App. Div. 339, 55 N. Y. S. 263, 265. There the trial court made an order granting a new trial on October 22, 1898, which was entered on October 29, 1898. The notice of entry of the order was served on plaintiff on October 29, 1898, stating that the order had been made and entered on October 29. The plaintiff appealed from the order 32 days after receiving such notice. The section of the New York Code (section 1351) applicable to such cases provided that an appeal must be taken within 30 days after service of notice of entry of the order. The defendant in the Weeks Case moved to dismiss the appeal. The court, in considering the question, held as follows: "It is well settled that where a party seeks to limit the time of his adversary to appeal he must be strictly regular in his practice to accomplish that result. * * * But if we treat the notice of the entry of the order as having been brought to the knowledge of the plaintiff, it is insufficient to limit the time in which to appeal. The notice states that it is a copy of an order made and entered on the 29th day of October, 1898. Reference to the order itself shows that no such order was made on that day. On the contrary, its heading, and the certificate of the clerk attesting the same, show that it was made on the 22d day of October, 1898. This is a departure from strict regularity, and within the authority of the cases first above cited is insufficient as a notice to limit the time of appeal." The defendants' motion to dismiss the appeal was denied.

The record in the instant case shows that there was no judgment made and entered, or made or entered, on the 31st day of October, 1929, and in line with the cases cited, it must be held that the trial court had jurisdiction to grant a new trial herein.

The order is therefore affirmed.

All concur.

1. Criminal law — 419, 420(10).

Testimony by manager of store broken into that he personally checked stock before and after burglary, and knew certain merchandise was missing and stolen, held not objectionable as hearsay.

2. Burglary — 41(1).

Variance between dates of burglaries and sales of stolen merchandise held not fatal, but went to weight of testimony concerning sales.

The evidence disclosed that burglaries were committed on March 28, April 5, and May 5. Witness testified that he was employed by defendant to sell merchandise identified as merchandise stolen, and that he made first sale along in month of March, and subsequent sales within two and three weeks of first sale.

Conviction for burglary under conflicting evidence cannot be disturbed by appellate court.

MARKS, Acting P. J.

Appellant and F. C. Hertel were jointly charged with the crime of burglary in three separate counts of an information filed by the district attorney of Fresno county. It was alleged that the accused entered the store or warehouse of the Better Buy Cash Grocery in Fresno, Cal., on or about March 28, April 7, and May 5, 1930, with intent to commit the crime of theft. Three prior convictions of felonies were alleged against appellant, and admitted by him. Hertel escaped from jail and was at large at the time of the trial. Appellant was found guilty on all three counts and judgment pronounced against him.

Appellant relies upon two grounds for a reversal of the judgment. He urges that the trial court erred in denying his motion to strike the testimony of the witness Harry Markowitz, offered in support of the third count of the information, and that the evidence was not sufficient to support the verdict and judgment against him.

[1] Harry Markowitz was manager of the Better Buy Cash Grocery at Fresno. He testified that on the nights of March 28, April 5, and May 5, 1930, the store was broken into and several cases of three popular brands of cigarettes stolen. The entrances were made through a window and a trapdoor. The cigarettes were packed in cases with the store name and other identifying marks on the outside of each. The witness personally checked over the stock on the nights before and the mornings after the first two burglaries, and testified to the number of cases stolen. Before and after the burglary of May 5th the inventories of the stock were taken by other employees of the store and reported to the witness. The motion to strike was made on the ground that the testimony of the witness concerning the taking of the cigarettes on this occasion was hearsay. The witness further testified that he closed the store the night before and opened it the morning after the burglary and knew from what he then saw, and of his own knowledge, that the cigarettes were missing from the stock, which furnished sufficient grounds to support the court's denial of the motion to strike this portion of his testimony.

Frank Pierce, a witness for the people, testified that upon three occasions appellant employed him to sell several cases of the same brand of cigarettes as those stolen in Fresno. He made the sales to Mona Pitts and a Mr. Cruise and collected the money therefor, which he paid to appellant after deducting his commission. Some of the cigarettes, still in the cases, were recovered from the purchasers.

[2, 3] Appellant claims a fatal variance between the dates of the burglaries in Fresno and the sales of the cigarettes by Pierce. The burglaries were committed on March 28, April 5, and May 5, 1930. Pierce first testified that he saw appellant and made the first sale of the cigarettes about March 1, 1930. Appellant maintains that, as this date was twenty-seven days before the first burglary, the cigarettes then delivered by appellant to Pierce, and sold to Pitts and Cruise, could not have been those stolen on March 28th or thereafter. Pierce also placed his second sale about two weeks after the first, and the third about one week after the second. Pierce, however, did not definitely fix the date of the first sale as March 1st. He testified that it was somewhere along there in the month of March. Only three sales were made by Pierce to Pitts and Cruise. The packing cases found in the possession of the purchasers were positively identified as those stolen from the Better Buy Cash Grocery. The variance in the dates, if any, went to the weight to be given Pierce's testimony, and arguments concerning it should have been addressed to the jury rather than to this court. The jury decided the issues against appellant, and we cannot disturb the verdict. There is ample evidence in the record to support the verdict and judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF MONO COUNTY et al.

Civ. 4055.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Sept. 30, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 30, 1930.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court
Nov. 24, 1930.

1. Taxation ☞178.

Attempted tax sale of city's "patent right" to land conveyed by patent from federal government held void; statutory procedure for taxing possessory rights being exclusive (Pol. Code, §§ 3804a, 3650, subd. 10; Const. art. 13, § 1).

Evidence showed lands in controversy had been reserved and withdrawn from entry by federal government pursuant to Act Cong. June 17, 1902 (32 Stat. 388), and had subsequently been purchased by city pursuant to Act Cong. June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. 801).

2. Taxation ☞174.

In absence of express authority, public property is not taxable.

3. Taxation ☞473.

That statute used word "may" did not give county supervisors discretion to deny city's petition for cancellation of invalid taxes (Pol. Code, § 3804a).

While "may" is primarily and ordinarily permissive term and not peremptory, nevertheless, when rights of public or other persons are dependent upon exercise of power conferred, word "may" takes on mandatory form, and performance of act provided for is neither optional nor discretionary upon person designated and authorized to perform act.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "May," see Words and Phrases.]

Taxation ☞445.

Assessment of city's "patent right" to land conveyed by patent from federal government held not to include city's "possessory right" to the land (Pol. Code, §§ 3804a, 3650, subd. 10; Const. art. 13, § 1).

"Possessory right" was not included, since there existed no such thing, entity, or right to receive a patent, the patents having already been issued, and the patent right to the lands involved being the title to the fee; the word "patent," as used with reference to lands, being a conveyance from the government of United States to some person or persons, transferring the title from the government to such person or persons, in and to the thing itself.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

This cause is before us upon the appellant's appeal from the judgment of the trial court denying a writ of mandate in an action wherein the appellant sought the order of the court requiring the board of supervisors of Mono county to direct the cancellation of certain tax assessments, etc., under the provisions of section 3804a of the Political Code. The taxes referred to were levied for the years 1916-17 upon lands belonging to the appellant, situate in Mono county. The cause was originally begun in Mono county and transferred for trial to the county of Nevada.

The facts admitted by the pleadings and found by the court are, in substance, as follows: That on the first Monday in March, 1916, and prior thereto, the city of Los Angeles was the owner of certain lands in Mono county described in the petition and designated as "Long Valley Lands" and "River Channel Lands." The lands were acquired from the United States by purchase under the Acts of Congress approved April 24, 1820 (3 Stat. 566), and June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. 801), the latter act being entitled "An Act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell to the City of Los Angeles certain public lands" situate in the state of California. Prior to the approval of the act of June 30, 1906, to wit, on August 24, 1903, all of the lands described as "Long Valley Lands" and "River Channel Lands" were reserved and withdrawn from entry by the United States government, pursuant to an Act of Congress approved June 17, 1902 (32 Stat. 388). After the passage of the act approved June 30, 1906, to wit, on July 12, 1907, the Secretary of the Interior abandoned the Owens river project, in contemplation of which the lands herein referred to had been withdrawn from entry on August 24, 1903. While the lands were withdrawn from entry, the city of Los Angeles filed with the Register of the United States Land Office a map describing certain land sought to be acquired by the city under the provisions of section 4 of the Act of June 30, 1906. This map was approved by the Secretary of the Interior of the United States on the 21st day of August, 1911. Thereafter the appellant paid for the lands described the sum of $1.25 per acre, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $6,568.39. On the 9th day of December, 1912, the United States issued to the city of Los Angeles a patent conveying to it all of the lands described in the plaintiff's petition, designated as the "Long Valley Lands." This patent was recorded on March 28, 1912, in book "R," page 26, of the official real estate records of Mono county. On the 11th day of September, 1908, the city of Los Angeles, while the lands mentioned therein were withdrawn from entry, filed a map pursuant to the act of June 30, 1906, covering certain lands described in the appellant's petition and designated as "River Channel Lands." This map was approved by the Secretary of the Interior on the 6th day of January, 1912. Thereafter, the city paid for said lands at the rate of $1.25 per acre, aggregating the total sum of $10,085.89, and on the 24th day of January, 1913, the United States issued a patent to said lands conveying the same to the city of Los Angeles. This patent was recorded February 11, 1913, in book "R," real estate deeds, at page 35 of the official records of Mono county.

The record shows, and the court found, that for the fiscal year 1916-17 the assessor of Mono county assessed the "patent right" to lands described in paragraphs 3 and 4 of the appellant's petition, and levied certain taxes thereon; that on the 25th day of June, 1917, the "patent right" to said lands was sold to the state of California for nonpayment of $804.70 state and county taxes levied and assessed in Mono county for the year 1916-17; that on the 25th day of July, 1922, the county tax collector of Mono county made and executed a deed to the "patent right" to all said lands to the state of California. The court also found that on the 14th day of November, 1922, the appellant appeared before the board of Supervisors of Mono county and demanded that said board direct the county recorder to cancel all assessments on his record, on said property, and to direct the county recorder of the county of Mono to cancel any and all deeds to the state of California, covering the property described in the petition, in so far as said certificates or deeds, or any of them, relate to property patented in the United States of America to the city of Los Angeles. That at said time the board was convened and heard the written demand filed by the appellant. The court further found that the appellant did not offer or adduce any evidence, oral or documentary, at said hearing. The court also found that at said hearing James Borland, the county assessor of said county, appeared and was present before the board and opposed the cancellation of the taxes levied on said lands; that the said assessments and taxes levied were then and there in evidence before the board, and there was then and there before the board the evidence and presumption of law that said lands were subject to taxation and were not exempt from taxation. The court further found that the appellant again, on the 4th day of April, 1927, appeared before said board of supervisors and presented a petition for the cancellation of erroneous taxes, and to cancel a deed and direct the county recorder of Mono county to cancel the tax deed made the 28th day of July, 1922, covering the real estate known and described in the petition for mandate as the "Long Valley Lands" and "River Channel Lands," on the ground that said real estate was erroneously assessed for taxation for the year 1916, to the city of Los Angeles.

The court further found that the appellant, at said meeting of the board of supervisors, on November 14, 1922, or on April 4, 1927, or at all, presented no matter or thing except the respective demands; that at said meeting the board had evidence before it to show that said land was subject to taxation. The court further found that no legal evidence was offerred or submitted to said board at any time in support of petitioner's applications. Judgment was therefore entered denying the relief prayed for.

Three questions are really presented for consideration: First, were appellant's lands in Mono county exempt from taxes in the year 1916-17 under the provisions of section 1, article 13, of the state Constitution? Second, what, if anything, was included within the assessment designated as the "patent right" of the city of Los Angeles in and to the real estate described in the assessment? (This question is not presented in this form in the briefs filed by counsel, but is necessarily included.) And is such an assessment valid for any purpose. Third, was the city of Los Angeles required, in addition to making a written demand to the board of supervisors to cancel an erroneous assessment of taxes for the year 1916-17 against said lands, to make any additional proof other than the reference to the recorded patents? Exhibit A, being the first demand made by the city of Los Angeles, is in the following words and figures, to wit:

"Bridgeport, California, Nov. 14-1922

"To the Honorable Board of Supervisors of the County of Mono.

"Gentlemen:—The City of Los Angeles hereby respectfully demands that your honorable body direct the County Auditor to cancel all instruments on his records on the property hereinafter mentioned and that it also direct the Recorder of the County of Mono to cancel any and all certificates of sale to the State of California covering the property particularly described under the designation No. 4 in the addenda to the delinquent tax list of said County, issued on or about the fifth (5) day of June, 1922, (being the delinquent list for taxes levied in the year 1921), insofar as said certificates or deeds, or any of them, relate to property patented by the United States of America to said City of Los Angeles, by two certain patents recorded in Book 'R' of Real Estate Deeds at page 31 and in Book 'R' of Real Estate Deeds at page 26, records of said Mono County. That said demand is made upon the ground that the said property is, and at all times has been exempt from taxation under the provisions of section 1 of article XIII of the constitution of the State of California, and that the said instruments, certificates of sale and deeds shall be cancelled under the provisions of Section 3804a of the Political Code of the State of California.

"The City of Los Angeles

"By S. B. Robinson—

"Attorney for said City."

The second demand was in similar form, save and except it includes a description of the property by governmental subdivisions, referring more specifically to the fact that the "patent right" to said real estate, only, was assessed.

During the course of the trial the court admitted evidence of declarations of water rights upon the waters of Owens river and Owens lake, preceding the date of the withdrawal order by the Secretary of the Interior, as heretofore mentioned, and also certain deeds of conveyance. The court also admitted evidence showing that rights and interests of a promissory nature, in and to the waters of Owens river, and rights of way for ditches and canals over certain lands which were conveyed to the appellant, had been taxed by grantors of the appellant. These instruments were all admitted over the objection of the defendant. By reason of what we shall hereinafter state, as to whether the court was or was not in error in the admission of this evidence, a decision thereon is wholly immaterial. Among the deeds so introduced is one from Frederick Eaton to the city of Los Angeles, purporting to convey to the city a large tract of land, including some of the land involved in the assessment under consideration, and also all of the grantor's rights in and to certain waters and water rights therein mentioned, giving and granting to the appellant the right also to flood certain other lands belonging to the grantor. This deed bears date of December, 1905.

The record shows that, for the years 1905, 1906, and 1907, the grantors of the appellant paid taxes on said property or whatever interest they possessed therein. The record purports to be an assessment directly upon the land itself, and the certificate thereto leads to that conclusion. One of the certificates to the assessment roll reading as follows (omitting a portion thereof): "Do hereby certify that the foregoing is a full, true and correct description of the land assessed to the Rickey Land & Cattle Company, situate," etc. This land was transferred to Eaton, and by Eaton transferred to the city. Whether the lands referred to in the exhibits were assessed, or only the right to subsequently acquire a title thereto, is likewise immaterial, as shown by what is hereinafter set forth.

The Act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. 801), governing the acquisition of the lands involved in this proceeding, after specifying the procedure to be followed, set forth in section 3 thereof the following: "That the rights of way hereby granted shall not be effective over any land upon which homestead, mining, or other existing valid claims shall have been filed or made until the city of Los Angeles shall have procured proper relinquishments of all such entries and claims, or acquired title by due process of law and just compensation paid to said entry men or claimants and caused proper evidence of such fact to be filed with the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, however, 'That this Act shall not apply to any lands embraced in rights of way heretofore approved under any Act of Congress, nor affect the adjudication of any pending applications for rights of way by the owner or owners of existing water rights, and that no private right, title, interest, or claim of any person, persons, or corporation, in or to any of the lands traversed by or embraced in said right of way shall be interfered with or abridged, except with the consent of the owner or owners or claimant or claimants thereof, or by due process of law, and just compensation paid to such owner or claimant.'

Nothing has been set forth in the transcript showing the existence of any homestead or mining claim involved in this action. The deeds herein referred to would indicate that the city of Los Angeles has acquired certain water rights, easements, and rights of way. Whether they were valid or existing at the date of acquisition is not made to appear, and could not, of course, be decided in this proceeding.

In the case of Silver Lake Power & Irrigation Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 176 Cal. 96, 167 P. 697, 700, where the facts set forth in the opinion appear to be parallel with the facts involved in this action, it was held that, by the withdrawal order of the Secretary of the Interior, pursuant to the act of Congress, the rights of appropriators acquired prior to such withdrawal, were destroyed and not merely suspended. There the argument was made: "That the withdrawal orders were temporary orders; that they operated only to suspend and not to destroy the rights of the original appropriator, and that those rights were revived in all their fullness upon the formal vacation of the orders of withdrawal." The court said that this argument "loses all force in view of the congressional exercise of the power to which we have adverted. Congress, had it chosen to do so, without any order of withdrawal having been made by the executive department, could have granted the lands and rights to the City of Los Angeles, as in fact it did, during the existence of the orders of withdrawal. It may be conceded that to have done so would have been a harsh exercise of the power, but this concession can have no effect upon the legality of its exercise. So here the legal situation presented is, and this statement of it is made in the light most favorable to respondent, that before respondent's predecessors in interest had acquired any vested right in the lands against the United States, Congress, in the exercise of its supreme authority, made conveyance to the city of Los Angeles of the lands and of the waters in connection therewith for all the purposes for which they were designed to be used by the original appropriators. It must be held that these appropriators and all others upon the public domain act with the knowledge and under the peril to their ventures that this may be done. The property rights which they acquire while working and before those rights have become vested as against the government of the United States, are held, as it were, upon condition, in that they are liable to extinguishment at any time by an act of Congress directed to that end." As stated herein, no homestead rights and no mining claims are involved in this action, and the case to which we have referred shows that in fact other rights in the land did not exist.

[1] In Gottstein v. Adams, 202 Cal. 581, 262 P. 314, 315, the Supreme Court had before it the question involving taxation of public land, and, in holding that such land was untaxable, quoted from section 3 of the act admitting California into the Union (9 Stat. 452), as follows: "Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, that the said state of California is admitted into the Union upon the express condition that the people of said state, through their Legislature or otherwise, shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands within its limits, and shall pass no law and do no act whereby the title of the United States to, and right to dispose of, the same shall be impaired or questioned; and that they shall never lay any tax or assessment of any description whatsoever upon the public domain of the United States." The opinion in the Adams Case then proceeds to review sections 3617, 3820, 3821, 3824, and 3825 of the Political Code relative to the taxation of property, and really disposes of the contentions involved in this case by holding that, unless the procedure specified in taxing possessory rights referred to in the sections is followed, the tax is absolutely void. There can be no such procedure as an attempt to sell the land or what is called in this case a "patent right" to the land—whatever that may mean. In that case, just as in this, an attempt was made to fix the tax as a charge upon the land, the court saying: "It is clear from the uncontradicted record herein that the method provided by the foregoing sections of the Political Code was not followed * * * but that, instead of so doing, the assessor and tax collector of Imperial county undertook to treat the assessment and tax above referred to as a charge upon the land itself, and proceeded to declare such tax delinquent and to sell said land therefor to the state in 1919 and to the plaintiff herein in 1924, under the other provisions of the Political Code which relate to the sale of lands for a delinquent tax imposed thereon. They had no such power, and it therefore necessarily follows that the sale of the land and premises herein by this latter method was invalid, and hence that the deed of the plaintiff issued to him pursuant thereto was and is wholly void."

[2] In State Land Settlement Board v. Henderson, 197 Cal. 470, 241 P. 560, 565, an action similar to the instant case, where mandamus was sought to compel a county board of supervisors to cancel certain assessments, etc., the court held that, as the land belonged to the state, it was exempt from execution, and, with reference to presumptions applying to public lands ruled: "The rule that provisions exempting property from taxation are to be strictly construed has no application to this case. In Pasadena v. County of Los Angeles, 182 Cal. 171, 187 P. 418, speaking of the strict construction rule, it is said: 'That rule applies to exemptions of property held in private ownership. But, where the question is whether or not public property shall be taxed, the rule is that it is not to be taxed unless there is express authority therefor. An example of this is found in the decisions to the effect that property belonging to a city was not taxable under the Constitution of 1849, although there was no express exemption thereof in that Constitution. People v. Doe, 36 Cal. 220,' "

The authorities are so numerous that public lands are not taxable that citation is unnecessary. The opinion in the case of State Land Settlement Board v. Henderson, supra, effectually disposes of the presumption mentioned in the findings of the trial court and relied upon in entering judgment. There is, under the authorities, no presumption that public lands are taxable, and, as just shown the contrary is the rule.

The respondents base their contention upon such cases as Pasadena v. County of Los Angeles, 182 Cal. 172, 187 P. 418, wherein it is held that, "although government land is not taxable, yet possessory rights thereon and the improvements made for the convenience of such rights are subject to taxation, in view of subdivision 12, section 3650, of the Political Code." A number of cases are cited by respondent, but the one citation here only is necessary to set forth the law relative to taxing what is called "possessory rights."

Subdivision 10 of section 3650 of the Political Code reads as follows: "Taxable improvements owned by any person, firm, association, or corporation, located upon land exempt from taxation, shall as to the manner of assessment, be assessed as other real estate upon the assessment-book. No value shall however, be assessed against the exempt land, nor under any circumstances shall the land be charged with or become responsible for the assessment made against any taxable improvements located thereon." This section limits the right of action and prohibits the sale of the land under any of the sections providing the procedure for selling lands for delinquent taxes, and is directly in line with the holding in the case of Gottstein v. Adams, supra.

As heretofore stated, the court found that the petitioner did not offer or adduce any evidence, oral or documentary, at the hearing before the board of supervisors, upon its petitions for cancellation of the assessments, etc. However, the court did find and set forth, in finding No. 8, the following: "That at said hearing James Borland, the county assessor of said county, appeared and was present before the board and opposed the cancellation of the taxes levied on said lands. And the said assessments and tax levy were then and there in evidence before the board, and there was then and there before the board the evidence and presumption of law that said lands were subject to taxation and were not exempt from taxation." The law, as we have shown, is directly contrary to the presumption here relied upon by the court, and the finding of the court expressly shows that there was before the board the evidence constituting the assessments and tax levy asserted to be invalid. These records, together with the reference to the patents which were of record in the public official records of the county of Mono, established everything which we have been considering herein, and plainly indicated the character of the assessment and the attempt of the tax collector of Mono county to charge the lands with the assessment, contrary to the holding in the cases which we have cited, and also contrary to subdivision 10 of section 3650 of the Political Code.

[3] It is further argued that the board of supervisors of Mono county, nevertheless, had a discretion to deny the appellant's petition, by reason of the use of the word "may" in section 3804a of the Political Code. This contention, however, is untenable. In the case of County of Los Angeles v. State, 64 Cal. App. 290, 222 P. 153, this court considered somewhat at length the use of the word "may," and under what circumstances it would be held mandatory, and not merely permissive, and it was there held, quoting from the syllabus: "While the word 'may' is primarily and ordinarily a permissive term and not peremptory, nevertheless, when the rights of the public or of other persons—in this case the state of California—are dependent upon the exercise of the power conferred, the word 'may' takes on the mandatory form and the performance of the act provided for is neither optional nor discretionary upon the person or officer designated and authorized to perform the act."

A like question was again before this court in the case of Stockton, etc., v. Wheeler, 68 Cal. App. 592, 229 P. 1020, in which the case of County of Los Angeles v. State, supra, was followed and approved. In both cases a number of authorities sustaining the rule were cited. Thus, if a showing was made in this case of the invalidity of the assessment it was mandatory upon the board to act.

[4] The question still remains as to what property was attempted to be assessed. The assessment reads "patent right" to lands belonging to the appellant, being the lands described in the two patents to which we have referred. In this case the "patent right" cannot be read "possessory right." There existed no such thing, entity, or right to receive a patent. The patents had already been issued, and the "patent right" to the lands involved was the title to the fee. The word "patent" ordinarily refers to some invention and letters patent, the right to exclusive use granted by the government. The word "patent" is defined in 47 C. J. 1376 as follows: "As a noun, a grant of some privilege, property or authority made by the government or sovereign of the country, to one or more individuals." As used in relation to inventions, the words "patent right" indicate an exclusive ownership in the thing itself and its use. As used in the bankruptcy acts, it refers to the title of the bankrupt. As shown by the definitions of the words found in volume 6 of Words and Phrases, First Series, page 5233, it includes the title and the right in and to the thing itself. With reference to land, it is the conveyance from the government of the United States to some person or persons, transferring the title from the government to such person or persons, in and to the thing itself. In this case the two patents transferred the title to public lands from the government to the city of Los Angeles.

Under the cases which we have cited, and also under the terms of section 1 of article 13 of the state Constitution, such lands were not and are not subject to taxation.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to issue the writ of mandate as prayed for.

VON KESLER v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.
Civ. 7525.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Oct. 17, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 15, 1930.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court
Dec. 15, 1930.

1. Process ⇨120.

Nonresident, appearing before court merely as witness, may not be served with process in civil action.

2. Process ⇨119.

Nonresident plaintiff voluntarily appearing as party held not exempt from service of process in action for allegedly malicious attachment issued in original action.

Application by J. R. Von Kesler for a writ of prohibition prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Los Angeles, and others, to restrain proceedings in action after process served on alien suitor.

Writ denied.

Edmond Wheeler Pottle and Edward H. Estill, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Bicksler, Smith, Parke & Catlin, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J.

An action having been commenced in Los Angeles county by the petitioner, a resident of Illinois, he appeared in person to prosecute the same, whereupon he was served with process in an action filed against him by the defendant in the former suit. Petitioner's counsel, by a special appearance, moved to vacate such service upon the ground that he had appeared only as a party and witness, and that service upon a nonresident suitor or witness is void. Said motion was denied, and the present proceeding in prohibition is here presented, seeking to restrain further proceedings in the action last mentioned.

[1, 2] That a nonresident, appearing before the courts of any state merely as a witness, may not be subjected to service of process in a civil action, while in attendance only for that purpose, is the consensus of the authorities cited by both parties, and is not denied. As to whether or not one appearing voluntarily as a party may be so served, there is a conflict of authorities. These decisions are so numerous that they have been classified, respectively, under a "majority rule," that he is in the category of witnesses, and a "minority rule," to the contrary. However, in the instant case they are all of but little aid, since the suit which becomes the subject of present consideration arose out of, and in fact was engendered by, the institution of the first action by the petitioner herein against the plaintiff in the second action, wherein a writ of attachment was issued and levied upon the property of the latter, who, in turn, sued the petitioner for damages for an allegedly malicious attachment and obtained service of summons after the trial had commenced.

At a somewhat early date the validity of service under like circumstances was upheld in Maryland. Mullen v. Sanborn, 79 Md. 364, 29 A. 522, 523, 25 L. R. A. 721, 47 Am. St. Rep. 421. Disregarding, for obvious reasons, the rule exempting from service of process those who might be forced into the jurisdiction as witnesses or defendants, it was said: "Sound public policy, on the contrary, as well as the administration of equal justice, would seem to demand that no inducements should be held out to nonresident suitors to avail themselves of the harshest remedy known to our statutes; but if they should come, and should abuse the remedy, to the injury of an alleged debtor, let them answer here, as the residents of this state must do in like cases."

In Rizo v. Burrue, 23 Ariz. 137, 202 P. 234, 236, 19 A. L. R. 823, the Supreme Court of Arizona declined to hold exempt from service of a petition for adoption of a minor child a nonresident petitioner in habeas corpus proceedings seeking custody of the same minor. Upon an exhaustive review of authorities, the opinion on this point finishes as follows: "In Livengood v. Ball, 63 Okl. 93, L. R. A. 1917C, 905, 162 P. 768, it was held that nonresident plaintiffs who voluntarily brought an action in the courts of Oklahoma against a citizen thereof were not exempt from service of summons in an action by the defendants seeking relief connected with the subject of the litigation commenced by them. In Tiedemann v. Tiedemann, 35 Nev. 259, 129 P. 313, the court held that immunity from being sued could not be claimed by a nonresident 'when within the jurisdiction on matters affecting the same correlated subject-matter, and the action is brought in good faith and calls for the adjudication of substantial rights.'"

Following the cited cases, a plea in abatement was denied. We are neither cited to nor aware of any judicial expression calculated to question the right of a resident plaintiff to litigate with a nonresident, in a cross-action, issues created by such nonresident, in the same forum.

The petition for writ of prohibition is denied.

BARTLETT v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR MARIN COUNTY et al.
Civ. 7583.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

Oct. 4, 1930.

1. Habeas corpus ☞46.

Jurisdiction in habeas corpus is limited to persons in actual custody in county where superior court is sitting (Const. art. 6, § 5, as amended in 1911).

2. Prohibition ☞20.

Writ of prohibition would issue under circumstances, though petition did not allege petitioner first demanded that respondent court dismiss proceedings.

Petitioner had been cited to come from southern part of state and to produce his two minor daughters before the court in Marin county. The expense of making an appearance for purpose of attacking court's jurisdiction, in view of other circumstances, was sufficient excuse to pass rule requiring petitioner to first seek relief in court which it is sought to prohibit.

Petition by Clifford L. Bartlett against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Marin, Hon. Edward I. Butler, as Judge thereof, for writ of prohibition to prohibit respondent from hearing a proceeding in habeas corpus.

Writ issued.

Joseph Harris Brewer, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Carlos R. Freitas, of San Rafael, for respondents.

NOURSE, P. J.

This is an original application to prohibit the superior court, sitting in Marin county, from hearing a proceeding in habeas corpus directed to the petitioner at his home in Pasadena, Los Angeles county, to determine the custody of his two minor children who were living with him at the time in the latter county. Prohibition is sought on the theory that the superior court in Marin county is without jurisdiction to bring petitioner or the children from another county to answer before the court in Marin.

The jurisdiction of the superior court is found in section 5 of article 6 of the Constitution, which reads in part: "Said courts, and their judges, shall have power to issue writs of mandamus, certiorari, prohibition, quo warranto, and habeas corpus, on petition by or on behalf of any person in actual custody, in their respective counties." This is the wording of the section as amended in 1911 (see St. 1913, p. xxviii). The original section contained the same language but omitted the comma after the word "custody."

In passing on the question of jurisdiction in mandamus the Supreme Court, in Kings County v. Johnson, 104 Cal. 198, 203, 37 P. 870, held that the superior court, under this section, could issue a writ of mandamus to run out of the county. In so holding, the Supreme Court commented on the absence of a comma or other punctuation as indicating the intention not to limit the jurisdiction of the superior court in this respect.

The purpose of inserting the comma in the amendment of 1911 is not clear. It was not called to the attention of the voters in the literature submitting the proposal—the purpose of the amendment was to eliminate justices' courts from the section in conjunction with the amendment of the same character to section 1 of article 6 which was submitted to the electors at the same time.

[1] In the absence of authority interpreting the section as amended, we would be compelled to hold, on first impression, that the insertion of the comma would have the effect of making the clause "in their respective counties" modify all the writs mentioned in the sentence so that the jurisdiction of the superior courts would be limited to the issuance of these writs running only to persons and inferior tribunals within their respective counties. But the presence or absence of a comma does not change the meaning of the section in so far as writs of habeas corpus are concerned, as the clause "in their respective counties" modifies "habeas corpus" with or without a comma. As to these writs the court's jurisdiction is confined to those persons in actual custody in their respective counties. It is a matter of common knowledge that such has been the practice since the Constitution of 1849 was adopted. Furthermore, it is the only sound interpretation to be given the section. It is inconceivable that the electors would knowingly confer upon every judge of the fifty-eight counties the power to transport a citizen to a distant part of the state to show under what authority he is held in custody in another section. It is also inconceivable that this same power would have been conferred to summon a sheriff, or other peace officer, to a distant county to show by what authority he holds a prisoner in custody in his own county. We are satisfied, simply on the grounds of reason, that the jurisdiction in habeas corpus is limited to those persons in actual custody in the county where the superior court is sitting, though, of course, the process of the court in the exercise of this jurisdiction is statewide.

[2] Respondent raises the additional point that the writ of prohibition should not issue because the petition fails to allege that the petitioner first demanded that the respondent court dismiss the proceedings. True it is that, ordinarily, prohibition will not issue where no effort has been made to obtain the relief in the court which it is sought to prohibit. 25 Cal. Jur. p. 627. But here the force of the argument is lost by counsel's statement in open court that the respondent court intends to proceed with the hearing unless restrained by this court. Thus, to require the petitioner to seek relief there or to amend his petition to allege the futility of demand would merely delay these proceedings and would serve no purpose to any party concerned. The rule is not an arbitrary one, but, like the rule in mandamus, is relaxed when to insist upon it would be of no service. A better example for the nonapplication of the rule could not be found than in the case we have here. The petitioner has been cited to come from the southern part of the state and to produce his two minor daughters before the court in Marin county. The expense of making an appearance for the purpose of attacking the court's jurisdiction is a sufficient excuse for passing the rule in view of the other circumstances noted.

Let a peremptory writ issue as prayed.

BECKER et al. v. HENDRICKS et al.
Civ. 7584.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Oct. 24, 1930.

Appeal and error 479(1).

Where execution of judgment permitting inspection of corporate records was not stayed by appeal therefrom, corporation held entitled to supersedeas effecting stay (Code Civ. Proc. § 949).

Action by F. W. Becker and another against L. H. Hendricks and others, doing business as the Highboy Coaster Trust. From the judgment, defendants appeal. On application of defendants for writ of supersedeas prayed to be directed to the superior court of Los Angeles county, Thomas C. Gould, judge, to stay execution pending appeal.

Writ granted.

Howard F. Shepherd, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Samuel J. Crawford, of Ocean Park, for respondents.

WORKS, P. J.

Respondents brought two actions to quiet title to certain units or certificates of beneficial interest in appellant Highboy Coaster Trust, a common-law trust. Judgment was rendered in each of these actions and appeals were taken to the Supreme Court therefrom. These appeals are still pending. After the appeals were prosecuted respondents brought the proceeding in which this petition for the writ of supersedeas is presented. Judgment went therein for plaintiffs, and defendants appealed to this court. The writ of supersedeas is asked by appellants here in order that the fruits of their victory may be preserved in the event that they are successful upon the appeal.

The proceeding which is on appeal here is one for the writ of mandate requiring appellant Highboy Coaster Trust to submit its records to the inspection of respondents. The latter claim the right to inspect under the provisions of section 377 of the Civil Code, which are to the effect that the members or stockholders of a corporation are entitled to inspect its records.

The execution of the judgment from which an appeal has been taken to this court was not stayed by the appeal and the writ of supersedeas is necessary to effect such a stay. Code Civ. Proc. § 949. We think the issuance of the writ is requisite to the protection of appellants. Otherwise, if the judgment in the mandate proceeding shall be reversed, appellant Highboy Coaster Trust will have suffered an inspection of its records by those not entitled to such inspection.

In issuing the writ of supersedeas, we are not to be understood as deciding either that section 377 of the Civil Code does or does not apply to common-law trusts.

Let a writ of supersedeas issue, pending the appeal, undertaking thereunder to be in the sum of $1,000, to be approved by one of the justices of this court.

M. J. CONWAY, Plaintiff and Appellant, v. Edward W. FUNK, Defendant and Respondent.

Civ. 6155.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Oct. 21, 1930.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; G. S. Gans, Judge.

Caesar A. Roberts, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Charles W. Fowl and Edward W. Tuttle, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SCHMIDT, Justice pro tem.

Appellant brought suit against respondent, alleging that he (appellant) through the solicitation of respondent, had purchased certain stock in a corporation, and that respondent had orally guaranteed to repurchase the stock from appellant at any time that appellant might become dissatisfied with his purchase. In a second cause of action, an additional subsequent promise in writing to repay the sum is alleged. Appellant appeals to this court from the judgment in favor of respondent.

Appellant, in so far as his brief goes, apparently contends that the findings and judgment are not supported by the evidence, and yet fails to print in the record the findings and conclusions of the lower court. In fact, the notice to the clerk, specifying in detail the exact papers desired, fails to enumerate the findings.

Also appellant has not printed in his brief, as required by section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure, the portions of the record relied upon for a reversal.

Our examination of the transcript of the evidence shows sufficient evidence to support a finding in favor of respondent that there was not such an oral guaranty nor a subsequent promise in writing as claimed by appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Bills and notes ⇨358.

Antecedent debt constitutes valuable consideration, within protection of equitable doctrine of bona fide purchase, for transfer as security for pre-existing debt (Civ. Code, § 3106).

2. Contracts ⇨71(1).

Forbearance to sue, unaccompanied by agreement to forbear, is not in itself sufficient consideration, at least for executory promise.

3. Contracts ⇨50.

Statutory definition of value as applied to consideration for execution of negotiable instrument applies also in determining existence of consideration for contract of any sort (Civ. Code, § 3106).

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

On application for rehearing.

Application denied.

For former opinion, see 291 P. 684.

James C. Pfanstiel, of San Diego, for respondent

PER CURIAM.

Appellant asks our reconsideration of this case with respect to one point only, that is, whether respondent should be considered a holder for "value" of the securities pledged to it. In deciding it to be a holder for value we declined to follow the apparently contrary ruling in Fairmont C. Co. v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 33 Cal. App. 414, 418, 165 P. 553, in view of the language of section 3106, Civil Code, and of various decisions of the Supreme Court summarized in Smitton v. McCullough, 182 Cal. 530, 537, 538, 189 P. 686, 689.

It is true that in 2 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (3d Ed.) § 749, it is said that: "A conveyance of real or personal property as security for an antecedent debt does not, upon principle, render the transferee a bona fide purchaser, since the creditor parts with no value, surrenders no right, and places himself in no worse legal position than before." And that: "The rule has been settled, therefore, in very many of the states that such a transfer is not made upon a valuable consideration within the meaning of the doctrine of bona fide purchase."

The author says further, however, that: "In some states, on the contrary, even the securing of a preexisting debt is held to be a valuable consideration."

[1] It is with reference specifically to the passages above quoted from Prof. Pomeroy's work that the Supreme Court in the passage from Smitton v. McCullough, supra, quoted in our original opinion, said: "The law in this state on this question is well settled to the effect that not only does an antecedent indebtedness constitute a valuable consideration for a transfer in satisfaction and discharge of said indebtedness, but it is also a valuable consideration, within the protection of the equitable doctrine of bona fide purchase, for a transfer merely as security for a pre-existing debt." (Italics ours.)

[2] While, therefore, were the question a new one, it might be open to argument whether the rule to which preference is given in Prof. Pomeroy's text and which is followed in many decisions from other jurisdictions cited in the petition for rehearing ought not to prevail, we must hold that the law in this state is settled to the contrary. It is true that in California forbearance to sue on an obligation, unaccompanied by any agreement to forbear, is held not in itself to constitute a consideration, at least for an executory promise. But that is not the same thing as to hold that the original obligation is not consideration for a subsequent pledge made to secure it.

[3] Section 3106 of the Civil Code, cited in our original opinion, to the effect that an antecedent or pre-existing debt constitutes value, occurs, of course, in the title of the Code devoted to negotiable instruments. It is claimed that since a stock certificate is not a negotiable instrument the section has no application to this case. That the definition of value, however, as applied to the consideration for the execution of a negotiable instrument, applies also in determining whether there is consideration for a contract of another sort is, in Smitton v. McCullough, supra, explicitly held to have been established in this state since the decision in Frey v. Clifford, 44 Cal. 335, 342; as to which see, also, Fowles v. National Bank of California, 167 Cal. 653, 140 P. 271.

Appellant urges, further, that the doctrine that a pre-existing debt is a sufficient consideration for a contract of pledge, without any new consideration, has no application where the pledgor is a stranger to the debt, citing Bynum Mercantile Co. v. First National Bank of Anniston, 187 Ala. 281, 284, 65 So. 815, and Abraham v. First Bank of Cook County, 37 Ga. App. 220, 139 S. E. 583. It is not necessary for us to decide whether or not any such distinction exists in California, since in the instant case there is evidence in the record that Henry Schumann-Heink was himself a party to the making of the pledge. He, of course, was no stranger to the debt.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 22, 1930.
Hearing Denied by Supreme Court
Dec. 22, 1930.

1. Waters and water courses ⇨143.

Generally, quantity of water required for irrigation is question of fact governed largely by nature of soil, climatic conditions, and use.

2. Waters and water courses ⇨152(8).

Award of 33½ cubic feet of water per second to irrigate 542 acres of land held not excessive and wasteful under evidence.

Evidence tended to show that, because of nature of soil, surrounding conditions, and character of irrigation system, more water was required than amount which might suffice under other and ordinary circumstances.

3. Waters and water courses ⇨143.

Fact that irrigation system was primitive and wasteful held not to warrant court in disturbing water award as excessive and wasteful.

Irrigation system in use consisted of what is termed contour check or pondage system. Water was supplied to small areas throughout ranch, partially inclosed by artificial checks or miniature dikes of earth, into which inclosures water was furnished under pressure by means of pipe line through various valves.

4. Waters and water courses ⇨152(8).

In suit to quiet title to water rights, evidence held to support finding that defendant appropriated and used 33½ cubic feet of water per second continuously flowing upon his land.

Pipe line extending from canal to tract of land irrigated was supplied by means of several valves or outlets for purpose of distributing water to various fields or ponds. Evidence showed that valves were not all opened at same time but only when and where water was in present use. Measurement tables indicated variance in actual amount of water which flowed from valves on different occasions. Sometimes flow was less than 33½ cubic feet per second, and sometimes it exceeded that amount, but evidence showed that canal and pipe line actually diverted and carried the full 33½ cubic feet of water per second to which defendant claimed prescriptive title.

5. Waters and water courses ⇨137.

Actual constant distribution of entire maximum amount of water allowed for irrigation purposes need not necessarily be deposited on land.

6. Waters and water courses ⇨137.

Water, before claimant acquired prescriptive title, must have been actually, continuously, and beneficially used for statutory period of five years.

7. Waters and water courses ⇨152(10).

Finding that irrigation pipe line had designated capacity and for statutory period conveyed designated amount of water which was beneficially used for irrigation purposes held not in conflict with findings that such amount of water was not actually and continuously used for irrigation.

Evidence supported finding that it was necessary to maintain constant flow of 33½ cubic feet of water per second at head of pipe line during entire irrigation season in order to operate irrigation system, but full amount of 33½ cubic feet per second was not deposited on land. Such amount of water at head of irrigation system was necessary to prevent sucking of air into pipe and consequent collapse and to keep pipe clear of sediment and débris.

8. Waters and water courses ⇨152(12).

Quantity of water allowed for watering live stock and period during which allowed are questions of fact for trial court, determination of which may not be disturbed on appeal.

9. Appeal and error ⇨931(1).

Every reasonable construction of evidence presented should obtain with view to supporting judgment.

10. Waters and water courses ⇨152(8).

Allowance of 10.65 cubic feet of water per second throughout irrigation season for seepage and evaporation held not excessive under evidence.

Evidence showed that summers were hot, soil was porous, and water conveyed a great distance through open canal and ditches, and stood in ponds on somewhat rough and sloping fields.

11. Waters and water courses ⇨144½.

Appropriator, entitled to specific amount of water at certain place without regard to quality, cannot complain of mere means of transportation, so long as use is not restricted.

If, in interest of saving loss by percolation and evaporation incident to transporting water through open canal, party was permitted to deliver like amount in quality of water by means of pipe line, appropriators would not be injured, and could therefore not complain.

12. Waters and water courses ⇨144½.

Appropriator using water from river by means of canal for prescriptive period secures easement for conveyance of water in particular canal.

13. Waters and water courses ⇨156(4).

Provisions of deed held to reserve right to convey water through pipe line and ditches across premises conveyed.

Deed reserved to grantor and his wife only the right to use "the line of iron pipe now in use, together with the head-gates and ditches connected with it," so as to secure water wanted at all times.

14. Waters and water courses ⇨154(1).

Unless expressly conveyed by owner, prescriptive right to appropriate designated amount of water would remain as easement appurtenant to land.

15. Waters and water courses ⇨153.

Various instruments transferring and conveying land between original grantor and remote grantee held mere confirmation of water rights acquired by prescription, and not conveyance of additional water.

16. Waters and water courses ⇨144.

Appropriator cannot reserve water which is available for irrigation or domestic purposes without using it while claiming prescriptive or riparian rights to other water from same source for same purpose.

17. Waters and water courses ⇨127.

Prescriptive rights to water for irrigation purposes are based primarily upon necessity.

If one owns ample supply of water for all necessary purposes secured by deed or otherwise, he may not store it up and hold it in idle reserve while he resorts to another supply of water which he seeks to obtain by prescriptive use.

18. Waters and water courses ⇨152(6).

Presumption exists that court awarded to appropriators all water necessarily and beneficially used and acquired by prescription.

Consequently, appropriators may not quiet title to their prescriptive use of water and in same action assert conflicting title by deed to further quantity to be used for same purpose.

19. Waters and water courses ⇨127.

Title to adequate water for irrigation purposes by deed will defeat claim of prescriptive title for same purpose.

20. Waters and water courses ⇨47.

Appropriators may not claim riparian title to water for irrigation purposes taken from one river to be used upon lands adjoining another river.

Water to which appropriators claimed title was taken from Tule river and conveyed across swamp lands through canal five miles long penetrating ridge between rivers, and carrying water into different watershed for use in irrigating land riparian only to Pit river.

21. Waters and water courses ⇨40.

Riparian rights to water for benefit of adjoining properties exist independently of any claim of owner.

Riparian rights are acquired as common-law appurtenance to land or as a part and parcel of the soil itself. Such rights are separate and distinct from prescriptive or contractual rights to water.

22. Waters and water courses ⇨130.

Riparian owner may acquire prescriptive title to water distinct from or in addition to normal riparian rights.

23. Waters and water courses ⇨127.

Acquisition of prescriptive rights to water from stream arising from use, without owner's objection for statutory period, may defeat owner's riparian right.

24. Waters and water courses ⇨144.

Appropriator of water for irrigation purposes obtains title to extent only of use of water for beneficial purposes.

Under law of appropriation, the right to use of water lasts only so long and is effective only to such extent as actual use is exercised.

25. Waters and water courses ⇨48.

Riparian rights are appurtenant to land and not waived by failure to use them.

26. Waters and water courses ⇨47.

Riparian rights may not be transferred to injury of another riparian owner for use of nonriparian lands remote from stream upon which they depend.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Action by the Mt. Shasta Power Corporation against Roderick McArthur and another.

From the judgment rendered, both plaintiff and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Wm. B. Bosley and Jones & Dall, all of San Francisco, Chenoweth & Leininger, of Redding, and Athearn, Chandler & Farmer and Frank R. Devlin, all of San Francisco, for plaintiff.

Jesse W. Carter, of Redding, and Annette Abbott Adams, of San Francisco, for defendants.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

From a decree apportioning and quieting title in the respective parties to a quantity of river water for irrigation and power purposes, each party has appealed.

This action involves both prescriptive and riparian rights to the waters of Pit, Fall, and Tule rivers, acquired for power purposes and for the benefit of lands adjacent to the confluence of these nonnavigable streams.

The Pit river, which has its source in Goose lake in northeastern California, flows in a southwesterly direction to its confluence with Fall river at a point north of Redding in Shasta county. Fall river rises in Siskiyou county and flows southeasterly to join the Pit river. Tule river rises in Trout lake, Shasta county, flowing southerly through a flat tule country, emptying into Fall river several miles north of its junction with Pit river. The village of Fall River Mills is situated at the confluence of Fall and Pit rivers.

The plaintiff is engaged in the enterprise of producing and marketing hydroelectric power for use as heat and light. For this purpose it acquired and owns large tracts of lands adjacent to the Pit and Fall rivers above the confluence thereof. Included in the plaintiff's holdings are numerous tracts of lands consisting of about 14,000 acres, previously owned by Scott McArthur, a former party defendant in this suit, from whom title was acquired subsequent to the commencement of this action. The cause against him was then dismissed. After procuring from the California Railroad Commission a finding of public necessity therefor, the plaintiff constructed and thereafter maintained at a point a short distance above Manning Falls on the Fall river, which location is a few miles above the junction of Pit and Fall rivers, a hydroelectric power plant consisting of buildings and machinery, a diverting dam, canal, tunnels, surge-chamber and waterway, penstock, and apparatus. The carrying capacity of the canal, tunnel, and penstock was 1,800 cubic feet of water per second, which is in excess of the entire normal flow of Fall river.

John A. McArthur, who was the father of the defendants and of their brother Scott, settled upon the banks of Pit river as early as 1875. He thereafter acquired all of the lands owned by the defendants which are involved in this suit and which border on Pit, Fall and Tule rivers. The home ranch was located on the south bank of Pit river 2 miles above its confluence with Fall river. In the course of twenty years John McArthur constructed some 16 miles of dikes along the borders of Tule river and Trout lake, together with many miles of canals and ditches, by means of which several thousand acres of swamp land intervening between Pit and Tule rivers were drained and reclaimed. The main canal was 40 feet wide and 18 feet in depth extending for a distance of 4 miles from the north bank of Pit river opposite the McArthur home place in a northwestern direction to Tule river. This canal severed the divide which separated the Pit river watershed from the Fall river watershed. After draining and reclaiming this vast tule tract, John McArthur irrigated it by means of a dam across Fall river at Manning Falls, thus backing up the water of Fall river until it flowed into the canal and ditches through gates and supplied a considerable portion of the tract. In this manner he used to advantage much of this tule land for grazing purposes. Subsequently he extended the use of the 40-foot canal above mentioned by impounding the water on the north bank of Pit river and conveying it across the stream by means of a pipe line. In this manner he irrigated 542 acres of the home place on the south side of the river.

January 18, 1902, John McArthur posted notices therefor and appropriated 100,000 inches of water from Fall river, measured under a 4-inch pressure, to be used for power, domestic, and irrigation purposes on his lands in townships 37 and 38, north of ranges 4, 5, and 6 east, M. D. M., to be diverted by means of gates and dams at Manning Falls. January 21, 1902, he further appropriated in the same manner from Tule river 80,000 inches of water for use on his lands in section 16, township 37, north of range 5 east, M. D. M., to be diverted and transported to the land through the 40-foot canal above mentioned. A quantity of water was adversely used in this manner for more than five years, and title was thus acquired.

In 1906, John McArthur organized a family corporation, 500 shares of which were issued and distributed among his sons and daughters. All of his agricultural lands and water rights were conveyed to this corporation, with the exception of the home place. In 1908 he died, leaving the home ranch to his wife Catherine. She died in 1917. The children inherited the home place in equal shares. In 1919 the corporation was dissolved and the assets were distributed to the children pursuant to a written agreement which was duly executed by all of the shareholders of the corporation. By means of deeds of conveyance from the several children, the defendant Luther McArthur became sole owner of the home place. Scott McArthur became the sole owner of the swamp lands, which, on December 11, 1924, he conveyed to the plaintiff.

September 24, 1919, Scott and Anna McArthur executed a quitclaim deed to the defendant Roderick McArthur, to "the right to use all the water which flows through a thirty-inch pipe, under a four-foot pressure, from that certain ditch or canal beginning at the diversion gates in the Tule river." October 30, 1919, the same grantors executed a similar quitclaim deed to Frank, Luther, Roderick, Anna McArthur, and Victoria Cadwallader for the use of a like quantity of water, from the same source. The language conveying this water is identical with that of the previous deed. November 6, 1920, Scott and Anna McArthur executed to Luther McArthur a similar quitclaim deed to the use of a like amount of water from the same source. The trial court held that these quitclaim deeds merely confirmed water rights previously acquired by the respective grantees, and conferred no title to additional water. From that portion of the judgment which is based upon this finding, the defendants have appealed.

The court found that the respective defendants had acquired prescriptive title by adverse use to the several allotments of water hereinafter specified, to be taken from Tule river and measured at the diverting point therefrom. The plaintiff has appealed from that portion of the judgment, and seeks a reversal on the grounds that each separate allotment is excessive and is unsupported by the evidence. These awards are as follows:

To Roderick McArthur the court allowed 21 cubic feet of water per second for 48 hours of each period of ten days from March 15th to October 15th of each year for the purpose of irrigating 63 acres of land adjacent to Pit river; also 2 additional cubic feet of water per second flowing continuously night and day throughout the year for the purpose of irrigating six acres of land and for fire protection of the buildings situated in the town of McArthur on the south bank of Pit river; also 10 additional cubic feet of water per second flowing continuously throughout the year for the purpose of operating a power plant for generating heat and light and for a pumping plant.

To Luther McArthur the court allowed 33½ cubic feet of water per second flowing continuously from March 15th to October 15th of each year for the purpose of irrigating 542 acres of land, constituting the home place, which is situated on the south side of the Pit river; also 10 additional cubic feet of water per second flowing continuously from October 15th to March 15th of each year for the purpose of watering stock.

To Roderick and Luther McArthur jointly the court allowed 10.65 additional cubic feet of water per second flowing continuously from March 15th to October 15th of each year, on account of the loss of water by seepage and evaporation in transporting it from Tule river through the McArthur canal for the foregoing purposes.

The court then found that the plaintiff was the owner of the power plant and lands described in the complaint together with the tule lands which were acquired from Scott McArthur, and that it was entitled to a continuation of the natural flow of the waters of Tule river into Fall river, and to appropriate, divert, and use all of the water of Fall river for irrigating its lands and operating its power plant, subject to the defendants' title to the foregoing allotments of water to them for the purposes mentioned and subject to any rights to water beneficially acquired by other upper riparian owners of land, provided that "all water used by the plaintiff in the operation of its power plant shall be returned to the Pit river before it leaves the properties of the plaintiff."

The plaintiff asserts that the award to the defendant Luther McArthur of 33½ cubic feet of water per second from March 15th to October 15th of each year to irrigate 542 acres of land is excessive, wasteful, and unsupported by the evidence; that that quantity of water does not appear to have been actually, necessarily, and beneficially used continuously during the statutory period of the years which is necessary to confer prescriptive title thereto; that the findings of the court are in irreconcilable conflict with respect to the continuous use of that quantity of water.

[1] Respecting the duty, as that term is technically used, or the quantity of water which is necessarily required for irrigating agricultural land, it ordinarily becomes a question of fact to be determined by the trial court, within an exercise of sound reason, which is governed largely by the nature of the soil, climatic conditions, and circumstances surrounding the tract involved and the use to which it is applied. In the case of Joerger v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., 207 Cal. 8, 276 P. 1017, 1024, it is said:

"In this state there is no statute which definitely regulates the duty or amount of water reasonably necessary for irrigation. This being so, the question becomes one of fact for the court, in a given case, to determine upon the evidence presented to it. The question of what quantum of water is reasonably required for irrigation is necessarily a complicated one, depending, as it does, upon many different conditions. * * * There can be no question, therefore, that an acquired right in waters is limited to the amount that is reasonably necessary for the beneficial purpose for which it is diverted, and no title can be acquired to that part of a diversion which is excessive of such needs. In so far as the diversion exceeds such reasonably necessary amount, it is contrary to the policy of the law, and is a taking without right, and confers no title, no matter for how long continued. * * * Defendants assert that * * * no decree has ever been upheld awarding more than one miner's inch per acre. This may be true, and yet such circumstance is not controlling, for this court cannot fix a limit beyond which a trial court may or may not go, or say, as a matter of law, that the amount allowed is excessive, irrespective of the evidence. As above stated, the amount of water necessary for beneficial use is a question of fact in each particular case."

[2] The foregoing language is peculiarly applicable to the present case. It seems to answer the plaintiff's contention that 33½ cubic feet of water per second which was awarded the defendant Luther McArthur is excessive or wasteful. These were questions of fact for the determination of the trial court. Moreover, there is evidence to support the defendants' claim that the nature of the soil, the surrounding conditions, and the character of their irrigation system required more water than an amount which might suffice under other and ordinary circumstances.

[3] There is evidence to support the finding of the court that "the climate in that part of California where defendants' lands are situated is very dry and the annual rainfall is very slight." The soil is porous. The surface of the land is somewhat rough, sloping, and irregular. The irrigation system which was in use consisted of what is termed the contour check or pondage system. The water is supplied to small areas throughout the ranch partially inclosed by artificial checks or miniature dikes of earth, into which inclosures the water is furnished under pressure by means of a pipe line through various valves. This irrigation system may be primitive and wasteful as compared with more modern methods of irrigating. The judgment, however, may not be disturbed on that account. The Joerger Case, supra, also settles this controversy. It is there said:

"Nor is there merit in the claim that the method employed by plaintiff in diverting the water is unauthorized. * * * The ground is hilly and porous, marked by numerous depressions, and is irrigated by turning the water upon the ground and permitting it to run over the slopes. This is the character of system commonly used in the vicinity. There is no authority which requires an appropriator of water to change his system of irrigation so that others may perhaps be benefited thereby, assuming that the method may produce some waste."

[4] The plaintiff contends there is a lack of evidence to support the finding of the court to the effect that Luther McArthur had appropriated and used 33½ cubic feet of water per second continuously flowing through the canal and over and upon the 542-acre tract of land, and that this finding is in irreconcilable conflict with a subsequent finding of the court that "in the operation of said irrigation system in the manner herein specified the entire flow of 33½ cubic feet per second is not in use continuously in the irrigation of said land, but it is necessary to maintain a constant flow of 33½ cubic feet per second of water at the head of said pipe line. * * *"

Both expert and nonexpert witnesses were called by the respective parties. The pipe line extending from the canal across the Pit river over and upon this 542-acre tract is supplied by means of six several valves or outlets along its course for the purpose of distributing the water to the various fields or ponds. These valves were not all opened at the same time, but only when and where the water was in present use. Elaborate tables of the result of actual measurements of water from these several valves appear in evidence. These measurements were taken once a day over a period of time. These tables indicate a variance in the actual amount of water which flowed from the valves on different occasions. Sometimes the flow was less than 33½ cubic feet per second, and sometimes it exceeded that amount slightly. The figures and testimony, however, indicate that the canal and pipe line actually diverted from the Tule river and carried the full 33½ cubic feet of water per second to which the defendant Luther McArthur claims prescriptive title and which amount was awarded to him. It would be arduous and useless to extend this opinion by the quotation of evidence to the unwarranted length necessary to prove this conclusion. The record consists of 2,500 pages of evidence. It is sufficient to say there appears to be substantial evidence to support this conclusion.

[5-7] Nor do we think the finding to the effect that the pipe line has a capacity and for five consecutive years has conveyed to the 542-acre tract 33½ cubic feet of water per second, which has been necessarily and beneficially used thereon for irrigation purposes, is in conflict with the subsequent finding that that amount of water "is not in use continuously in the (actual) irrigation of said land." The court further found in this regard, and there is substantial evidence to support the finding, that "it is necessary to maintain a constant flow of 33½ cubic feet per second of water at the head of said pipe line during the entire irrigation season * * *" in order to operate the irrigation system so as to obtain that specified amount at any of the valves along the pipe line when water was required, to prevent the sucking of air in the pipes and the consequent collapse thereof, and to keep the pipes clear of sediment and débris. The actual constant distribution of the entire maximum amount of water allowed is not necessarily required to be deposited on the land. It is necessary that the entire amount allowed shall have been actually continuously and beneficially used by the claimant for the statutory period of five years in order to acquire prescriptive title thereto. Witherill v. Brehm, 74 Cal. App. 286, 302, 240 P. 529. But if the water is so used as a necessary incident to the irrigation of the land, it sufficiently fulfills the requirements of law above quoted. It follows that, if the 33½ cubic feet of water has been necessarily used to maintain a head adequate to distribute a less quantity of water for necessary and beneficial use along the pipe line, which is furnished with various valves to supply different fields in the tract of land, it fulfills the mandate of law even though a much less quantity ultimately reaches the soil in the process of irrigation.

Thirty-three and a half cubic feet of water per second seems to be a liberal allowance for the irrigation of 542 acres of land under ordinary conditions. Irrigation devices more modern than the primitive systems which were used in the pioneer days of California may eventually become necessary to supply a growing population and an increased demand for water, to prevent unnecessary waste, and to conserve an economical use thereof. The latest expression of the Supreme Court, however, which is found in the Joerger Case, supra, indicates that time has not yet arrived. No absolute limitation with respect to the duty required in the use of water for irrigation and domestic purposes is fixed by legislative enactment or the decisions of our courts. No special method of irrigation is required. No particular device or system is prescribed. These features with relation to water litigation are deemed to be questions of fact for the reasonable determination of the trial court.

[8] Ten additional cubic feet of water per second were awarded to Luther McArthur for watering stock on the home place from October 15 to March 15 of each year, during which period of time no water was allowed for irrigation purposes. We are of the opinion there is substantial evidence to support this allowance.

The evidence indicates that Luther McArthur kept from 400 to 1,200 head of stock. This allowance of water was to be taken from the point of the Tule river diversion. It is conveyed through the open canal a distance of five miles, thence through the pipe line for more than 3,000 feet, and by means of an open hillside ditch some two miles further. The tule land soil through which the canal ran was permeated with alkali. There was a considerable loss of water in transportation. A steady stream of water through the pipe line and open ditch may be necessary to purify the water and to prevent it from freezing in the pipes during the winter season. Although the season is variable during which freezing weather prevails, and the herd is not uniform as to the exact number of cattle with which it is comprised, still, under the circumstances of this case, both the quantity of water and the period during which it is allowed are questions of fact, the determination of which may not be disturbed on appeal.

The court found that 21 cubic feet of water per second flowing for forty-eight hours during each ten-day period from March 15 to October 15 of each year had been appropriated and used by Roderick McArthur to irrigate 63 acres of land bordering on the north bank of the Pit river opposite the home ranch; that he had acquired in a similar way 10 additional cubic feet of water per second flowing continuously throughout the year to operate a hydroelectric generating plant and to maintain a pumping plant by means of which he conveyed 2 additional cubic feet of water per second flowing continuously the year round through a pipe line to irrigate 6 other acres of land in a field remote from the 63-acre tract. But it was further found that the 10 cubic feet of water per second used to operate the power plant was subsequently wasted by discharging it into Pit river, and that it must be saved and contributed toward the amount of water which is allowed to irrigate the 63-acre tract. These several amounts of water were accordingly awarded to Roderick McArthur for the purposes mentioned. We are unable to say any of these awards are excessive as a matter of law. For the same reasons previously assigned with respect to the allotment of water to Luther McArthur, we are impelled to affirm these several allowances to Roderick. A method of contour check or pondage system of irrigating these last-mentioned tracts was maintained similar to that which was used on the 542-acre home ranch. The climatic conditions and the character of the soil were the same with respect to all the land involved.

[9] Discrepancies exist between the figures supplied by the plaintiff and those of the defendants regarding the measurement of the water which was actually consumed. Every reasonable construction of the evidence adduced, however, should obtain with a view to supporting the judgment. We think the evidence is adequate to sustain these allowances.

[10] A further award to Luther and Roderick jointly of 10.65 cubic feet of water per second throughout the irrigation season from March 15 to October 15 of each year on account of seepage and evaporation is also challenged by the plaintiff. The summers are hot, the soil is porous, and the water is conveyed a great distance through an open canal and ditches. It stands in ponds on somewhat rough and sloping fields. We are of the opinion this allowance was therefore not excessive. Kinney on Irrigation and Water Rights (2d Ed.) p. 1601.

[11, 12] Finally the plaintiff contends the measurements for the allowance of water to the defendants should have been effective at the end of the canal where it reaches the bank of Pit river, and not at the point of the Tule river diversion. It is asserted this canal across the tule land, the entrance to which was fixed by the court as the point of diversion of the waters to which the defendants are entitled, was constructed for the purpose of draining and reclaiming the swamp land, and that the defendants may not complain so long as they obtain the full amount of water to which they are entitled. In support of this assertion, the plaintiff relies upon the case of Wiggins v. Muscupiabe L. & W. Co., 113 Cal. 182, 195, 45 P. 160, 164, 32 L. R. A. 667, 54 Am. St. Rep. 337, where it is said:

"The plaintiff could under no circumstances be entitled to the use of more water than would reach his land by the natural flow of the stream, and, if he receives this flow upon his land, it is immaterial to him whether it is received by means of the natural course of the stream, or by artificial means."

In the case last cited only the quantity of the water which was necessary for irrigation purposes was involved. It is undoubtedly true that, when one is entitled to a specified amount of water at a certain place without regard to its quality, he may not complain of the mere means of transportation so long as his enjoyment of the use of the water for the purposes for which its title was acquired is not restricted. In the present case, however, one of the essential purposes for which the defendants used the water was to water their stock. It was claimed by the defendants the water of Tule river was purer and more suitable for watering stock than that which came from Trout Lake, Mud Lake, or the swamp water from the numerous lateral tule ditches in the vicinity.

By appropriating and using water from Tule river by means of the McArthur canal for the prescriptive length of time, the defendants not only acquired title to the water, but they also secured an easement for the conveyance of the water in that particular canal. If the same quality and quantity of water as that to which the defendants acquired title were delivered at their pipe line at the times and in a manner which would not disturb their prescriptive use of it, they could not complain. If, in the interest of saving the loss by percolation and evaporation incident to transporting the water 5 miles through the open canal, the plaintiff was permitted to deliver a like amount and quality of water by means of pipe lines, the defendants would not be injured and could not complain. The mere substitution of the means of conveyance of the water from Tule river to the defendants' properties was not an issue in this case. We are therefore of the opinion there was no error in finding that the defendants were entitled to their specific awards of water to be taken from the Tule river diversion at the mouth of the McArthur canal and transported through this canal to their properties, together with an easement in this canal, with the privilege of repairing and maintaining it in the same condition in which it existed during the time they acquired prescriptive title thereto.

This disposes of the plaintiff's appeal. We will now consider the defendants' appeal.

The defendants claim to have acquired by deeds of conveyance from John McArthur an amount of water in addition to the allotments obtained by prescription and awarded to them in this action. The court construed the language of these instruments affecting the water rights to constitute a mere confirmation of their prescriptive title thereto, and found that these deeds conveyed to them no additional water. From this portion of the judgment the defendants have appealed.

The language of these instruments which requires construction with respect to the water rights will be hereafter quoted. January 12, 1906, John McArthur conveyed all of his land north of Pit river to the family corporation. In this deed he reserved to himself and wife certain privileges appertaining to the enjoyment of water rights for the benefit of the home place south of the river in the following language: " * * * Save and except the right of John McArthur or Catherine McArthur, their heirs or assigns, to use at all times free of charge for the purpose of irrigating the lands which they or either of them own or may own lying on the south bank of Pit river, or for any other purpose for which it may be wanted on those lands or any other lands, the line of iron pipe now in use, together with the headgates and ditches connected with it, and the right to repair and maintain the said line of iron water pipe so as to secure the water wanted at all times. Said iron water pipe commences on the northwest quarter of the northeast quarter of section sixteen in township thirty-seven, north of range five east, M. D. M."

In deeding the home place to his wife in September of the following year, John McArthur conveyed to her all of the water rights appurtenant to the land which he possessed, in the following language: " * * * Also water rights connected with said lands, including all of an iron water pipe line commencing on the northwest quarter of the northeast quarter of section sixteen in township thirty-seven, north of range five east, M. D. M., and running southeast, together with the right to use all headgates and ditches connected with said iron water pipe line in supplying said iron water pipe line with water and the right to maintain and repair same when necessary."

Catherine McArthur died in 1917. Her estate was distributed in equal one-sixth shares to her children. Luther McArthur subsequently acquired the entire interest in the home place. The water rights appurtenant to this home place were described in the decree of distribution which was entered in the Catherine McArthur estate in the exact language of the deed from John McArthur to his wife, as above quoted, except that the following sentence was omitted from the decree of distribution, to wit: "In supplying said iron water pipe line with water." This omission is immaterial.

In conveying his one-sixth interest in the home place to Roderick McArthur in April, 1918, his brother Scott employed the precise language affecting the water rights which was used in the decree of distribution.

In their several separate deeds of conveyance of their respective one-sixth interests in the home place, which instruments were executed in February, March, June, and July, 1920, the heirs, Roderick, Anna, Luther, and Frank McArthur, and Victoria Cadwallader, in referring to their water rights in the premises, employed the following language: "Also an undivided one-third interest in and to the right to use all the water which flows through a thirty (30) inch pipe, under a four (4) foot pressure, from that certain ditch or canal beginning at the diversion gates in the Tule river * * * (describing the land through which the McArthur canal extends), together with the right to have said water conducted through the above described ditch and the right of access to and over and along the said ditch from the point where said water is taken from said ditch in said pipe in said section sixteen through the sections aforementioned to the said diversion gates in the said Tule river, with the right to keep said ditch in repair if the party of the second part so elect; it being the intention herein simply to convey the amount of water herein described measured through said pipe, and the right to have the water conducted as aforementioned, and it is not intended to convey any rights in the lands aforementioned except the right of access along the said ditch for the purpose of necessary repairs to the same. Also all water rights connected with said lands."

[13,14] A reasonable construction of the language of the original deed of conveyance from John McArthur to the McArthur family corporation indicates that the grantor did not purport to specifically reserve for the use of the home place south of Pit river any water whatever. He evidently assumed that was unnecessary since the home place was not conveyed.

The language of that instrument is unambiguous. It reserves to the grantor and his wife only "the right * * * to use * * * the line of iron pipe now in use, together with the headgates and ditches connected with it * * * so as to secure the water wanted at all times." This language seems to clearly infer that the grantor intended to reserve the use of the line of iron pipe, together with the headgates and ditches connected therewith, as a means of conveyance of the water to which he was entitled by prescription, from Tule river to the home place. This is the meaning of the preceding language employed in the same reservation, as follows: "* * * Save and except the right * * * to use * * * for the purpose of irrigating the lands which they * * * own * * * the line of iron pipe now in use, together with the headgates and ditches connected with it. * * *" From this reservation of the pipe line and ditches which were located chiefly on the land he was conveying, without specifically mentioning the water, it seems apparent the grantor recognized the fact that certain prescriptive water rights existed appurtenant to the home place. He specifically provided, by means of this reservation, that his right to convey this water belonging to the home place through the pipe line and ditches across the premises which were deeded should not be disturbed. The court found that 542 acres of the home place were entitled to 33½ cubic feet of water per second which were acquired by prescription. This water supplied the needs of the home place for many years. It flowed from Tule river through ditches and a pipe line. Unless expressly conveyed by the owner, it would remain as an easement which is appurtenant to the land. Farmer v. Ukiah Water Co., 56 Cal. 11; Clyne v. Benicia Water Co., 100 Cal. 310, 34 P. 714; Stanislaus Water Co. v. Bachman, 152 Cal. 716, 724, 93 P. 858, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 359; Franscioni v. Soledad L. & W. Co., 170 Cal. 221, 149 P. 161; 25 Cal. Jur. 1030, § 30.

[15] In subsequently deeding this home place to his wife, John McArthur does specifically convey all "water rights connected with said lands," together with the right to use the pipe line, ditches, and headgates. The same language was used in the decree of distribution in conveying the water rights of this home place to the heirs. Scott McArthur used this exact language in subsequently conveying his interest in this home place to Roderick. In none of these instruments is any specific amount of water or character of title thereto indicated. There is no suggestion that the grantors are purporting to convey an interest in water acquired by deed as distinguished from prescriptive title thereto. Upon the contrary, it seems apparent that all parties interested in these various conveyances assumed that the respective tracts of land were entitled to certain allotments of water which had been acquired by prescriptive use for necessary and beneficial purposes.

[16-19] This leaves only the language of the deeds of conveyance from the remaining heirs to Luther McArthur to be considered. The language respecting the water rights which is employed in these deeds is more explicit in describing the quantity of water sought to be conveyed. These heirs could convey no more water or title different in character from that which they possessed. There is no satisfactory evidence that any of them ever held title to an interest in water rights which were acquired by purchase, devise, or otherwise, except such prescriptive rights as were awarded to them in this proceeding. There is no evidence from which we may reasonably infer that the defendants were possessed of any other water rights. If such rights had been acquired by appropriation, they seem to have been waived and abandoned by nonuser, except as to the portion thereof which was awarded to them. A careful examination of these instruments of conveyance and a reading of the record convinces one that the grantors were attempting to preserve their respective titles to their prescriptive rights to use the water of Tule river for the benefit of their land bordering on Pit river. Reference is made to the headgates, ditches, and pipe line which for many years was the sole method of conveying the water from Tule river across the swamp lands to their properties on Pit river. The description and capacity of the pipe line referred to in the deeds indicate that they allude to the identical means of enjoying the very prescriptive rights to the same water which was awarded to the defendants in this action. There was no other 30-inch pipe line in use. All the natural and reasonable inferences from the record support the court's findings to the effect that these deeds merely confirm or preserve for the use of the defendants the very prescriptive rights to water which were awarded to them in this action. The theory of the defendants that they possessed title to a quantity of water procured by means of deeds of conveyance which is distinct from the prescriptive rights awarded to them in this action seems inconsistent. The law will not permit one to hold in reserve a quantity of water acquired by purchase or deed or otherwise which is available for irrigation or domestic purposes, and put it to no use whatever while the same owner claims prescriptive or riparian rights to other water secured from the same source for the purpose of irrigating the identical premises.

Prescriptive rights to water are based primarily upon necessity. If one owns an ample supply of water for all necessary purposes procured by deed or otherwise, it follows that he may not store it up and hold it in idle reserve while he resorts to another supply of water which he seeks to obtain by prescriptive use. We must presume that the court awarded to the defendants all the water necessarily and beneficially used upon their respective properties which they acquired by prescription. If this be true, the defendants may not quiet title to their prescriptive use of water and in the same action assert a conflicting title by deed to a further quantity of water to be used for the same purpose. These claims are utterly antagonistic. The title to an adequate supply of water by deed will defeat the claim of prescriptive rights to water to be used on the same land for the same purpose.

[20] Nor may the defendants claim riparian title to water taken from Tule river to be used upon their lands adjoining Pit river. The lands for the use of which the water involved in this action was claimed are riparian to Pit river and not adjacent to Tule river. These rivers occupy different watersheds. A divide separates them. The water to which the defendants claim title was taken from Tule river and conveyed across the swamp lands through a canal which is five miles in length and which penetrates the ridge and carries the water into a different shed for use in irrigating land riparian only to Pit river. Under such circumstances, riparian rights to water from Tule river may not be claimed for the purpose of irrigating land which borders on Pit river.

[21-23] Riparian rights to water for the benefit of property adjoining a stream exist independently of any claim of the owner. Perry v. Calkins, 159 Cal. 175, 113 P. 136. Riparian rights are acquired as a common-law appurtenance to the land, or as a part and parcel of the soil itself. Such rights are separate and distinct from prescriptive or contractual rights to water. San Bernardino v. Riverside, 186 Cal. 7, 13, 198 P. 784; 25 Cal. Jur. 1019, § 22. It is true that an owner of land adjacent to a stream may acquire prescriptive title to water therefrom, distinct from, or even in addition to, his normal riparian rights. It is also true that the acquiring of prescriptive rights to water from a stream by using it without objection on the part of the owner for the statutory period of time may defeat the owner of his riparian rights. Healy v. Woodruff, 97 Cal. 464, 32 P. 528; Rindge v. Craggs Land Co., 56 Cal. App. 247, 205 P. 36; California, etc., Co. v. Madera Canal & Irr. Co., 167 Cal. 78, 85, 138 P. 718, 721.

In the case last cited it is said: "One actually diverting water under a claim of appropriation for a useful or beneficial purpose cannot by such diversion acquire any right to divert more water than is reasonably necessary for such use or purpose, no matter how long a diversion in excess thereof has continued, and that there is no such thing as the acquirement by such an appropriator of a title by prescription, in so far as the excessive diversion is concerned."

It is argued that Scott McArthur acquired prescriptive title to a quantity of water used by him in irrigating the swamp land riparian to Tule river, which water was conveyed to Roderick by deed dated April 26, 1918. This deed purported to transfer "all the water rights connected with said lands." It is also contended that Scott acquired an additional quantity of water by means of statutory appropriation on the part of John McArthur of 180,000 inches of water, notices of which were posted and filed in January, 1902. These claims are untenable.

[24] An appropriator obtains title to the extent only of his use of the water for beneficial purposes. 26 Cal. Jur. 44, § 223; 27 R. C. L. 1273, § 183; Jennison v. Kirk, 98 U. S. 453, 25 L. Ed. 240; Calif., etc., Co. v. Madera Canal & Irr. Co., 167 Cal. 78, 138 P. 718. Under the law of appropriation, the right to the use of water lasts only so long and is effective only to such an extent as the actual use is exercised.

[25, 26] Upon the contrary, riparian rights are appurtenant to the land and are not waived by a failure to use them. Riparian rights are perpetual whether they are exercised or not. 1 Wiel on Water Rights (3d Ed.) p. 20, § 18. But riparian rights, being appurtenant to the lands bordering on the stream from which they are acquired, may not be sold and transferred to the injury of any other riparian owner for use on nonriparian lands remote from the stream upon which they depend. Calif., etc., Co. v. Madera C. & I. Co., 167 Cal. 78, 138 P. 718; Duckworth v. Watsonville, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 520, 89 P. 338, 341; Spring Valley W. Co. v. County of Alameda, 88 Cal. App. 157, 263 P. 318; 27 R. C. L. 1070, § 11.

In the Madera Case, supra, regarding the effect of a grant of riparian rights by an owner, it is said: "The effect of such a grant is simply to convey the grantor's right to the use of the water on his own riparian land, and to estop the grantor to complain against any use of the water which the grantee may make to the injury of such riparian right."

In the Duckworth Case, supra, it is said, regarding the same subject: "No one can sell or convey to another that which he does not himself own. Grimmer could not, by a transfer of his riparian rights, sell to the plaintiff, as against third persons having interests in the water, the right to use the water upon any land, riparian or nonriparian, except his own, to which it originally attached. His deed operated to prevent him from complaining of a diversion, but it did not affect other parties."

It follows that any effort on the part of Scott and Anna McArthur to deed to Roderick their interest in the waters of Tule river, acquired by appropriation or riparian rights appurtenant to the swamp lands, in excess of the quantity actually, necessarily and beneficially used either on the swamp lands or on the lands adjacent to Pit river, was void as against the rights of the plaintiff. All the waters acquired by appropriation or adverse possession which were necessarily and beneficially used on the defendants' land was awarded to them. All the riparian rights appurtenant to and necessarily used for the benefit of the swamp lands were conveyed by Scott McArthur to the plaintiff after the commencement of this action.

The record will not support the contention that the defendants are entitled to an additional amount of water salvaged from the swamp lands. There is no evidence to indicate that any such rights were acquired or preserved.

The entire history of this case indicates that the deeds of conveyance upon which the defendants rely for their claim to water in addition to the allotments awarded to them were executed only to preserve and confirm the same prescriptive rights to which they were awarded in this action. The defendants' appeal is therefore without merit.

The judgment is affirmed; neither party to recover costs.

BARRETT v. BARRETT.

S. F. 13373.

Supreme Court of California.

Oct. 27, 1930.

1. Marriage ⚭64.

Statute authorizing court, in "divorce" action, to make, modify, or vacate order for custody of children, held applicable to "annulment" proceeding (Civ. Code, §§ 84, 138).

Civ. Code, § 138, relating to custody of children, although by terms applicable only in actions for divorce, is part of article 4 (sections 136-148) entitled "General Provisions," included within chapter 2 (sections 82-148), which is entitled "Divorce," and which contains three other articles, dealing with nullity, dissolution of marriage, and causes for denying divorce. Section 84 was subsequently amended by St. 1929, p. 738, expressly authorizing court, in annulment proceedings, to make orders for custody of children.

2. Parent and child ⚭2(1).

Statutes conferring jurisdiction to award custody of children do not confer new authority, but merely recognize court's original or inherent jurisdiction.

3. Divorce ⚭289.

Under general chancery powers, equity courts, even in absence of statute, may control custody of children of parties in suit for dissolution of marriage.

4. Divorce ⚭296.

In awarding custody of children of parties in suit to dissolve marriage, trial court has very large measure of power and discretion.

5. Divorce ⚭312.

Trial court's conclusion, awarding custody of children in suit to dissolve marriage, will not be disturbed, unless abuse of discretion clearly appears.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action for divorce by Daisy Barrett against Charles S. Barrett, with a cross-complaint by defendant for annulment. Over a year after entry of a judgment annulling the marriage and awarding custody of a minor child to defendant, the judgment, on motion of plaintiff, was modified, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Knight, Boland & Christin and John H. Riordan, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Abraham M. Dresow, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, C. J.

Plaintiff filed a complaint for divorce against the defendant, who subsequently answered and cross-complained for an annulment. A judgment annulling and setting aside the marriage contract and awarding the custody of the minor child of the parties to the defendant was entered March 8, 1927. No appeal was taken therefrom, and no motion for a new trial or to set aside the judgment was ever made. However, on April 24, 1928, more than one year after the entry of the judgment, the plaintiff moved the trial court for an order modifying the decree of annulment and awarding the custody of the child to her. Over the defendant's written and oral objection that it was without jurisdiction to entertain such a motion, the court modified that portion of the decree of annulment relative to the custody of the child, and awarded it to the plaintiff, with directions to the defendant to pay $20 a month for the support of the child. From the order of modification, the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

[1] In support of the trial court's action, the respondent points to section 138 of the Civil Code, which reads: "In actions for divorce the court may, during the pendency of the action, or at the final hearing, or at any time thereafter during the minority of any of the children of the marriage, make such order for the custody, care, education, maintenance and support of such minor children as may seem necessary or proper, and may at any time modify or vacate the same." Appellant contends that this section by its terms has application solely to "actions for divorce," and that, in the absence of a reservation in the decree of a right to modify the same, or of a statute giving such right, a trial court is powerless to change the custody of minor children awarded under a decree of annulment, after such decree has become final.

The annulment of a marriage does not affect the legitimacy of children conceived or born before the judgment (Civ. Code, § 84), and we cannot bring ourselves to the conclusion, suggested by the appellant's contention, that the Legislature intended that the custody of the children of an annulled marriage should be governed by a rule other or different than the rule applicable to the custody of children in "actions for divorce." Section 138, supra, is a part of article 4 of chapter 2, title 1, part 3, of the Civil Code (sections 136-148), an article entitled "General Provisions." Chapter 2 is entitled "Divorce," and contains four articles, article 1 (sections 82-86) being entitled "Nullity," and embracing the provisions stating the causes for annulment, and providing for the proceedings to obtain such relief, article 2 (sections 90-107) being entitled "Dissolution of Marriage," and providing for ordinary divorce proceedings, article 3 (sections 111-132) being entitled "Causes for Denying Divorce," and article 4, as already stated, being entitled "General Provisions." It may reasonably be held that the term "Divorce," constituting the title of chapter 2, was intended to include annulment proceedings as well as divorce proceedings, and it may therefore well be argued that such provisions in the subdivision entitled "General Provisions," of which section 138 is one, as are appropriate in actions for annulment, are applicable thereto. Such was the suggestion made by this court in the case of Dunphy v. Dunphy, 161 Cal. 87, 92, 93, 118 P. 445. The case of Millar v. Millar, 175 Cal. 797, 808, 809, 167 P. 394, L. R. A. 1918B, 415, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 184, relied on by the appellant, contains nothing that is opposed to this conclusion, for that case was not concerned with any of the "General Provisions" of article 4, but rather with a provision of article 3 which, by its very language, could have application only to divorce proceedings as distinguished from annulment proceedings. Nor does the case of Coats v. Coats, 160 Cal. 671, 118 P. 441, holding, in effect, that section 146 of the Civil Code is without application to annulment proceedings, present any difficulty, for that section, though one of the "General Provisions" of article 4, was clearly inappropriate to an annulment proceeding, and could have application only to a divorce action. Section 138, however, providing for the custody and support of minor children is appropriate, and may be applied as well to annulment proceedings as to divorce actions, and the legislative intention undoubtedly was that it should have such application, for not until the year 1929 did the Legislature provide by separate and independent enactment for the custody and maintenance of minor children affected by annulment proceedings. In that year, and for the purpose of setting at rest this very question, the Legislature amended section 84 of the Civil Code (Stats.

1929, p. 738) to read as follows: "A judgment of nullity of marriage does not affect the legitimacy of children conceived or born before the judgment, and the court may during the pendency of the action, or at the time judgment is rendered or at any time thereafter make such order for the custody, care, education, maintenance and support of such children during their minority as may seem necessary or proper; except that the court must award the custody of the children of a marriage annulled on the ground of fraud or force to the innocent parent."

[2-5] It is only reasonable to conclude that prior to the 1929 amendment of section 84 of the Civil Code it was the legislative intention that, in so far as the custody of minor children was concerned, section 138, supra, should govern both annulment and divorce proceedings. Any other conclusion would result in an unwarranted distinction and discrimination. No injustice results from this conclusion, for statutes conferring jurisdiction on courts to award the custody of children do not confer a new authority or jurisdiction upon them, but merely recognize their original or inherent jurisdiction in the premises. 9 R. C. L. 472, § 286; Cowls v. Cowls, 3 Gilman (Ill.) 435, 44 Am. Dec. 708, 711; Hartmann v. Hartmann, 59 Ill. 103, 104. In the exercise of their general chancery powers, courts of equity, even in the absence of statute, have always been held to be invested with power to award and control the custody of infant children of parties in a suit for dissolution of marriage. Decker v. Decker, 176 Ala. 299, 58 So. 195. The welfare of the children is always of paramount interest and importance, and their custody must of necessity remain subject to the control of the court. In the exercise of this jurisdiction, the trial court is invested with a very large measure of power and discretion, and its conclusion will not be disturbed on appeal unless it clearly appears that its discretion has been abused. Examination of the record now before us fails to disclose such an abuse of discretion.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

GOLDWATER v. OLTMAN et al.
L. A. 9754.

Supreme Court of California.
Oct. 1, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 30, 1930.

1. Joint-stock companies and business trusts
⌚1.

Generally, "Massachusetts or business trust" is created wherever trustees are given legal title, with complete power of management, and, in their discretion, share profits with creators of trust.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Business Trust" and "Massachusetts Trust," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Joint-stock companies and business trusts
⌚1.

Shareholders, if empowered to remove or elect trustees, have ultimate control; hence, organization is partnership, not true Massachusetts or business trust.

3. Joint-stock companies and business trusts
⌚1.

Massachusetts or business trusts, with their limited liability, are lawful (Civ. Code, § 2220).

4. Joint-stock companies and business trusts
⌚15(1).

Shareholders of true Massachusetts or business trust are not personally liable on obligations incurred by trustees, or trustees' managing agents.

5. Joint-stock companies and business trusts
⌚1.

Agreement giving trustees full control, with power to elect successors, held to create Massachusetts or business trust, not partnership.

Agreement disclosed that trustees, although having full power to borrow money and execute notes or other evidences of indebtedness, could not mortgage trust property without consent of holders of two-thirds of certificates, and, although trustees had full power to amend trust agreement, any changes affecting cestuis required consent of holders of two-thirds of certificates. Besides these two negative powers, cestuis had one affirmative power, which was power to terminate trust without consent of trustees.

6. Pleading ⌚53(1).

Causes of action based on same transaction, and involving same indebtedness, may be set forth in various and, if necessary, inconsistent counts.

7. Pleading ⌚369(2).

Since plaintiff could sue either on note or original indebtedness, causes of action on note, book account, and account stated were properly joined, and court erred in compelling plaintiff to elect.

8. Pleading ⌚121(3).

Allegation defendants have no information or belief on which to base answer is insufficient, where matters are presumably within defendants' knowledge; specific denial being necessary.

9. Pleading ⌚121(3).

Denial on information and belief that note sued on was delivered as evidence of obligation of defendants held insufficient; positive denial being necessary.

Denial in question was insufficient, since it did not deny fact of delivery; and did not positively deny delivery, which it should have done, since such delivery was presumptively within defendants' knowledge.

10. Pleading ⌚121(4).

Allegation copartnership filed statutory certificate cannot be put in issue by denial on information and belief; being matter of public record (Civ. Code, §§ 2466, 2468).

11. Trial ⌚159.

Where answers were insufficient to raise issues on material allegations, plaintiff was not required to offer proof thereon; nonsuit being erroneous.

12. Trial ⌚178.

On motion by certain defendants for nonsuit, court erred in entering judgment for others, in absence of similar motion.

13. Joint-stock companies and business trusts
⌚17.

In absence of express or implied agreement with creditors to contrary, trustees of Massachusetts or business trust are personally liable.

14. Joint-stock companies and business trusts
⌚17.

Agreement creating Massachusetts or business trust, authorizing trustees to stipulate in contracts that trustees are not personally liable, will not be enforced, unless creditors had clear understanding thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. C. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Henry Goldwater against William Oltman and others. Judgment for certain defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Superseding opinion of the District Court of Appeal in 285 P. 734.

John W. Rankin, Kimball Fletcher, and Albee & Watkinson, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Schweitzer & Hutton, Edward Winterer, and Winterer, Combs & Ritchie, all of Los Angeles (H. F. Clary, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondents.

Barrett & McConnell, of Santa Rosa, amici curiæ for appellant.

Manson & Allan, of San Francisco, amici curiæ for respondents.

David M. Burnett and John M. Burnett, both of San Jose, Bohnett, and Hill & Campbell and Edward M. Fellows, all of San Jose, amici curiæ.

PER CURIAM.

In order to permit a re-examination of the record herein and to give further consideration to several important problems involved on this appeal, a hearing was granted by this court in this case after decision of the District Court of Appeal in and for the Second Appellate District, Division 2, 285 P. 734, affirming the judgment of the trial court. Although we are of the opinion that the District Court of Appeal correctly states the law in reference to the principal point involved in this appeal, due to the importance of the questions involved and due to the fact that we differ from the District Court of Appeal in reference to several of the minor points involved, we deem it necessary to more completely state the law than was done by the District Court of Appeal. We adopt as part of this opinion the following statement of facts taken from the prevailing opinion of the District Court of Appeal:

"This appeal is taken from a judgment entered in favor of certain of the defendants following the granting of a motion for nonsuit. An understandable presentation of the points presented for our consideration requires that we first review, as briefly as possible, the extremely voluminous pleadings in order that the issues between the plaintiff and various groups of defendants may be clarified.

"The second amended complaint, on which the plaintiff went to trial, sets forth ten causes of action. The first, omitting matters not germane to any point in controversy and dispensing with the legal verbiage, may be summarized as follows, the Roman numerals referring to the paragraphs as numbered in the pleading:

"II. Defendants Oltman and Morante are partners under the name of 'Morante Comedy Company';

"IV. All defendants other than Morante and Morante Comedy Company are partners under the name 'Drascena Productions';

"V. Between October 15 and December 1, 1920, Bloom Film Laboratories, a copartnership (hereinafter for brevity referred to as 'Laboratories'), 'performed and furnished work, labor and materials, and expended money, all at the special instance and request of defendants' Morante, Oltman and Morante Comedy Company;

"VI. $3,822.94 was the reasonable value of this work, etc., of which $3,000 is unpaid;

"VII. February 9, 1921, an agreement was made between defendants Oltman and Morante and Morante Comedy Company as vendors and all the other defendants as vendees, whereby the business and property of the vendors was transferred to the vendees, who, as part of the consideration, 'promised, assumed and agreed to pay' to the Laboratories the debt from the vendor. This agreement, the plaintiff, on information and belief, alleges was in writing;

"VIII. January 3, 1921, one of the three partners composing the Laboratories assigned his interests to the other two, who continued in business under the firm name, and on June 7, 1922, assigned and transferred the claim in suit to the plaintiff;

"IX. February 9, 1921, 'as evidence of said obligation of the defendants, excepting only * * * Morante and Morante Comedy Company', the defendants other than these two executed and delivered to the Laboratories a note for $3,000, dated as above, payable April 15, drawing seven per cent interest and containing a provision for attorney's fees to be fixed by the court in case of suit for collection, and signed 'Drascena Productions, by Charles M. Conant, President'; $1,273.78 is a reasonable attorney fee;

"X. No part of the $3,000 'or any amount of principal, interest or attorney's fees, of said note' has been paid;

"XII. None of the defendants has filed certificates of copartnership in the clerk's office.

"The second, third and fourth causes of action are identical with the first, with these exceptions: the second omits paragraph six, alleging reasonable value, and in lieu thereof alleges a promise to pay the Laboratories and a part payment, leaving a $3,000 balance unpaid; the third omits paragraphs five and six and substitutes an allegation of account stated between Morante Comedy Company and the Laboratories; and the fourth, with the same omissions as the third, alleges the original indebtedness to have been on a book account.

"The remaining causes of action all plead that the defendants other than Morante and Morante Comedy Company are members of and unit holders in an association known as 'Drascena Productions', all the business of which is transacted and all the property of which is held in trust by five of the defendants as trustees under a declaration of trust of record in Los Angeles county, the provisions of which are, at least in part, set forth. It is further alleged that each of seventy-two named defendants owns the number of units or 'shares of trust certificates' set opposite his name in the complaint. Except for the omission of the allegation as to partnership of those defendants connected with Drascena Productions found in paragraph four of the first cause of action, and by reference thereto incorporated in causes two, three and four, and the substitution thereof of the allegation as to nature and membership of Drascena Productions above referred to, causes five to eight, both inclusive, contain the same allegations as do causes one to four, respectively; that is to say, five corresponds to one, counting on the reasonable value of the work done, etc., as the basis of the original indebtedness; six corresponds to two, counting on the promise of Morante Comedy Company to pay, and so on.

"It is to be noted that while the first eight causes of action differ in the details above enumerated, they all set up the note executed by Drascena Productions. The ninth and tenth causes of action do not. The ninth cause of action alleges indebtedness to the Laboratories on the part of all the defendants on a book account showing $3,000 due and an assignment thereof to the plaintiff, while the tenth sets up an account stated between the Laboratories and all the defendants together with such assignment. With these exceptions the last two causes of action are but a repetition of the allegations of the first with paragraphs four, six and nine, hereinabove briefed, omitted.

"Drascena Productions as a separate entity was not made a party to the action, the title of the same as it appears from the complaint listing all defendants other than Oltman and Morante as 'copartners doing business under the firm name and style of "Drascena Productions"'. The transcript fails to show service on or appearance by some of the defendants, including Oltman, Morante and the Morante Comedy Company; others who were served defaulted, and their defaults were duly entered. Therefore in further reference to 'the defendants,' we are to be understood as meaning only those who answered. These may be divided into four groups. Group one was composed of thirteen defendants on behalf of whom an answer was filed by attorneys Schweitzer & Hutton and included the defendant Lars A. Dahl, specially mentioned for reasons which will appear later. The answer of this group failed to deny or in any way refer to the tenth cause of action set up in the complaint. Group two also consisted of thirteen defendants, represented by attorney Winterer, and to these thirteen may be added defendants Apostol and Arnis, who had filed a separate answer by other counsel, but who were represented at the trial by Mr. Winterer. Group three was composed of defendants I. N. and Nellie M. Thompson, on whose behalf an answer was filed by attorney C. O. Morgan. The record indicates that Nellie M. Thompson died pending the proceedings and that attorneys Bordwell & Mathews appeared for the executor at the trial. The fourth group (if merely for the purpose of classification we may be permitted to apply the word 'group' to one individual) consisted of the defendant Howard C. Galloupe, who appeared in propria personam. The answers of the three last mentioned groups included denials as to the tenth cause of action.

"During the progress of the trial, but before the plaintiff had rested his case in chief, the defendants composing groups one and two as hereinabove designated moved the court 'that the plaintiff be required to elect as to which particular remedy and which particular cause of action in the amended complaint he will stand on'. This motion the court granted over the objection of the plaintiff, who thereupon elected to stand upon his fifth cause of action. No such motion was made on behalf of the other defendants.

"Upon the plaintiff resting his case, Mr. Winterer, upon behalf of the fifteen defendants whom he represented (group two), moved for a nonsuit. Mr. Clary, appearing for Schweitzer & Hutton, made a similar motion on behalf of twelve of the defendants represented by that firm, but did not so move on behalf of the defendant Dahl. No such motion was made as to defendants Galloupe and I. N. Thompson, or as to the executor of Nellie M. Thompson. True, the judgment recites that such a motion was made on behalf of said executor, but the bill of exceptions contained in the transcript shows this to be incorrect. These two separate motions were granted and judgment was entered against the plaintiff and in favor of all of the defendants represented by Mr. Winterer, the twelve defendants represented by Schweitzer & Hutton on whose behalf the motion had been made, and also in favor of the executor of the last will and testament of Nellie M. Thompson, as to whom the bill of exceptions, certified by the trial judge as correctly setting forth all of the proceedings had during the trial, fails to show that any such motion was made."

It thus appears that the first eight causes of action are based on a promissory note executed by Drascena Productions. Before discussing the correctness of the ruling compelling plaintiff to elect upon which cause of action he desired to proceed, and before discussing the various questions of pleading involved, we deem it expedient to discuss the liability of the members of this organization, all of them having been made defendants herein. The basic problem involved on this appeal involves the question as to whether the members or shareholders of Drascena Productions are personally liable on the promissory note executed by the president of that organization. Upon an examination of the "Agreement and Declaration of Trust," which is attached as an exhibit to the answer of the defendants represented by Schweitzer & Hutton, it appears that it was by that agreement that Drascena Productions came into existence. It appears from this declaration of trust that the parties thereto attempted to create a type of business organization usually referred to as a Massachusetts or business trust. Inasmuch as this court has never directly passed upon the validity and legal incidents of this type of business organization, and inasmuch as it appears from the numerous briefs of amici curiæ on file herein that there are a considerable number of such organizations in California, it seems well that some definite statement of their legal status be made at this time.

These organizations, commonly denominated Massachusetts trusts, originated because of the hostility of some states towards corporations, and due to the desire of those organizing the same to secure some of the advantages that would be secured by incorporating without incurring the burdens and restrictions resulting therefrom. Due to statutory provisions in Massachusetts prohibiting corporations from dealing in real property, this type of organization reached its fullest development and most extensive use in that state, but, as will appear, has been adopted for use in many other states. The chief advantages of such organizations from the standpoint of those desirous of combining their wealth for business purposes are that until recently they were, in most states, free from regulation, enjoyed freedom from corporation taxation, and its members enjoyed the freedom from personal liability that is imposed upon partners. This type of organization is nothing more than an attempt to use the old common-law trust for the purpose of carrying on business enterprises.

Such a trust is brought into being by a declaration of trust, by the terms of which those desiring to invest their capital agree to the creation of a governing group of trustees, the powers and duties of this board being dependent on the terms of the trust agreement. The interest of each subscriber is evidenced by transferable certificates, similar to shares of stock in a corporation, and, in this state, subject to the scrutiny of the corporation department. The organization does not dissolve as does a partnership upon the transfer of any share, nor upon the death, insanity, or bankruptcy of a subscriber. The trust agreement usually provides that the trustees and not the subscribers are the owners of the property, and the trustees are given, in a true Massachusetts trust, complete control of the management of the business. In the trust agreement it is always provided that the subscribers are not personally liable for any of the acts of the trustees, a freedom from liability which, in this state, is even greater than that accorded to stockholders of corporations, except, since 1929, stockholders in limited corporations.

[1] Generally stated, a trust of this nature is created wherever several persons transfer the legal title in property to trustees, with complete power of management in such trustees free from the control of the creators of the trust, and the trustees in their discretion pay over the profits of the enterprise to the creators of the trust or their successors in interest. As thus defined it is apparent that such a trust is created by the act of the parties and does not depend on statutory law for its validity. In the case of Hecht v. Malley, 265 U. S. 144, 146, 44 S. Ct. 462, 463, 68 L. Ed. 949, Mr. Justice Sanford referred to such organizations as follows:

"The 'Massachusetts Trust' is a form of business organization, common in that State, consisting essentially of an arrangement whereby property is conveyed to trustees, in accordance with the terms of an instrument of trust, to be held and managed for the benefit of such persons as may from time to time be the holders of transferable certificates issued by the trustees showing the shares into which the beneficial interest in the property is divided. These certificates, which resemble certificates for shares of stock in a corporation and are issued and transferred in like manner, entitle the holders to share ratably in the income of the property, and, upon termination of the trust, in the proceeds.

"Under the Massachusetts decisions these trust instruments are held to create either pure trusts or partnerships, according to the way in which the trustees are to conduct the affairs committed to their charge. If they are the principals and are free from the control of the certificate holders in the management of the property, a trust is created; but if the certificate holders are associated together in the control of the property as principals and the trustees are merely their managing agents, a partnership relation between the certificate holders is created."

The leading case in Massachusetts where this so-called control test is fully discussed is Williams v. Inhabitants of Milton, 215 Mass. 1, 102 N. E. 355. In that case the question involved was whether the Boston Personal Property Trust was to be taxed as a partnership or as a trust. The court, after discussing certain cases holding the particular trust therein involved created a partnership, and others where it had been held that a trust had been created, stated (page 357 of 102 N. E.) that the distinction "lies in the fact that in the former cases the certificate holders are associated together by the terms of the 'trust' and are the principals whose instructions are to be obeyed by their agent who for their convenience holds the legal title to their property, the property is their property, they are the masters; while in Mayo v. Moritz (151 Mass. 481, 24 N. E. 1083), where it was held the instrument created a trust, on the other hand, there is no association between the certificate holders, the property is the property of the trustees and the trustees are the masters. All that the certificate holders in Mayo v. Moritz had was a right to have the property managed by the trustees for their benefit. They had no right to manage it themselves nor to instruct the trustees how to manage it for them."

The court then held that the Boston Personal Property Trust was a trust and not a partnership, stating (page 358 of 102 N. E.): "The certificate holders * * * are in no way associated together, nor is there any provision in the indenture of trust for any meeting to be held by them. The only act which * * * they can do is to consent to an alteration or amendment of the trust created by the indenture or to a termination of it before the time fixed in the deed. But they cannot force the trustees to make such alteration, amendment or termination. It is for the trustees to decide whether they will do any one of these things. All that the certificate holders * * * can do is to give or withhold their consent to the trustees taking such action."

In another leading case decided shortly after Williams v. Inhabitants of Milton, supra, the same court said concerning the controlling features between a trust and a partnership: "A declaration of trust or other instrument providing for the holding of property by trustees for the benefit of the owners of assignable certificates representing the beneficial interest in the property may create a trust or it may create a partnership. Whether it is the one or the other depends upon the way in which the trustees are to conduct the affairs committed to their charge. If they act as principals and are free from the control of the certificate holders, a trust is created; but if they are subject to the control of the certificate holders, it is a partnership." Frost v. Thompson, 219 Mass. 360, 106 N. E. 1009, 1010; see, also, Horgan v. Morgan, 233 Mass. 381, 124 N. E. 32; Sleeper v. Park, 232 Mass. 292, 122 N. E. 315; Crocker v. Malley, 249 U. S. 223, 39 S. Ct. 270, 63 L. Ed. 573, 2 A. L. R. 1601; Mayo v. Moritz, supra.

In those jurisdictions other than Massachusetts that have recognized this type of organization as a trust, it is the retention or non-retention of ultimate control by the shareholders which has been treated as a determining factor in the question as to whether the particular organization is a trust or a partnership. Beitcs v. Hackathorn, 159 Ark. 621, 252 S. W. 602, 31 A. L. R. 847; Schumann-Heink v. Folsom, 328 Ill. 321, 159 N. E. 250, 58 A. L. R. 485; Sears, Trust Estates as Business Companies (2d Ed.) 144. By the weight of authority, where the trustees have complete control of the business, the creators of the trust are treated as are the cestuis que trust of an ordinary equitable trust, and are exempt from direct personal liability to the creditors of the business; but if the trustees are subject to the control of the creators of the trust, the latter or their successors are liable as partners. Rand v. Morse (C. C. A.) 289 F. 339; Hart v. Seymour, 147 Ill. 598, 30 N. E. 246; Williams v. Boston, 208 Mass. 497, 94 N. E. 808; Frost v. Thompson, supra.

The old idea was that any sharing in the profits of an unincorporated organization necessarily implied a partnership, but that concept was specifically repudiated as early as 1860 in the case of Cox v. Hickman, 8 H. L. Cases 267, 11 Eng. Reprint 431. Most American jurisdictions have followed the English case and hold that mere profit sharing of itself does not necessarily create a partnership, and that therefore, for the reasons already discussed, if a true trust has been created, the certificate holders are not liable personally. Other jurisdictions, however, still adhere to the doctrine that profit sharing in an unincorporated company creates a partnership, and in these states, regardless of the degree of control, all certificate holders are treated as partners and held personally liable as such. The courts that adhere to this viewpoint contend that the only way to secure limited liability is by complying with the corporation or limited partnership law of the state. Thompson v. Schmitt, 115 Tex. 53, 274 S. W. 554; Weber Engine Co. v. Alter, 120 Kan. 557, 245 P. 143, 46 A. L. R. 158; State v. Hinkle, 126 Wash. 581, 219 P. 41; Reilly v. Clyne, 27 Ariz. 432, 234 P. 35, 40 A. L. R. 1005; McClaren v. Dawes, etc., Co., 86 Ind. App. 196, 156 N. E. 584; Willey v. Hoggson, 90 Fla. 343, 106 So. 408.

[2] In this state this court has never directly passed upon the problem as to whether certificate holders can secure freedom from personal liability by organizing a trust of the nature under discussion. Appellant strenuously contends that the case of Old River Farms Co. v. Roscoe Haegelin Co., 98 Cal. App. 331, 276 P. 1047 (hearing denied by this court June 13, 1929), laid down the rule that the certificate holders of such organizations are personally liable regardless of the degree of control exercised by the trustees. It is true that there is language in that decision indicating that to permit such limitation of liability is against public policy, but that language is merely dicta. When applied to the facts of that case it appears that the reasoning therein employed is correct. From an examination of the record therein it appears that by the terms of the trust agreement the Roscoe Haegelin trustees were elected by the shareholders for one-year terms. Even in those states that recognize the limitation of liability of certificate holders it is generally held that the power to elect trustees and fill any vacancies in the board gives the certificate holders such ultimate control over the trustees that the organization will be treated as a partnership and not a true trust. Frost v. Thompson, supra; Horgan v. Morgan, supra; 23 Columbia L. Rev. 423, 433-435. That rule appeals to us as the correct one to apply. If the trustees are subject to being removed by the shareholders, and are dependent upon them for election, it is apparent that the ultimate control of the organization rests in the shareholders. It therefore follows that the Haegelin Case is only authority for the point that, where the trustees are subject to election by the shareholders, the latter exercise ultimate control of the organization, and the organization is a partnership and not a true trust.

[3] In the absence of controlling authority to the contrary, we can see no reason why such organizations with their limited liability should not be recognized in this state. It is true that the statutes of this state provide for limited liability in the case of limited partnerships and corporations, but we find nothing in those statutory provisions that manifests an intent to limit the types of business organizations which shall enjoy this privilege to the two types of business organizations enumerated. Section 2220 of the Civil Code expressly states that trusts in personalty may be created for any purpose for which a contract may lawfully be made. It is true that until 1929 certain limitations were placed upon the purposes for which trusts in real property might be created by section 857 of the Civil Code, but, as stated before, there was no such restriction in reference to trusts in personal property. Estate of Walkerly, 108 Cal. 627, 41 P. 772, 49 Am. St. Rep. 97; Estate of Hinckley, 53 Cal. 457, 482; Toland v. Toland, 123 Cal. 140, 55 P. 681. Even the restrictions on trusts in real property have now been removed by a 1929 amendment to section 2220 of the Civil Code. It seems clear to us that the settled legislative policy of this state is to lay no restrictions against the formation of trusts in personalty, but rather to leave open to such organizations the conduct of any lawful enterprise. The law of trusts is just as much a part of the legislative policy of this state as the law of limited partnerships and corporations. It is true that trusts historically were not used for the purpose of running large business enterprises and were a development of the equity courts. The law, however, is not static, but is ever growing and expanding, and in recent years this form of handling property has been extended to nearly every field of activity. Sears, Trust Estates as Business Companies (2d Ed.) § 19; Wrightington, Unincorporated Associations & Business Trusts (2d Ed.) § 4. Just because a new use is being made of the trust does not mean new principles of law are to be applied in determining the rights of the trustees, cestuis que trust, creditors of the trust, or others that deal with the trust. Schumann-Heink v. Folsom, supra. If this new extension of the use of trusts requires regulation, that is a matter of legislative and not judicial concern. Some states have seen fit to regulate this form of business enterprise by statute. See Massachusetts Gen. Laws, 1921, c. 182; Massachusetts Acts and Resolves, 1926, c. 290; Oklahoma Sess. Laws, 1925, c. 56; Oklahoma Sess. Laws, 1927, c. 17; Wisconsin Laws, 1923, c. 431.

[4] From the foregoing analysis it follows that in this state, if, in fact, a true trust has been created, the shareholders are not personally liable on the obligations incurred by the trustees or the managing agents appointed by the trustees.

[5] We now turn to an application of the above principles to the trust agreement involved in this case. The "Agreement and Declaration of Trust" of Drascena Productions is set forth in full in one of the answers filed herein, and by stipulation was admitted into evidence. It would serve no useful purpose to summarize that agreement. It is sufficient to say that it contains the usual provisions found in the agreements which under the authorities cited supra have been held to create a true trust. It provides, among other things, that the five trustees shall have full authority and control; that title to the property shall be vested in them; that they shall fill all vacancies on the board and elect their successors, and thus differs from the Haegelin Case, supra; that the subscribers are not to be personally liable. The term of the existence of the organization is fixed upon lives in being, so that no question of the rule against perpetuities is involved. The only limitations placed upon the powers of the trustees are as follows:

1. The trustees are given full power to borrow money and to execute notes or other evidence of indebtedness, except "they shall have no power to mortgage the property of this trust without the written consent of the holders of two-thirds of the issued certificates of trust, except a purchase money mortgage."

2. As stated above, the trust is to remain in existence during the duration of certain specified lives in being, but it is provided that the trust may be terminated "by the unanimous vote of all of the trustees, or by a two-thirds vote of all the cestuis que trust, given at any meeting called for that purpose."

3. The trustees are given full power to amend, alter, or add to the trust agreement, except that "any changes, additions or alterations in any way affecting the rights, privileges and interests of the 'cestui' shall only be made by the consent of the owners and holders of two-thirds of all the outstanding shares of trust certificates."

No other restrictions upon the powers of the trustees than those enumerated are to be found in the trust agreement, nor can the subscribers, under that agreement, exercise any powers not mentioned above. It is to be noted that in the three matters enumerated above the subscribers are only granted one affirmative power—the power to terminate the trust without the consent of the trustees. The other two powers are purely negative; they must give their consent to any change in their legal status, and they must consent to any mortgage, except a purchase-money mortgage, executed by the trustees. No powers of suggestion or control other than those mentioned are conferred. It seems apparent that these rights and powers fall short of making the trustees mere agents of the certificate holders. It seems clear that these limitations on the powers of the trustees leave the trustees the masters, and do not confer upon the subscribers that degree of ultimate control that will make the organization a partnership rather than a trust. This is in accordance with the views adopted elsewhere. Williams v. Inhabitants of Milton, supra; Betts v. Hackathorn, supra; Greco v. Hubbard, 252 Mass. 37, 147 N. E. 272; Crocker v. Malley, supra.

It therefore follows that no direct personal liability attaches to the shareholders of Drascena Productions on the promissory note set forth in the first eight causes of action above enumerated simply by virtue of the fact that they are shareholders of that organization.

[6, 7] We turn now to a discussion of the various points of pleading involved. As set forth in the statement of facts, supra, before the plaintiff had rested his case, the court granted a motion to compel him to elect upon which cause of action he desired to proceed. This was undoubtedly error. As already noted, the first eight causes of action are all based on the promissory note in one form or another. The ninth and tenth causes of action do not refer to the note, the former being on a book account as to all the defendants, and the tenth upon an account stated. Assuming that all these causes of action are based upon the same transaction and involve the same amount of money, a fact which seems to be conceded by all parties involved on this appeal, the plaintiff had the right to set them forth in various, and, if need be, even inconsistent counts. Keller v. Hicks, 22 Cal. 457, 83 Am. Dec. 78; Wilson v. Smith, 61 Cal. 209; Stockton Combined Harvester, etc., Works v. Glen Falls Ins. Co., 121 Cal. 167, 53 P. 565; Froeming v. Stockton Elec. R. R. Co., 171 Cal. 401, 153 P. 712, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 408; Tanforan v. Tanforan, 173 Cal. 270, 159 P. 709; Turner v. Turner, 173 Cal. 782, 161 P. 980. The law is well settled that in such cases a plaintiff cannot be compelled to elect as to the cause of action upon which he desires to rely. Cowan v. Abbott, 92 Cal. 100, 28 P. 213; Rucker v. Hall, 105 Cal. 425, 38 P. 962; Estrella Vineyard Co. v. Butler, 125 Cal. 232, 57 P. 980; Murphy v. Crowley, 140 Cal. 141, 73 P. 820; Figlietti v. Frick, 203 Cal. 246, 263 P. 534. Assuming, for the purposes of this opinion, that the first eight causes of action can be treated as but one (since they are all upon the note in one form or another), the plaintiff clearly had the right to sue upon the note or upon the original indebtedness, i. e., book account or account stated (Holly v. Smalley, 50 App. D. C. 178, 269 F. 694; Lake v. Fletcher, 52 App. D. C. 46, 280 F. 1020; Schreyer v. Turner Flouring Mills Co., 29 Or. 1, 43 P. 719; Savage v. Savage, 36 Or. 268, 59 P. 461; Sullivan v. Rudisill, 63 Iowa, 158, 18 N. W. 856; Stalnaker v. Tolbert, 121 S. C. 437, 114 S. E. 412; First Nat. Bank v. Larsen, 146 Wis. 653, 132 N. W. 610), and this being so, under our practice, under the authorities supra, it was proper for the plaintiff to join the causes of action in one complaint, and it was error for the trial court to compel him to elect.

[8] Appellant also contends that the court erred in granting the motions for nonsuit. In reference to this assignment of error it will be necessary to consider each group of defendants separately. Turning our attention to the defendants represented by Schweitzer & Hutton, it appears that the answer interposed by this group failed, as above noted, to in any way mention the tenth cause of action. As to the seventh cause of action, the answer was as follows: "That the defendants have no information or belief upon which to base an answer to the allegations contained in the seventh cause of action, and on that ground deny each and every allegation thereof." Although this form of denial is sufficient under some circumstances (Jensen v. Dorr, 159 Cal. 742, 116 P. 553; Mahoney et al. v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co. et al. [Cal. App.] 281 P. 1108), it is not sufficient as to any matter presumably within the knowledge of the defendant, in which case his denial must be specific (Hensley v. Tartar, 14 Cal. 508; People v. Hagar, 52 Cal. 171, 182; Mahoney et al. v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co. et al., supra). Certain of the allegations in the complaint were presumably within the knowledge of defendants, and as to these, therefore, the answer under the authorities supra must be held to have raised no issue. What these matters are will more particularly appear when we consider the answer of the defendants represented by Mr. Winterer.

[9] As to these defendants (not including Apostol and Arnis who filed a separate answer) it appears that their answer does specifically deny the matters alleged in the various counts of the complaint. Most of these denials, however, are on information and belief, and it is the contention of appellant that, as to certain of these, such form of denial was insufficient and raised no issue, and that therefore this group of defendants must be regarded as having admitted many of the facts alleged in the complaint. We do not deem it necessary to separately consider each assignment of error made by appellant in this regard, but confine ourselves to some of the most obvious defects in the answer of these defendants. Paragraph 9 of plaintiff's first cause of action, incorporated by reference in all other causes of action except the ninth and tenth, alleges that all the defendants, with the exception of Morante and Morante Comedy Company, executed the note upon which the first eight causes of action are based, and delivered the same to the Morante Comedy Company as evidence of the obligation of the defendants to plaintiff's assignor. This group of defendants denied the delivery of the note on information and belief, and even with this form of denial only denied that the note was delivered "as evidence of any obligation at all of the said defendants or any of them." This denial is insufficient for two reasons: First, it does not deny the fact of delivery, and, second, whether or not the defendants delivered the note was a matter presumptively within their knowledge, and therefore they were called upon to deny the same positively if they wished to raise an issue on this point. Mulcahy v. Buckley, 100 Cal. 484, 35 P. 144; Zany v. Rawhide Gold Mining Co., 15 Cal. App. 373, 114 P. 1026; Jensen v. Dorr, 159 Cal. 742, 116 P. 553.

[10] In each cause of action plaintiff alleged that Bloom Laboratories had filed the certificate required by sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code. This group of defendants denied this allegation on information and belief. This was clearly such a matter of public record that it could not be put in issue by a denial on information and belief. Santa Barbara Lumber Co. v. Ross, 183 Cal. 657, 192 P. 436; 21 Cal. Jur., p. 150.

[11] Without detailing any further errors in the answer of these defendants, it appears from the foregoing that this answer, and likewise that of defendants represented by Schweitzer & Hutton, raises no issue as to certain material allegations, and the plaintiff was required to offer no proof thereon. The trial court was clearly in error in granting the nonsuit in favor of these defendants.

[12] As to the other defendants, no motion for nonsuit was made in their behalf, and it was error to enter such a judgment in the favor of any one of them in the absence of such motion.

[13, 14] Inasmuch as this case must be reversed and a new trial had, it seems well to indicate that the order of nonsuit was also erroneous in reference to another group of defendants. Although Drascena Productions is not made a party to the action as a separate entity, it being plaintiff's theory that that organization was a copartnership (which theory, as we have heretofore seen, was incorrect), all of the trustees are made parties defendant, because they are all likewise shareholders. These defendants are all respondents here, and are Harlan, Fox, Conant, St. John, and Watts. The law is clear that, in the absence of an express or implied agreement with the creditor to the contrary, the trustees are personally liable on all contracts with third persons. In the case of Taylor v. Davis, 110 U. S. 330, 4 S. Ct. 147, 150, 28 L. Ed. 163, the rule is thus stated: "A trustee is not an agent. An agent represents and acts for his principal. * * * When an agent contracts in the name of his principal, the principal contracts, and is bound, but the agent is not. When a trustee contracts as such, unless he is bound, no one is bound, for he has no principal. The trust estate cannot promise; the contract is therefore the personal undertaking of the trustee. * * * He is personally bound by the contracts he makes as trustee, even when designating himself as such. * * * If a trustee contracting for the benefit of a trust wants to protect himself from individual liability on the contract he must stipulate that he is not to be personally responsible, but that the other party is to look solely to the trust estate." See, also, Hewitt v. Phelps, 105 U. S. 393, 26 L. Ed. 1072; Betts v. Hackathorn, 159 Ark. 621, 252 S. W. 602, 31 A. L. R. 847; Frost v. Thompson, supra; 9 Fletcher, Corporations § 6095; 8 Thompson (3d Ed.) Corporations, § 6746. This broad personal liability of the trustees may be limited by provisions to that effect in the declaration of trust, if known and agreed to by all the parties affected. Frost v. Thompson, supra; Wells-Stone Merc. Co. v. Grover, 7 N. D. 460, 75 N. W. 911, 41 L. R. A. 252; Taylor v. Davis, supra. In the trust agreement under consideration the following provision is found relating to the liability of the trustees: " * * * All contracts * * * shall be the obligation of the trustees, and in every written order, contract or obligation made by the trustees, it shall be their duty to stipulate therein that neither the trustees nor the cestui que trust shall be held to any personal liability under or by reason of such order, contract or liability, and that all persons having dealings with the trustees shall look only to the property of this trust for payment." In the first place, even if plaintiff knew of this clause in the trust agreement, it does not appear therefrom that, in any contract where the trustees have not stipulated against personal liability, mere knowledge of the above clause would release the trustees from the ordinary and usual personal liability. As we interpret that clause, the creators of the trust have conferred on the trustees the power of releasing themselves from personal liability, but, in order to enjoy that privilege, they must stipulate to that effect in every contract with a third person. That privilege is a limitation of the general rule of liability, and is a limitation on the rights of the creditors of the trust. That being so, the limitation will not be enforced in the absence of a clear understanding and knowledge on the part of the creditors to the effect that no such liability is to exist. In the second place, there is nothing in the record of this case to show that plaintiff's assignor had knowledge of that clause at the time the promissory note was executed. It was therefore error to grant a nonsuit in favor of the five trustees, for, on the record before us, they are clearly liable for the amount set forth in the note.

For the purposes of clarity it might be well to enumerate briefly the points discussed in this opinion.

1. In all causes of action in which issue was properly joined a nonsuit would have been proper as to all subscribers who were not trustees, for the reason that the organization involved is an example of a Massachusetts or business trust. The certificate holders in such an organization are not personally liable on the contracts of the trustees. Therefore, as to these causes of action it was not prejudicial error to compel an election, because, regardless of the election, this plaintiff could not possibly prove any liability on the part of the shareholders other than the trustees.

2. It was clearly error for the trial court to compel the plaintiff to elect between those causes of action based on the note and those based on the alleged original obligation of which the note is the evidence.

3. As to the defendants represented by Schweitzer & Hutton, it was clearly error to grant a nonsuit in their favor, for the reason that said defendants either utterly failed to answer certain allegations of the complaint, or so defectively did so, that no issue was raised thereby.

4. As to those defendants represented by Winterer, other than Apostol and Arnis, the answer filed in their behalf failed to properly deny certain material allegations of the complaint, and therefore must be deemed to have admitted the same.

5. The other defendants did not move for a nonsuit, and therefore it was error to enter such a judgment in their favor.

6. In any event, from the state of the record, it appears that the five trustees of the Drascena Productions are personally liable on the note, and it was therefore error to enter a nonsuit in their favor.

In order to secure complete justice in the premises it seems well to indicate to the trial court that, before the new trial in this case, plaintiff and defendants, if they be so advised, should be permitted to file amended pleadings in accordance with the foregoing opinion, and thus properly present to the trial court the issues involved.

The judgment appealed from is reversed and a new trial ordered.

HIBERNIA SAVINGS & LOAN SOC. v. DE
RYANA et al.
S. F. 13227.

Supreme Court of California.
Oct. 25, 1930.

1. Fraudulent conveyances $\S$ 259(2).

Creditor's bill to set aside fraudulent conveyance must show plaintiff has reduced claim to judgment.

Foregoing rule is applicable, notwithstanding debtor is nonresident of state or is for any reason not available for service of process as prerequisite to making entry of such judgment.

2. Trusts $\S$ 361.

Equitable action to establish trust could be maintained where property was attached, though claim against principal defendant was not reduced to judgment (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 542, subd. 2).

Plaintiff brought action to recover money loaned and to establish trust in real property alleged to be owned by principal defendant, but with record title standing in name of another person alleged to hold same and title thereto in trust for principal defendant. Case was dismissed as to principal defendant, but plaintiff at time of commencement of action levied writ of attachment upon realty to abide whatever judgment plaintiff might obtain.

3. Pleading $\Rightarrow$ 252(1).

Defect in complaint based on attachment, not averring issuance of attachment and levy, but containing averment showing proper case for attachment, held cured by amendment showing issuance and levy.

Complaint contained averment showing action to be one wherein attachment might properly issue directed against property of debtor standing in name of another. Amendment to complaint showed that at time of filing of demurrer, attachment had been actually issued and levied upon specific property. Amendment to cure defect related back to antecedent date thereof.

RICHARDS, J.

The plaintiff commenced this action against the defendants J. V. De Ryana, Rosalia V. De Ryana, Rachel Cafiero, and certain fictitious defendants. The averments of its complaint, which is in several counts but which all relate to the same cause of action, briefly stated, show that on or about September 20, 1926, the defendant J. V. De Ryana negotiated a loan from the plaintiff to him in the sum of $7,000 based upon his promissory note for that sum, payable one year after date, and purporting to be secured by a mortgage upon certain real estate apparently standing in the name of the borrower. Upon the report of a title insurance company to that effect, he obtained said loan and the money represented thereby in full. A short while thereafter the plaintiff discovered that the said real estate did not belong to said De Ryana, but that his representations to that effect were based upon a series of frauds and forgeries done and intended to deceive the plaintiff into making said loan; whereupon the plaintiff commenced the present action to recover the amount of said loan thus fraudulently obtained. The complaint further alleged that at the time of obtaining said loan said J. V. De Ryana was and for some time prior thereto had been the owner of a certain other piece or parcel of improved real estate which at the time of his purchase thereof had been placed in the name of Rosalia V. De Ryana, his wife, and a codefendant herein, but which had been later conveyed by her without consideration to her sister Rachel Cafiero, also a codefendant herein, for the purpose of holding the same in trust for J. V. De Ryana, who at all times was and continued to be the real owner thereof. The complaint further stated that upon the receipt from said plaintiff of the amount of said loan by the fraudulent processes above set forth the said J. V. De Ryana paid over a large portion thereof to his said wife and sister-in-law, who applied the same to the payment of a certain outstanding indebtedness against said real estate and which had constituted a portion of the purchase price thereof. The prayer of the plaintiff's complaint was for a judgment against said J. V. De Ryana and his said codefendants for the sum of $7,000 and for a decree declaring that said codefendants have and hold said last-named parcel of real estate in trust for said J. V. De Ryana, the real owner thereof, and that the same be subjected to the payment of the judgment for said sum of money, and for general relief. Coincidentally with the institution of said action, the plaintiff sought and obtained a writ of attachment to be issued and levied upon said real estate; and thereafter and at the conclusion of the trial of the action obtained leave of court to file and serve an amendment to its complaint to conform to the proofs which, while so designated, is in form and fact a supplement thereto, and in which it was alleged that at the time of the institution of said action the plaintiff had procured to be issued and levied an attachment upon said real estate to abide whatever judgment the plaintiff should obtain in said action. In its said amended pleading the plaintiff amplified the averments of its original complaint and of each count thereof to the extent of setting forth that at all the times mentioned in both of said pleadings the said J. V. De Ryana, up to the time of his disappearance as therein set forth, had been engaged in the real estate business in the city and county of San Francisco, which said business he carried on and conducted in the name of his said wife Rosalia V. De Ryana and of his sister-in-law Rachel Cafiero, and during which time all of the properties he acquired and dealt in were held in the name of his said wife and sister-in-law, including the property upon which said attachment had been levied, and that the acts and conduct of J. V. De Ryana in thus using the names of his codefendants were at all times done and undertaken for the fraudulent purpose of concealing his ownership of such properties for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding his creditors; that shortly after J. V. De Ryana had obtained the aforesaid loan from the plaintiff, in furtherance of his aforesaid fraudulent purposes he had disappeared and become a fugitive from justice and could not be found in this state or elsewhere for the purpose of service of process upon him in this action; that J. V. De Ryana was, other than his ownership of the said real estate then standing in the name of his said sister-in-law, insolvent and had no other assets in the state of California or elsewhere to which plaintiff might have recourse for the satisfaction of its claim and of any judgment it might obtain based thereon, save by virtue of its aforesaid attachment of said real estate. Subsequently to its filing and service of its said amended and supplemental complaint the plaintiff dismissed its present action as to the defendant J. V. De Ryana and thereafter commenced and prosecuted against him another action for the recovery of a judgment upon the note which formed the basis of the original loan and also procured an attachment in that action; and having made service upon said De Ryana by publication of summons procured a judgment by default to be entered against him. In the meantime Rosalia V. De Ryana and Rachel Cafiero, having been each duly served with process in the present action, appeared separately herein, the latter by filing a general demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint, and the former by answer thereto. The demurrer of Rachel Cafiero having been overruled, she also answered. The answers of these two defendants contain denials in the main predicated upon a lack of information and belief of the plaintiff's averments, but also contained positive denials of any ownership of the real estate in question or any portion thereof in J. V. De Ryana at any time, and assert full ownership in the defendant Rachel Cafiero. The cause went to trial upon the issues as thus framed, and upon its submission the court made and filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law sustaining generally the averments of the plaintiff's original and also of its amended complaint, and as conclusions of law upon the facts as thus found determined that J. V. De Ryana had become and continued to be indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $7,000 and the interest thereon as and in the manner set forth in the plaintiff's complaint; that J. V. De Ryana had for many years conducted his business of a real estate agent in the name of either his wife or his sister-in-law; that the ownership of the particular real estate, while standing in the name of Rachel Cafiero, was at all times vested in J. V. De Ryana, and that neither said Rachel Cafiero nor Rosalia V. De Ryana had at any time any right, title, or interest therein save and except to hold the same in trust for J. V. De Ryana, the real owner thereof; that the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment and decree so declaring, and directing that the said real property be sold for the satisfaction of the judgment to be entered thereon, the proceeds of such sale to be applied to the satisfaction of the plaintiff's indebtedness, the balance, if any, to be paid to the defendant Rachel Cafiero. Judgment was entered thereon accordingly, and from such judgment the defendant Rachel Cafiero has alone appealed.

[1-3] The first contention which the appellant urges upon her appeal is that her general demurrer to the plaintiff's original complaint should have been sustained. This contention presents substantially the only point involved in this appeal, and that point is that the plaintiff was, as a matter of law, not entitled to commence or maintain this action against the defendants therein, or any of them, or to subject the real property sought to be affected thereby to its said claim, until such time as it had first obtained a judgment against the defendant J. V. De Ryana establishing the fraudulent processes by which the latter had obtained from the plaintiff the aforesaid loan. The authorities cited by the appellant in support of this contention, among which are the cases of Roberts v. Buckingham, 172 Cal. 458, 156 P. 1018, and certain other recent decisions by the appellate courts, state generally the well-established rule that a creditor's bill to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance by the debtor must show that the plaintiff has reduced his claim to judgment; and that this is true notwithstanding the debtor is a nonresident of the state or is for any other reason not available for service of process as a prerequisite to the making and entry of such judgment. The respondent herein does not question the application of these authorities to proper cases, but urges that they have no application to the case at bar, wherein the plaintiff, having a good cause of action against his debtor upon a claim arising on contract upon which an attachment might properly issue, is entitled to bring such action, issue such attachment, and levy the same upon property of which it asserts the debtor was at all times the owner, although said property as to its record title was standing in the name of another person who was holding the same and the title thereto in trust for said debtor and not otherwise. The authorities upon which the respondent relies in support of this contention seem fully to sustain the same, particularly the case of Becker v. Beldt, 205 Cal. 491, 495, 271 P. 1059, which is a case practically identical with the case at bar, and wherein this court differentiated between the case of Roberts v. Buckingham, supra, and like cases, and the case then before it, holding that a creditor suing upon a promissory note and seeking by way of attachment in such suit to create a specific lien upon property alleged to be owned by the debtor, but standing in the name of another er (section 542, subd. 2, Code Civ. Proc.), is entitled to institute such action, procure such attachment and subject the property so attached to such judgment as he may be awarded, and is not required to first obtain a judgment in a prior action against his debtor before becoming entitled to sue and obtain his relief as against the property of the debtor so held and so subjected to the lien of the attachment. This principle finds further support in the case of Horan v. Varian, 204 Cal. 391, 397, 268 P. 637, and is given ampler and quite instructive consideration in the recent case of Platte County State Bank v. Frantz, 33 Wyo. 326, 239 P. 531. It is true that at the time of the filing of the defendant Rachel Cafiero's general demurrer to the plaintiff's original complaint the said complaint did not, as of course it could not, contain an averment that an attachment had been actually issued and levied upon the specific property involved in said action; but said complaint did therein contain averments showing the action to be one wherein an attachment might properly issue directed against property of the debtor standing in the name of another, and the plaintiff's subsequent amendment to said complaint showing that at the time of the filing of said demurrer such attachment had been actually issued and levied upon said specific property must be held to relate back to the antecedent date thereof so as to cure the defect, if any, in the plaintiff's original complaint.

The appellant makes a further contention predicated upon certain proceedings originated in the District Court of Appeal, in which court the appeal herein was first given consideration. It appears that the respondent, apparently out of excess of caution, undertook while said appeal was still pending in that court to institute a proceeding under the provisions of section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure to offer evidence in the form of a judgment roll in an action which it had instituted against J. V. De Ryana upon his aforesaid promissory note, and wherein it had obtained a judgment against said De Ryana upon said note subsequent to the institution of the present action, but prior to its determination upon appeal in said appellate court. The respondent's request in that regard was complied with by said court and it also and in the same proceeding permitted the respondent to amend its pleadings in this action so as to include a recital of the entry of such judgment in the other action entered subsequent to the judgment in this action. The appellant complained in her petition for a hearing herein and now complains of the action of the appellate tribunal in the foregoing regard. We do not deem it necessary, however, to pass upon the correctness or propriety of the action of the appellate tribunal in this matter for the reason that whether right or wrong in the abstract the situation of this cause upon appeal did not in our opinion require the application of the provisions of section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure to the case because, as fully set forth in the foregoing portions of this opinion, the plaintiff, in order to maintain this action, was not required to have first secured a judgment against its immediate debtor J. V. De Ryana as a prerequisite to the institution or maintenance of the present action, and hence the effort on the respondent's part to seek application of the code provision above referred to in support of its judgment upon appeal while a precautionary was nevertheless an unnecessary proceeding, the propriety of which we do not deem it necessary to further discuss.

The appellant makes the further and final contention that the evidence produced before the court was insufficient to overthrow the presumption created by section 164 of the Civil Code to the effect that the real estate here in question having been originally conveyed to Mrs. J. V. De Ryana was her separate property which she in turn had a right to transfer to her sister, Rachel Cafiero, prior to the transaction by which her husband, J. V. De Ryana, became a debtor of the plaintiff and respondent herein. The evidence before the trial court in the foregoing regard presents an interesting situation. It would be a waste of time, however, to review in detail this evidence, which in our opinion abundantly shows that throughout the entire period of his rather spectacular career he used the names of his wife and of her sister, Rachel Cafiero, who was at all times an inmate of his family, instead of his own name for the transaction of his business, and that these two women were in fact dummies who signed checks and other documents and took and transferred titles to real estate wholly according to his direction and without knowing aught about the details of his business or about the particular transaction in which their names were used, but in which the real actor was himself. The transaction by which in the year 1922 he acquired the property involved in this action, taking the title thereto in the name of Rosalia and about two years later causing it to be transferred to Rachel without any of the usual indicia of a change of ownership, the said property standing in the name of the latter at the time he perpetrated his fraud upon the plaintiff, securing thereby the sum of $7,000, a considerable part of which was immediately made use of to pay off an encumbrance upon said property representing a portion of its original purchase price, fully illustrates the real situation as to the status and ownership of the property in question. We think the evidence of these transactions was such as to overcome the presumption and fully justify the finding of the trial court to the effect that J. V. De Ryana was at all times the real owner of the property in question and that said property having been duly attached should be subjected to the satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim.

We do not deem that any other points upon this appeal merit more detailed discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

SECURITY TRUST CO. v. SILVERMAN et al.

S. F. 13358.

Supreme Court of California.

Oct. 28, 1930.

Fraudulent conveyances ⇨ 168.

Conveyance by insolvent, supported by valuable consideration, held not transfer made "voluntarily," within statute which existing creditor could set aside (Civ. Code § 3442).

Civ. Code, § 3442, provides that any transfer or incumbrance of property made or given "voluntarily, or without a valuable consideration," by an insolvent party, shall be fraudulent and void as to existing creditors. It was contended that the section must be construed as written, i. e., in the disjunctive, and that a conveyance either voluntary or unsupported by valuable consideration is void. However, "a 'voluntary' conveyance is one without any valuable consideration. If there is a valuable consideration, no matter how trivial or inadequate, the conveyance is not 'voluntary.'"

WASTE, C. J.

Plaintiff, a creditor of the defendant Sam Silverman, appeals from an adverse judgment in an action brought to have declared fraudulent and void a deed transferring from said defendant to his estranged wife an undivided one-half interest in certain real property. The alleged fraudulent deed was executed and delivered to the grantee more than three months prior to the institution of an action in which plaintiff's claim was subsequently reduced to judgment. It is alleged in the complaint that the questioned transfer was purely voluntary, without consideration, made at a time when Silverman was insolvent, and prompted solely by a desire to defraud his creditors, particularly the complainant. Among other things, the trial court found that at the time of making the conveyance Silverman was insolvent; that the grantee was without knowledge of such fact; that the conveyance was made in good faith and without intent upon the part of either party thereto to defraud any one; and that it was supported by a good and valuable consideration. Contrary to appellant's claim, the evidence, which we have examined in detail fully sustains these findings.

Section 3442 of the Civil Code provides, in part, that "any transfer or incumbrance of property made or given voluntarily, or without a valuable consideration, by a party while insolvent * * * shall be fraudulent, and void as to existing creditors." Appellant contends that the transfer here assailed, even if assumed to be supported by a valuable consideration, a point not, however, conceded by it, was nevertheless "voluntary," and therefore fraudulent within the meaning and intent of the Code section. In other words, the appellant argues that the Code section reading in the disjunctive must be construed accordingly, from which it necessarily follows that any conveyance made by an insolvent person which is either voluntary in character or unsupported by a valuable consideration is fraudulent and void. The authorities are directly opposed to this line of reasoning. In answer to the query whether the transfer there questioned was void under section 3442 as having been made "voluntarily, or without a valuable consideration, by a party while insolvent," the court, in Hopkins v. White, 20 Cal. App. 234, 247, 128 P. 780, 785, declares: "A voluntary conveyance is a conveyance without any valuable consideration. * * * If there is a valuable consideration, no matter how trivial or inadequate, the conveyance is not voluntary." Again, in Shasta Lumber Co. v. McCoy, 85 Cal. App. 468, 473, 259 P. 965, 967, the court states that "the provision of section 3442 of the Civil Code 'that any transfer or incumbrance of property made or given voluntarily, or without a valuable consideration, by a party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, shall be fraudulent and void as to existing creditors,' has no application to the facts of this case, because the transfer was not voluntary, but was made for a valuable consideration."

The judgment is affirmed.

WEBER et al. v. NASSER et al.
S. F. 13577.

Supreme Court of California.
Oct. 30, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 24, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨781(1).

Supreme Court will not render judgment which can have no practical effect.

2. Appeal and error ⇨781(4).

Questions involved on plaintiff's appeal in action to enforce collective bargaining agreement held moot, warranting dismissal, where contract by its terms had expired.

3. Courts ⇨488(1).

Granting of hearing in Supreme Court after decision by District Court of Appeal opens entire cause, and matter stands as though no decision had been rendered by any reviewing court.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by Walter A. Weber and others, suing as members of Musicians Union of San Francisco, Local No. 6, American Federation of Musicians, for and on behalf of Musician Union of San Francisco, Local No. 6, American Federation of Musicians, and all of the members thereof, against William J. Nasser and others. From a judgment dismissing action, plaintiffs appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Superseding opinion of the District Court of Appeal, 286 P. 1074.

Aaron Sapiro and Sapiro & Hayes, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Nat Schmulowitz, George B. Harris, Gavin McNab, and Schmulowitz, Wyman, Aikins & Brune, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

George O. Bahrs, of San Francisco, amicus curiae.

PER CURIAM.

The sole question involved in this cause has become moot, and for that reason the appeal must be dismissed. This arises from the following facts:

Plaintiffs, as members and on behalf of the Musicians Union of San Francisco, Local No. 6, American Federation of Musicians, and all of the members thereof, said organization having for its purpose the regulation of prices, business, and working conditions in the musical profession, brought this suit against certain individuals and corporations identified with what is known as the Allied Amusement Industries of California, to enjoin a breach and enforce the terms of a certain collective bargaining agreement with reference to labor, entered into in writing by said parties on September 30, 1928, and by its terms to terminate on August 31, 1930.

The court below adjudged said contract to be one involving personal services and, therefore, not subject to specific enforcement, hence not one for an injunction to prevent its breach; declined the relief prayed for; sustained a demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend; and later, on June 14, 1929, gave a judgment of dismissal of the action. Notice of appeal to this court was filed by plaintiffs on June 19, 1929. Hearing on appeal was hastened and the cause was submitted to this court on July 3, 1930.

[1, 2] Upon examination of the record we find that any order we might make would be futile, as the contract, by its terms, expired on the above-mentioned date and plaintiffs' cause of action in no event could avail them anything. We have not overlooked the importance of the issue involved, but we must adhere to our long-established rule to the effect that this court does not pass judgments which can have no practical effect.

[3] It is not necessary, of course, to add that in granting a hearing of this case after the decision by the District Court of Appeal, we neither approved nor disapproved the views announced by that court. A hearing in this court sets the entire cause at large and the matter stands as though no decision of any kind has been rendered therein by any reviewing court.

Precedents for our conclusion—appeals where the questions have become moot—are numerous and the citation of authorities is unnecessary. We nevertheless call attention to the following among numerous cases announcing a like rule: Matter of Guardianship of Ambros, 170 Cal. 160, 149 P. 43; Stuart Arms Co. v. City and County of San Francisco, 203 Cal. 150, 263 P. 218; Childress v. L. Dinkelspiel Co., Inc., 203 Cal. 262, 263 P. 801.

The appeal is hereby dismissed, without costs to either party.

LANGDON, J.

This is a petition to review a resolution of the board of governors of the state bar recommending the disbarment of Samuel W. Green, petitioner herein.

The testimony before the local administrative committee of the county of Sacramento is practically uncontradicted, and establishes the following facts: Petitioner was engaged to act as attorney for Daniel Oliveria in a suit to collect the sum due on a promissory note; the agreement being that, in the event of collection, the fee would be $400. Some time in February, 1928, the action was successfully concluded, and the defendant paid the sum of $1,266.16 to petitioner, which sum petitioner deposited in his single bank account under the name of S. W. Green, trustee. He made no mention of the conclusion of the litigation to Oliveria until October, 1928, when he sent him a check for $500. On November 11, 1928, he wrote to Oliveria that he was having difficulty in collecting the rest of the money from the adverse party. On January 12, 1929, he sent Oliveria a check for $350 bearing the date of January 17, 1929, which sum appears to have been the balance due the client, after deducting expenses and the fee. In his accompanying letter he gave the death of his aunt as the reason for his being short of funds, and also promised to send a complete statement in a few days covering "all of the money involved." The check was cashed by Oliveria at the Bank of Italy, Concord branch, on January 22, 1929. It was thereafter returned, marked "Account closed." On two subsequent occasions Oliveria, upon advices from petitioner, deposited the check, with the same result. On February 21, 1929, he placed the matter in the hands of another attorney, who demanded payment. Petitioner wrote back in reply that he had been ill and was trying to raise the money on a loan from friends, and that he appreciated Oliveria's leniency and desired a little more time. The attorney answered, giving him until March 1st. Thereafter, on March 15th, the check was placed in the hands of the district attorney of Sacramento county. Several conferences were held in his office, but his efforts to secure payment were likewise unsuccessful. On September 13, 1929, petitioner was served with a complaint before the local administrative committee of the state bar, verified by Oliveria as complainant, and setting forth the above facts. The next day the money was paid to the bank.

Petitioner's defense, as appears from his answer (filed subsequent to the hearing), is that it had been agreed between his client and himself that, upon collecting the amount of the judgment, he might retain the sum of $350 as a loan. He testified that the agreement was made orally in a conversation in the courthouse at Stockton, at which one Dennis was present and acting as interpreter for Oliveria, who spoke English imperfectly. The only evidence in support of this defense is petitioner's own statement; and he further testified that no memorandum was ever made, that no time was set for the duration of the loan, and that no interest was specified, although it was in some way understood that $25 extra should be returned as interest. On the other hand, Oliveria denied any such agreement, and Dennis had no recollection of it. Petitioner declared that he told the district attorney about it; but an officer of the bank, who was present at the conferences, testified that no such discussion took place. Pe-petitioner was unable to produce any writing mentioning the purported loan, and neither the letter to Oliveria nor the one to his attorney made any mention of such a loan. Each letter, in fact, assigned an entirely different reason for the failure to send the money.

From these facts the committee found petitioner guilty of conduct involving moral turpitude, and recommended his disbarment, which finding and recommendation were approved by the board of governors of the state bar.

[1] Petitioner refused to make any statement in his own behalf at the hearing, called no witnesses, introduced no evidence, and did not cross-examine opposing witnesses. Hence, except for occasional answers which he made to questions put by members of the committee, the record is devoid of support for his alleged defense. He justifies his conduct with the assertion that the proceedings were improper, in that the attorney whom he had selected to represent him was unable to be present at the hearing, and that the committee should therefore have granted his request for a continuance. The committee was, perhaps, in error in denying this request. However, petitioner had ten days after service of the complaint to make his arrangements, and did not even file an answer thereto. He made no attempt to secure an extension of time, but instead, prior to the day of the hearing, signed a written stipulation acknowledging his readiness to proceed on that date. The committee recessed for a short time on the afternoon of the hearing to permit him to secure counsel, which he claimed to be unable to do. When the hearing was later continued for further testimony, from September 25th to October 7th, he appeared a second time without counsel. Nor can we discover what prejudice is believed by petitioner to have been suffered by him from the refusal to grant his first application for a continuance for he made no showing of what he expected to prove.

[2] No other points made by petitioner are worthy of mention, save the one that the punishment meted out is too severe, and should at most have been suspension. We are inclined to agree with this view. It is not established, we think, that he had any intention of keeping the money beyond such time as would be required to raise the necessary funds to pay it back. The utterly incompetent manner in which petitioner handled his case, coupled with the refusal of the committee to permit him to secure proper representation, leads us on this review to take the most favorable view to petitioner of this part of his defense. Hence the offense of which petitioner is guilty is of a serious nature, but not of such proportions as has customarily resulted in an order of disbarment. There are a number of cases in which both the board of governors and this court have felt that suspension for a period of years would be adequate punishment, in view of all of the circumstances. A decision much in point here is In re Petersen, 208 Cal. 42, 230 P. 124, where the recommendation of disbarment was reduced to an order of suspension. With this case in mind, we think that suspension of petitioner for a period of a two years would be ample punishment for the misconduct of which he has been found guilty.

It is therefore ordered that the petitioner, Samuel W. Green, be suspended from the rights and privileges of an attorney at law for the period of two years from and after the date of the filing of this order.

WASTE, C. J.

I dissent. The record shows conclusively that petitioner appropriated and mingled his client's funds with his own. He withheld the major part of a judgment collected for his client for over six months. He fraudulently, and by misrepresentation, withheld the balance for a year, before he gave his client a check for the amount on a bank in which he knew he had no account. He did not pay the amount until after his client had engaged other counsel, placed the matter in the hands of the district attorney, and filed the accusation with the state bar.

The majority opinion contains a correct statement of petitioner's attitude before the local administrative committee, but I do not believe he was improperly treated. He had no sufficient defense, and, in my opinion, was "stalling for time" in an endeavor merely to postpone what he must have known would be an unfavorable recommendation in his case. The majority opinion points to "the utterly incompetent manner in which petitioner handled his case" before the local committee, which, to my mind, is but further evidence of the fact that he is unfit to be intrusted with important matters by clients.

The recommendation of the board of governors of the state bar should have been approved, and the petitioner disbarred from the further practice of the law.

SAN DIEGO & CORONADO FERRY CO. v.
RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALI-FORNIA et al.

S. F. 13900.

Supreme Court of California.

Oct. 20, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 17, 1930.

1. Ferries ☞14.

Statement, in commission's opinion, that, since existing company was operating new boat, ferry capacity was adequate, held not inconsistent with implied finding that additional service would further public interest, where new boat had been operating only 12 days prior to time entire matter was taken under advisement.

It appeared that on April 21, during the pendency of the proceeding, and twelve days before the submission of the matter to the railroad commission, existing ferry company had put into service a new boat; that applicant for certificate of public convenience had made definite progress in proposing to establish a competitive ferry by obtaining franchises, etc., before existing company had placed its order for the new boat; and that, prior to the putting into operation of the new boat, existing carrier had not rendered adequate service to the public.

2. Ferries ☞14.

Record held to sustain conclusion that granting of certificate of public convenience for operation of ferry was in public interest, and that existing and new companies could operate at profit.

3. Public service commissions ☞35.

Supreme Court may not weigh evidence, and is concluded by railroad commission's fact findings and conclusions (St. 1915, p. 115, § 67).

4. Public service commissions ☞6.

Railroad commission has broad discretionary power to grant or withhold certificates of public convenience and necessity (St. 1915, p. 115).

5. Public service commissions ☞35.

That reasonable minds might differ as to wisdom of order granting certificate of public convenience held not to destroy order supported by sufficient record.

Petition by the San Diego & Coronado Ferry Company for a writ of review to annul an order of the Railroad Commission granting a certificate of public convenience and necessity to the Automobile Ferry Company of Coronado.

SHENK, J.

Petition for writ of review to annul an order of the railroad commission granting a certificate of public convenience and necessity to Automobile Ferry Company of Coronado to operate a public ferry service for compensation across San Diego bay between the cities of San Diego and Coronado.

The petitioner, the San Diego & Coronado Ferry Company, is a public utility and has for many years operated a public passenger and vehicle ferry service across San Diego bay between the cities of San Diego and Coronado and is therefore subject to the jurisdiction of the railroad commission under the provisions of the Public Utilities Act (Stats. 1915, p. 115). On January 3, 1929, Automobile Ferry Company of Coronado filed with the commission an application for a certificate declaring that public convenience and necessity require the operation of another ferry across San Diego bay between said cities in competition with the petitioner's service. Public hearings were held at San Diego on April 2, 3, and 30, and on May 1 and 2, 1929, at which all parties entitled to be heard participated. The petitioner appeared and took an active part as a protestant at said hearings. On January 30, 1930, the commission filed its opinion and order granting the application. A rehearing was denied and the present petition was filed April 10, 1930. As a return to the writ the commission filed an answer and submitted for our consideration the entire record, which consists of a voluminous transcript of the testimony and over one hundred exhibits and documents. The petitioner states that it is unnecessary to refer to the evidence before the commission for the reason, so it is claimed, that the opinion and order shows its invalidity on its face. The commission relies upon the record, including the evidence in support of its action. In the opinion of the commission the entire situation is extensively treated. Some of it is discussion not amounting to findings, and other portions thereof may properly be considered findings of fact.

It appears that the only ferry service conducted across San Diego bay between San Diego and Coronado prior to the granting of the present certificate was that provided by the petitioner herein; that from October, 1920, to April, 1929, that company operated two ferryboats, viz., the Ramona, having a carrying capacity of about 14 automobiles, and the Morena, with a capacity of 38 average cars; that the applicant has obtained the necessary franchise from the county of San Diego and the cities of San Diego and Coronado to authorize it to operate the proposed ferry line; that the applicant proposes to commence operations with one boat, to cost about $325,000 and having a carrying capacity of about 50 automobiles; that this service will accommodate local vehicular traffic between the cities of San Diego and Coronado, as well as through traffic between the Mexican border and points north of San Diego via the Coronado strand; that the new ferry line extends from the foot of Kettner boulevard in San Diego to B street in Coronado and will operate about 500 feet easterly of the route over which the boats of the petitioner have been and are operated; that on April 21, 1929, or twelve days before the submission of the matter to the railroad commission, the petitioner herein put into service a new boat called the Coronado, with 50 to 60 automobile capacity, and retired the Ramona for stand-by service.

In its opinion the commission stated that it was apparent from the record that the applicant for the certificate had made definite progress in proposing to establish a competitive ferry by obtaining franchises, etc., before the petitioner herein had placed its order for the new boat Coronado, and that prior to the time this new boat was put into operation on April 21, 1929, the petitioner was not doing its full duty to the public and its service to the public was inadequate. The opinion further states: "For this commission to protect a utility which has allowed its service to run down, as the record shows has been the case here, until competition knocks at the door, is not conducive to good service and to public interest. It is incumbent upon every utility in this state to be abreast with public needs, regardless of whether there is competition facing it or not. A utility must assume the obligation of providing reasonably good service to its patrons if it expects to hold the field; to hold otherwise is not conducive to the growth and welfare of the community."

[1, 2] It is contended, however, that the force of the findings of the commission in support of its conclusion that the certificate should be granted is entirely dispelled by the further statement in the opinion as follows: "It appears, however, that subsequent to the time the new boat 'Coronado' has been put in operation, the ferry capacity was adequate to accommodate all the traffic offered for transportation without delay." This statement, it is claimed, renders the order granting the certificate void on its face on the theory that it constitutes a finding that further ferry service is unnecessary, and, therefore, the conclusion of the commission that public convenience and necessity require the granting of the certificate applied for is unsupported. We do not so construe the statement of the commission, assuming it to be a finding. Undoubtedly the statement had reference to the twelve-day period, in an "off month" from the standpoint of traffic, and which was the period from the day the new boat was put in operation to May 2d, when the entire matter was taken under advisement by the commission. The statement is not inconsistent with the implied finding of the commission, justified by the record, that, taking into consideration the periods of heavier travel and the requirements of future service and the present and future growth of the community, the additional ferry service would further the public interest. The commission stressed the importance of service in which the petitioner herein had been found wanting, but based its conclusion also on the estimates of future business available to both companies. These estimates, submitted by engineers and other witnesses for the respective parties, were not in accord. This might be expected in the ordinary course of such a hearing. The necessary inference from the opinion of the Commission on this phase of the matter is that no injustice would be meted out to the petitioner herein by the installation of the new service. This implied finding is attempted to be utterly destroyed by the statement of the commission that, from an analysis of the estimates on probable future business, "there arises some question as to whether or not sufficient additional traffic can be developed, with the two companies operating, so that each will enjoy a profitable business." Obviously there was a question presented to the commission on that issue, and, while the finding thereon is not as definite as might be desired, there is sufficient in the record to justify the conclusion that under all the circumstances appearing in the case, both from the standpoint of service and future business, the public interest would be subserved by the granting of the certificate, and that each company could operate at a profit.

[3] It is vital, then, to consider the scope of the power vested in this court to set aside an order of the commission under the record here presented. Upon the reorganization of the Railroad Commission in 1911 by the adoption of sections 22 and 23 of article 12 of the Constitution and the re-enactment of the Public Utilities Act in 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 115), a new policy with reference to the regulation and control of public utilities in this state was promulgated. The new policy proceeded generally on the theory of regulated monopoly. But it did not go the length of guaranteeing monopoly in all cases. Throughout the legislation runs the unbroken thread that the public interest is first to be considered. The administration of the new law was placed in the hands of the railroad commission, unhampered and uncontrolled by court interference, except to a specified and limited extent. Section 67 of the Public Utilities Act, with reference to the powers of this court, provides in part: "The review shall not be extended further than to determine whether the commission has regularly pursued its authority, including a determination of whether the order or decision under review violates any right of the petitioner under the constitution of the United States, or of the State of California. The findings and conclusions * * * on questions of fact shall be final and shall not be subject to review; such questions of fact shall include ultimate facts and the findings and conclusions of the commission on reasonableness and discrimination. * * * No court of this state (except the supreme court to the extent herein specified) shall have jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct or annul any order or decision of the commission. * * *" In Clemmons v. Railroad Commission, 173 Cal. 254, at page 258, 159 P. 713, 714, it was said that "the Legislature might have withheld from the courts of the state any power of reviewing the acts of the Commission. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Eshleman, supra [166 Cal. 640, 137 P. 1119, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822]. The power of review which is given must be exercised within the limits and upon the conditions which the Legislature has seen fit to fix." In Oro Electric Corporation v. Railroad Commission, 169 Cal. 466, at page 471, 147 P. 118, 119, this court said: "The validity of section 67 of the Public Utilities Act, in so far as it limits the scope of review by state courts of the acts of the Commission, must be regarded as finally settled by the Telephone Company Case. By that section, the findings and conclusions of the Commission on questions of fact are made final and not subject to review. Here the Commission found the ultimate fact that the public convenience and necessity did not require the exercise of the privileges in controversy, and neither the sufficiency of the evidence, nor the soundness of the reasoning, upon which that finding was based, can be considered on this proceeding." Again, referring to said section 67, it was said in Sexton v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., 173 Cal. 760, 161 P. 748, 749: "The clear intent of the provision as a whole is to place the commission, in so far as the state courts are concerned, in a position where it may not be hampered in the performance of any official act by any court, except to the extent and in the manner specified in the act itself." See, also, Truck Owners, etc., Inc., v. Superior Court, 194 Cal. 146, 228 P. 19.

Counsel for the petitioner rely on the cases of Marin Water, etc., Co. v. Railroad Commission, 171 Cal. 706, 154 P. 864, Ann.

Cas. 1917C, 114; Allen v. Railroad Commission, 179 Cal. 68, 175 P. 466, 8 A. L. R. 249; and Traber v. Railroad Commission, 183 Cal. 304, 191 P. 366, 368, as laying down the rule applicable to the present case. In the Traber Case this court said: "Notwithstanding the declaration of section 67 that the commission's determination of matters of fact are not subject to review, it must be held that its determination upon the question whether or not the facts existing are sufficient to bring the case within the scope of its powers must be subject to review, so far as they present a question of law bearing upon that subject, and that the provision that the 'conclusions' of the commission on the facts are final does not apply to facts necessary to the existence of the jurisdiction of the commission to act. Del Mar, etc., Co. v. Eshleman, 167 Cal. 677, 140 P. 591, 948. But if the evidence in proof of such facts is substantial in character, and justifies the inference or conclusion that the facts necessary to the jurisdiction of the commission did exist, then, under the general principles of law regarding the proceeding in certiorari, its decision as to the effect of such evidence is binding and conclusive on the reviewing court." But here no question as to the jurisdiction of the commission to proceed is involved. The power of the Commission to entertain the application for the certificate cannot be disputed.

From other jurisdictions the petitioner cites cases, first from Illinois, which it claims supports its contentions. In that state the Illinois Commerce Commission Act was passed in 1921 (Laws 1921, p. 702). Sections 68 and 69 of that act provide for an appeal to the circuit or superior court "for the purpose of having the reasonableness or lawfulness of the rule, regulation, order or decision inquired into and determined. * * * The findings and conclusions of the Commission on questions of fact shall be held prima facie to be true and as found by the Commission." It then provides that any order or decision of the commission shall not be set aside "unless it clearly appears that the finding of the Commission was against the manifest weight of the evidence * * * or that the same was without the jurisdiction of the Commission. * * * Appeals * * * shall be governed by the rules applying to chancery cases appealed to said Supreme Court, except that formal pleadings shall not be required." In the cases applying that law the court proceeded to and did pass upon the weight of the evidence and the reasonableness of the order or decision. But the powers of our court are much more restricted and circumscribed. We may not thus weigh the evidence.

Cases cited from other states expounding theories of regulated monopoly or restricted competition under particular statutes are likewise not helpful in defining the powers of the respondent commission and of this court under our law. There is a clear distinction between a law which permits the court to review the evidence and one which so plainly prohibits it.

[4] The phrase "public convenience and necessity" cannot be defined so as to fit all cases. The word "necessity" must be taken in a relative sense. The Supreme Court of Illinois has well expressed its meaning in Wabash, C. & W. Ry. Co. v. Commerce Commission, 309 Ill. 412, 141 N. E. 212, 214, where it was said: "When the statute requires a certificate of public convenience and necessity as a prerequisite to the construction or extension of any public utility, the word 'necessity' is not used in its lexicographical sense of 'indispensably requisite.' If it were, no certificate of public convenience and necessity could ever be granted. The first telephone was not a public necessity under such a definition, nor was the first electric light. Even the construction of a waterworks system in a village is seldom necessary, though highly desirable. However, any improvement which is highly important to the public convenience and desirable for the public welfare may be regarded as necessary. If it is of sufficient importance to warrant the expense of making it, it is a public necessity. Park & Boulevard Com'rs v. Moesta, 91 Mich. 149, 51 N. W. 903. A thing which is expedient is a necessity. Warden v. Madisonville, H. & E. R. Co., 128 Ky. 563, 108 S. W. 880. Inconvenience may be so great as to amount to necessity. Lawton v. Rivers, 2 McCord (S. C.) 445, 13 Am. Dec. 741. A strong or urgent reason why a thing should be done creates a necessity for doing it. Todd v. Flcurnoy, 56 Ala. 99, 28 Am. Rep. 758. The word connotes different degrees of necessity. It sometimes means indispensable; at others, needful, requisite, or conducive. It is relative rather than absolute. No definition can be given that would fit all statutes. The meaning must be ascertained by reference to the context, and to the objects and purposes of the statute in which it is found. Wisconsin Teleph. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 162 Wis. 383, 156 N. W. 614, L. R. A. 1916E, 748, P. U. R. 1916D, 212. The Commerce Commission has a right to, and should, look to the future as well as to the present situation. Public utilities are expected to provide for the public necessities, not only to-day, but to anticipate for all future developments reasonably to be foreseen. The necessity to be provided for is not only the existing urgent need, but the need to be expected in the future, so far as it may be anticipated from the development of the community, the growth of industry, the increase in wealth and population, and all the elements to be expected in the progress of a community."

The respondent commission has discussed at length its views with reference to the new policy of the law in this state advanced by the Constitution and the statute on the question of regulated monopoly and competition. Pacific Gas and Electric Co. v. Great Western Power Co., 1 C. R. C. 203; In re Oro Electric Corp., 2 C. R. C. 738, and In re United Parcel Service, 32 C. R. C. 82. There is nothing in their declarations of policy inconsistent with the order now under attack. The policy as declared by the statute and applied by the Commission has never gone to the length of guaranteeing monopoly in all cases, but has at all times deemed the public interest as of paramount importance. It has announced that, when an existing utility has fallen short of its full duty to the public, it will not necessarily be protected against competition, and that its activities before and at the time competition knocks at the door may be taken into consideration, notwithstanding protestations of better behavior in the future. The commission has never foreclosed itself, even if it could, from acting favorably on an application for a certificate, the consideration of which is so peculiarly within its own jurisdiction. The discretion of the commission in such matters is very broad. In discussing this question with reference to the powers of a similar commission, the Supreme Court of Kansas said: "The discretionary power of the commission to grant or withhold certificates of convenience to public utility companies is broader than its power to govern rates and services of such companies. In the exercise of the latter powers, the lawful scope of the commission's orders is hedged about by statutory and constitutional guaranties and inhibitions. In the granting or withholding of certificates of convenience, no justiciable question touching confiscation of property or impairment of vested rights can well arise. Time and again this court, in consonance with the prevailing attitude of courts throughout the country, has declared that it will not substitute its judgment for that of some administrative tribunal created by legislative authority for dealing with matters of nonjudicial character; and certainly the question whether a competing gas company should be licensed to serve industrial plants in and around Wichita and Hutchinson is peculiarly a question for an official board to determine and one with which a judicial tribunal should be slow to meddle." Kansas, G. & E. Co. v. Public Service Commission, 122 Kan. 462, 251 P. 1097, 1099.

[5] That reasonable minds might differ as to the wisdom of the order, illustrated by the fact that three members of the commission voted for the same with two dissenting, would tend to uphold rather than to destroy the order. We conclude that there is sufficient in the record to justify the decision, and that the findings are not inconsistent with the order made.

The order is affirmed.

ASADOORIAN v. KLUDJIAN.
S. F. 13352.

Supreme Court of California.

1. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨308(1).

Whether transfer is in fraud of creditors is question of fact and not of law.

2. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨273.

One attacking validity of transfer as in fraud of creditors has burden, where transfer is for consideration, of establishing actual fraudulent intent.

3. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨295(1).

Fraud, as respects validity of transfer, must ultimately be proved by preponderance of evidence, regardless of prima facie case (Civ. Code, § 3439).

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Charles R. Barnard, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Zaroohi Asadoorian against S. Kludjian. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

M. F. McCormick, of Fresno, for respondent.

LANGDON, J.

This is an action to quiet title to certain property. In another action commenced prior to this one, Kludjian, the defendant herein, sued Mr. and Mrs. Kandarian, respectively the stepfather and the mother of Mrs. Asadoorian, plaintiff herein, for money due under a promissory note. This suit was filed on February 6, 1928. It appeared that on February 3, 1928, Mrs. Kandarian had transferred the property in question to her daughter, Mrs. Asadoorian. Kludjian levied an attachment on this property, standing in the name of Mrs. Asadoorian, on the theory that the transfer to her was a conveyance in fraud of creditors. Mrs. Asadoorian then brought the present action to quiet title. Defendant Kludjian set up in his answer the facts concerning the other suit and attachment, and alleged that the deed from Mrs. Kandarian to Mrs. Asadoorian was made without consideration, and with the intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of Mr. and Mrs. Kandarian. The trial court found against the defendant on this issue, and gave a decree quieting plaintiff's title.

[1-3] Defendant's appeal is based upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the court. In this connection it is urged that from the evidence there appear various "badges" or "indicia" of fraud, which were sufficient to make out a prima facie case for the defendant, and to shift to the plaintiff the burden of proof as to the validity of the transaction. It is unnecessary to review these instances of suspicious conduct set forth by defendant, for it may be conceded that there are circumstances surrounding the transfer which might, if unexplained, compel the conclusion that the conveyance was fraudulent. Explanation was offered, and the result was a conflict in the evidence. It has been frequently held by this court that whether a transfer is in fraud of creditors is a question of fact and not of law, and, where the transfer is for consideration, as the court found in the instant case, it is necessary for the party attacking the validity of the transfer to establish an actual fraudulent intent. The burden of proof is on him, and, though the burden of going forward with the evidence may shift when a prima facie case is made out, fraud must ultimately be proved by a preponderance of the evidence. Civ. Code, § 3439; Rossen v. Villanueva, 175 Cal. 632, 166 P. 1004; Roberts v. Burr, 135 Cal. 156, 67 P. 46; Scholle v. Finnell, 167 Cal. 90, 138 P. 746; 12 Cal. Jur. 1045, § 87; 1057, § 96; 1059, § 97. The trial court resolved the conflict in the evidence in favor of the plaintiff, and an examination of the record discloses no ground upon which we would be justified in disturbing its conclusion.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Evidence disclosed that passenger's view of approaching train, which was approaching on passenger's right, was obstructed by trees, and that passenger looked only to left. Passenger testified that driver of truck always looked to right when approaching crossings, and that passenger could not see train from his position on truck.

3. Railroads ⇨350(32).

Whether truck driver's negligence proximately caused collision of train and truck at crossing held for jury under conflicting evidence as to obstruction of view and warning signals.

4. Witnesses ⇨329.

Cross-examination of railroad claim adjuster concerning signals at places other than place of accident, to test accuracy of adjuster's observation at place of accident, testified to on direct examination, held properly admitted.

Claim adjuster of railroad company sued for injuries sustained in collision with truck at crossing testified on cross-examination concerning observations made at scene of accident day after it occurred. On cross-examination, adjuster was asked whether he observed wigwag signals and red disc at crossing other than place where accident occurred and concerning visible surroundings of crossing. Plaintiff offered no evidence on question whether defendant railroad was negligent in failing to provide signals at crossing where accident occurred, and did not attempt to use answers of witness in argument. Court in its instruction stated that Railroad Commission had exclusive power to determine protection to be installed at crossing, and that there was no evidence that anything had been prescribed at crossing where accident occurred.

LANGDON, J.

This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment of the superior court of Alameda county, in favor of plaintiff, for damages for personal injuries.

The accident occurred at about 11 a. m. on August 2, 1927, in the city of Berkeley, at the intersection of the tracks of defendant company with Blake street. The street runs east and west, and the tracks cross it at an angle, running northwesterly and southeasterly. On the morning of the accident, plaintiff's older brother, Alfred Wagner, employed to make deliveries by a local ice company, was driving his truck on his business. Plaintiff, a boy of 14, who occasionally rode with him and assisted, sat on the right hand of the driver. They proceeded in an easterly direction on Blake street and approached the crossing at a speed of about 8 to 10 miles per hour. A train operated by defendant company was at the time approaching Blake street from the south at a speed of about 25 miles per hour. The driver did not see the train until he was about 15 feet from the tracks, and, upon sighting it, swerved suddenly to the left and applied the brakes, but failed to avert the collision. He was unhurt, but plaintiff sustained serious injuries.

The case was tried before a jury, and a verdict was returned in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $12,500.

As its first ground of appeal, defendant urges that its motion for a nonsuit should have been granted because plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. The evidence shows that both the driver and plaintiff were familiar with the crossing and aware of the fact that they were coming to it. This being so, it is contended that it was the duty of plaintiff, as well as the driver, to keep a lookout for approaching trains. Plaintiff testified that he looked to the left, but not to the right. Upon this single piece of evidence rests the claim of negligence as a matter of law.

[1] This point is without support, either in the law or the facts. The law does not demand of a passenger the same high degree of observation as it requires of the driver, for the passenger has not, in the ordinary case, any actual control over the driver. He is normally bound to protest against actual negligence or recklessness of the driver, but the extent of his duty depends upon the particular circumstances of each case, and is a question for the jury. Marchetti v. Southern Pacific Co., 204 Cal. 679, 269 P. 529; Curran v. Earle C. Anthony, Inc., 77 Cal. App. 462, 247 P. 236. Moreover, plaintiff explained why he did not look to the right. It appears that there were two trees on Blake street which one's eyes encountered in looking to the right, and plaintiff declared: "You couldn't see where I was sitting." He also testified, on cross-examination, as follows:

"Q. You did not look to your right or south to see if there was a train coming? A. No, my brother always looked that way, he looks one way and I look the other. He looks both ways.

"Q. You saw your brother looking to the right, and you thought it was not necessary for you to look that way; is that right? A. Yes, sir."

[2] Under the circumstances, it is apparent that the question of contributory negligence was properly left to the jury.

[3] Defendant also contends that the court should have granted its motion for a directed verdict, on the ground that the evidence positively establishes defendant's freedom from negligence and points to the negligence of the driver of the truck as the proximate cause of the accident. We have read the record, and have arrived at no such conclusion. The evidence is sharply conflicting on the extent to which the trees obscured the view of the driver and on the question whether the proper warning signals were given by the train. This issue, like that of contributory negligence, was properly left to the jury.

Defendant assigns as error the giving of certain instructions, as well as the refusal to give others; and various rulings of the court on the admissibility of evidence are also attacked. No useful purpose would be served by an extensive comparison of the numerous instructions requested by defendant with those actually given by the court. We have carefully examined them all, and we believe that no prejudicial error was committed by the court in this connection. Nor do we find any suggestion of substantial error in the rulings on evidence. Of these rulings, the one chiefly complained of here is the admission of testimony with regard to wigwag signals, under the following circumstances: Defendant called as a witness one of its claim adjusters, who gave testimony concerning his observations and photographs made at the scene of the accident the day after it occurred. On cross-examination, counsel for plaintiff questioned him in some detail as to his recollection of the matters on which he had given evidence on direct examination, and particularly on the physical surroundings of the crossing. During this question, the following occurred:

"Q. Where did you make your observations from, the two observations you now speak of? A. About 125 feet south of Blake street, and the edge of Parker street.

"Q. What were you standing on when you made the observation at Parker street? A. The roof of a coach.

"Q. Oh, you were on a train? A. I was.

"Q. I see. And when you were up there on that coach at Parker street did you observe any warning signal? A. I did not notice anything.

"Q. Didn't you notice a wig-wag signal, a red disc, swinging back and forth when the train comes?

"Mr. Lockwood: That is objected to as not proper cross-examination, and irrelevant, incompetent and immaterial.

"A. I did.

"The Court: Overruled.

"Mr. Johnson: Q. As you look from 125 feet—at that point up the railroad track, the next street beyond Blake is Dwight, and the crossing is right out in kind of a hayfield at Dwight way, isn't it? A. No, I don't think there is any hayfield there.

"Q. Are there any houses built up close? A. Yes, there is some.

"Q. Is there any house there close to the track on the west of the Santa Fe, at Dwight way, the next block to the north? A. Yes, sir.

"Mr. Lockwood: That is objected to as irrelevant, incompetent and immaterial, and not proper cross-examination.

"The Court: Overruled.

"Mr. Johnson: Q. And at Dwight way you likewise saw a big automobile disc when you came along with your coach, swinging back and forth, indicating the approach of a train, didn't you?

"Mr. Lockwood: That is objected to as irrelevant, incompetent and immaterial, not proper cross-examination, and no bearing upon any of the issues in this case.

"The Court: Overruled.

"A. I did not notice it. I never paid any attention to it.

"Mr. Johnson: Q. Well, don't you know it is there, from your observations?

"Mr. Lockwood: The same objection, and for the further reason that it is prejudicial, and irrelevant, incompetent and immaterial, and not proper cross-examination.

"The Court: Overruled.

"A. Yes, I know it is there."

Similar questioning was directed by counsel for plaintiff to the witness Fenton, fireman of the train, with respect to his recollection of what occurred and what he observed in the locality just prior to the accident; and similar testimony was elicited.

[4] Defendant asserts that the admission of this testimony constituted prejudicial error, which could not be cured by any subsequent instruction by the court. It may be conceded that, in the absence of a proper foundation, evidence of the signals or other precautionary devices maintained at other places would be inadmissible to show a lack of care on the part of the defendant in failing to maintain such devices at the crossing involved in the present action. Such was not, however, the purpose of the questioning. Plaintiff raised no issue in the pleadings, and offered no evidence on the question whether defendant was negligent by reason of failure to provide wigwag signals at the crossing. The cross-examination was conducted with the asserted object of testing the accuracy of the observations made by defendant's witnesses. Many searching questions were asked of these witnesses, and in several instances they could not remember distances nor objects observed. It even appears that they were at first uncertain as to whether there were such signals at the other streets.

[5, 6] It has always been the law that testimony may be admissible, if competent, relevant, and material for any purpose, even though it might be inadmissible for another purpose, provided that the court sufficiently limits its purpose by an appropriate instruction to the jury. A full discussion of this proposition may be found in Adkins v. Brett, 184 Cal. 252, where Mr. Justice Olney says on page 256, 193 P. 251, 253: "The rule upon this point, which is one of well-nigh everyday application in actual trial, is thus stated by Wigmore (volume 1 p. 42): 'In other words, when an evidentiary fact is offered for one purpose, and becomes admissible by satisfying all the rules applicable to it in that capacity, it is not inadmissible because it does not satisfy the rules applicable to it in some other capacity, and because the jury might improperly consider it in the latter capacity. This doctrine, although involving certain risks, is indispensable as a practical rule.'" See, also, 10 Cal. Jur. 813, § 105. The rule should be particularly applicable to cross-examination, where a wide latitude is generally allowed, and the court's discretionary power is very broad. See 27 Cal. Jur. 97, § 76.

Counsel for plaintiff made no attempt to use the answers thus elicited in his argument, and the court instructed the jury on the point as follows: "Under the laws of the State of California, the railroad commission is given the exclusive power to determine and prescribe the protection to be installed at each crossing of a street by a railroad, or a railroad by a street. There is no evidence that the commission has prescribed or required the installation by the railway company of any protection at the Blake street crossing." By this unequivocal instruction, the court properly restricted the purpose of examination, and, under the circumstances, we must conclude that no error is shown. Other errors assigned are without merit.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

MILO v. PRIOR.
S. F. 13864.

1. Judgment ☞197.

Judgment without prejudice is not proper, where cause is tried and submitted on merits.

2. Appeal and error ☞14(2).

Appeal may be taken from judgment entered pursuant to direction of appellate court.

3. Judgment ☞197.

Without prejudice provision in judgment held not severable from entire judgment, and to qualify every part thereof.

4. Appeal and error ☞839(1).

Where appeal was from "without prejudice" provision in judgment, held appellate court could review entire judgment; portion appealed from not being severable.

5. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 1176(1).

Where plaintiff waived findings and conclusions when court erroneously announced judgment "without prejudice," held judgment should be reversed, with direction to enter new judgment upon merits.

Had plaintiff known that judgment was to go, upon appeal, for defendant without reservation or qualification, plaintiff undoubtedly would have insisted on findings so as to be able better to present case on appeal. Having thus prejudiced herself by reason of trial court's error, she should not now be penalized by being required to appeal from judgment unsupported by findings, and judgment should be reversed, and trial court directed to enter judgment upon merits between parties upon evidence and record before it when cause was submitted for decision.

WASTE, C. J.

This is an action for damages for personal injuries suffered by the plaintiff in an automobile collision alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. Two other actions between other parties, based upon the same collision, were consolidated with this action for trial, all being tried upon the same evidence by the court sitting without a jury. The court gave judgment in each case, denying relief to each of the several plaintiffs and cross-complainants. In this action, judgment was announced for the defendant "without prejudice." The parties to this action waived findings of fact, and, in conformity with its pronouncement, the court gave judgment for the defendant "without prejudice to plaintiff's bringing a new action herein, if so advised." Defendant prosecutes this appeal from the quoted portion of the judgment, contending that, the action having been fully tried and submitted on the merits, the judgment should have been a final judgment between the parties, and not merely a judgment without prejudice.

[1, 2] The court below erred in entering such a judgment. A cause tried and submitted on its merits should never result in a judgment without prejudice. Parsons v. Riley, 33 W. Va. 464, 10 S. E. 806. The real issue between the parties upon this appeal concerns the order to be made by this court. The appellant argues that the judgment as entered is, in effect, a judgment in his favor, and that this court should therefore modify the same by striking therefrom a surplusage that portion declaring it to be without prejudice. In advancing this contention the appellant asserts that the objectionable part of the judgment is clearly severable from the remainder of the judgment, which has not been appealed from, and should, therefore, be stricken therefrom. In order to protect the respondent's rights in the premises, appellant suggests that, as a part of the order of modification, we should reserve to the respondent the right, to be exercised within the statutory period, if she be so advised, to move for a new trial or to appeal from the judgment entered pursuant to our direction. That an appeal may be taken from a judgment entered pursuant to the direction of an appellate court is well settled. Tuffree v. Stearns Ranchos Co., 124 Cal. 306, 310, 57 P. 69; Sala v. City of Pasadena, 162 Cal. 714, 722, 124 P. 539.

[3, 4] However, we are not prepared to conclude that the objectionable part of the judgment is severable. While the court should have given judgment on the merits without reservation or qualification, it is impossible to ascertain upon the record now before us whether or not the trial court, were it cognizant of its inability to enter a judgment "without prejudice," would have given judgment for the defendant. In other words, we cannot say upon this appeal that a judgment for appellant is the only judgment on the merits warranted by the evidence, nor that the trial judge was of the opinion that appellant was entitled to a judgment upon the merits. This being so, we must assume that the reservation must, of necessity, enter into and qualify each and every part of the judgment. The judgment is an entirety. Wanzer v. Self, 30 Ohio St. 378. Though the entire judgment has not been appealed from, it may, nevertheless, be reviewed by an appellate court when the portion appealed from is not severable. In re Yoder, 199 Cal. 699, 704, 251 P. 205; Whalen v. Smith, 163 Cal. 360, 362, 125 P. 904, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 1319.

[5] However, even if we were to assume that the objectionable part of the judgment is severable, appellant's proposal that there be reserved to respondent the right to move for a new trial or to appeal from the modified judgment does not protect her. After the judgment has been modified, as suggested by appellant, it is conceivable the record may be such that an order granting a new trial would amount to a gross abuse of discretion upon the part of the trial court, subject to reversal upon an appeal therefrom. Nor do we think an appeal from the modified judgment solves the problem. As a result of the trial court's oral pronouncement that judgment would be given for the appellant "without prejudice" to the filing of a new suit, the respondent, apparently relying thereon, waived findings of fact and conclusions of law. In an action tried without a jury, findings are all important to a potential appellant. Had respondent known that judgment was to go for the appellant without reservation or qualification, undoubtedly she would have insisted on findings so as to better present her case on appeal from such unqualified judgment. Having thus prejudiced herself by reason of the trial court's error, she should not now be penalized to the extent of being required to appeal from a judgment unsupported by findings.

The judgment is therefore reversed and the trial court is directed to enter a judgment upon the merits between the parties hereto upon the evidence and record before it when the cause was submitted to it for decision.

Culver & Nourse and Paul Nourse, all of Los Angeles, and Emmons, Aldrich & Mack, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Victor A. Dunn, of Oakland, and Siemon & Garber, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is an action for damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff when the automobile he was driving collided with the rear end of the defendant's truck and trailer which were headed in the same direction as the plaintiff's car. The answer interposed the plea of contributory negligence. The jury found negligence on the part of the defendant and against the plea of contributory negligence. The defendant appeals from a judgment on the verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

Two major points are urged for reversal: First, that the evidence fails to establish the negligence of the defendant; and, secondly, that the evidence establishes the negligence of the plaintiff as matter of law.

[1, 2] As to the defendant's alleged negligence, the evidence was substantially in conflict. The accident occurred about 2 a. m. on November 29, 1926. At that time the plaintiff was driving his automobile in a northerly direction on the Ridge road toward Bakersfield. According to the evidence favorable to the plaintiff, the defendant's truck and trailer were parked entirely on the paved portion of the highway. Directly opposite the defendant's truck and trailer, and on the other side of the highway, facing southerly, stood another parked truck, the property of a third person. The headlights on this second truck were shining brightly and blinded the plaintiff for a distance of about 150 feet behind the defendant's trailer. The plaintiff was traveling at a speed of about 25 miles per hour when his car entered the blinding rays of light from the second truck and he slowed his speed down to 15 miles per hour, at which rate he was traveling when he first saw the defendant's trailer. He then swerved to the left and applied his brakes to the utmost of their capacity. He was within about 4 feet of coming to a dead stop when he ran into the pipes extending from the rear end of the defendant's trailer. The defendant's negligence is clearly shown, and, under the facts appearing in the record, a brief outline of which is given above, we are of the opinion that it was a question of fact for the jury whether the plaintiff did everything that a reasonable man would have done under like circumstances to safeguard the life and property of others and to avoid injury to himself.

Affirmed.

R. 1027, is not controlling. There the court on appeal concluded that the plaintiff's intestate was entirely free from negligence; that the defendant's employee was guilty of negligence, and that the findings of the trial court to the contrary were unsupported by the evidence. It was there said that after the glare of the approaching headlights first obscured his vision the defendant's employee proceeded on with a degree of recklessness and indifference "closely approaching, if indeed, not amounting, under the circumstances as revealed by his own testimony, to gross negligence." We cannot so characterize the conduct of the plaintiff herein, nor, under the evidence, hold him guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. No other points require discussion.

NOURSE, P. J.

The petitioners here seek an original writ of prohibition to restrain the respondents from proceeding on an order to show cause why the petitioners should not be punished for contempt of an injunction pendente lite previously issued by the respondent.

[1] The petitioners do not attack the preliminary papers upon which the order to show cause was issued, but base their case in an attack upon the validity of the injunction pendente lite, which injunction was issued on July 22, 1930. The petition herein for prohibition was filed August 25, 1930, and, aside from the fact that it is a collateral attack upon the order of the respondent court made July 22, 1930, the petitioners have mistaken their remedy in thus proceeding in prohibition to prevent the hearing of the contempt proceedings. The rule applicable here is found in Wessels v. Superior Court, 200 Cal. 403, 253 P. 135, where the Supreme Court say: "The remedy of the petitioner is to first present his defense upon the hearing of the contempt proceedings, and then, if found guilty of the contempt, to apply to a higher court for a writ of certiorari or habeas corpus. Commercial Bank v. Superior Court, 192 Cal. 395, 397, 220 P. 422; Drew v. Superior Court, 43 Cal. App. 651, 655, 185 P. 680."

[2] The reason for the foregoing rule is emphasized by the proceedings in this case, which show that on September 20, 1930, the petitioners filed their notice of appeal to the Supreme Court from the order of injunction pendente lite, thereby transferring to the latter court full jurisdiction to determine the validity of the order which they here seek to attack.

For these reasons the petition is denied and the proceedings dismissed.

WEINREICH et al. v. VERNON et al.
Civ. 6007.District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.
Oct. 14, 1930.Landlord and tenant ⇨214.

Payment of advance rent under lease not requiring return by lessor cannot be set up in action on note given for rent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry R. Archbald, Judge.

Action by I. J. Weinreich and another against J. R. Vernon and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Homer C. Mills, of Long Beach, for appellants.

Henry M. Lee, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

YORK, J.

This is an action on a promissory note which apparently was given by the defendants to plaintiffs in payment of rent for the month of June, 1925. The defendants alleged by way of answer to the complaint that said note "has been fully paid by reason of the retention by the plaintiffs of certain sums of money held on deposit by them to secure the performance of a certain lease theretofore entered into between the plaintiffs and defendants."

On trial, objection was made by plaintiffs to the introduction of any evidence to sustain said allegation of payment, which objection was sustained by the court. This appeal is taken from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs. It is contended by appellants that the trial court erred in making its findings of fact and conclusions of law, in rendering judgment for the plaintiffs, and also in sustaining the objection above referred to.

The only reference made in the lease to the sums of money alleged to have been held on deposit by the plaintiffs is as follows: "And receipt of the sum of $4,080 was and for the first month and the last four months of the term is hereby acknowledged by first parties." The words "was and for" should be read "as and for." From this it appears that the money was received by the lessor as being in full payment of the first month and the last four months of the term, or advance rent. No contingencies are recited in the lease whereby it should be returned to the lessee; in fact, nothing more than the sentence above quoted is said regarding it.

"Where the lessee makes an advance payment in cash and notes for the last two months' rent of the premises and is dispossessed for default in the payment of rent, he cannot, in actions on the notes and for unpaid rent, set up the advance payment as a counterclaim on the theory that it is a deposit to secure the payment of rent." Forgotston v. Brafman (Sup.) 84 N. Y. S. 237. The case of Wetzler v. Patterson, 73 Cal. App. 527, 238 P. 1077, 1078, holds: "The general rule deducible from the authorities is that rent paid in advance cannot be recovered by the tenant upon the termination of the lease for condition broken, when such termination was not brought about by the wrongful act of the landlord. [Citing cases.] * * * 'Provision is sometimes made in a lease for the payment in advance of the rents of the last or later periods of the lease, and such a provision has been held not to be a security merely for the lessee's performance of his agreements in the lease, but purely a payment of rent in advance, and therefore may be retained by the lessor though he terminates the lease for the default of the lessee as provided for in the lease.' 16 R. C. L. p. 931."

For the reasons stated, it was not error for the trial court to sustain the objection to the offered evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

SLATER v. PACIFIC AMERICAN OIL CO.*
Civ. 217.District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.
Oct. 21, 1930.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing
Nov. 15, 1930.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court
Dec. 18, 1930.

1. Waters and water courses ⇨45.

Several companies contributing substances injuring plaintiff's land held separate tortfeasors.

2. Torts ⇨22.

Court may exercise liberal hand in determining contribution to injury between several tortfeasors from evidence.

3. Waters and water courses ⇨45.

Where land was injured by substances contributed by several companies, defendant would be liable only for portion of damage which its contribution to whole bore to injury.

Plaintiff's land was damaged by deposit on land of oil, salt, and hydrocarbon substances negligently permitted to run down ravine onto plaintiff's land and contributed by several companies whose wells drained into ravine. Evidence did not disclose quantity of oil, salt, or hydrocarbon substances flowing into ravine from defendant's wells, and that were washed down on plaintiff's lands, but disclosed that some of said substances reached ravine from defendant's property.

4. Waters and water courses ⚡49.

Evidence that defendant contributed some of substances damaging land, but not showing basis for determining proportion, did not support finding that defendant's contribution caused certain amount of injury and for injunction.

5. Waters and water courses ⚡49.

Plaintiff suing for damages to land by injurious substances contributed by several companies must show quantity contributed by defendant compared to total volume causing injury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; James L. Allen, Judge.

Action by W. F. Slater against the Pacific American Oil Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Ben S. Hunter and James Farraher, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Charles D. Swanner, of Santa Ana, for respondent.

WARMER, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by the defendant Pacific American Oil Company from a judgment entered by the trial court in an action for damages. Respondent was the owner of 60 acres of valuable farm land near Huntington Beach, Cal. South of respondent's land and extending in a general easterly and westerly direction is a range of hills which slope to the north and extend to approximately the southern line of respondent's land. Originating on the northerly slope of said hills and extending therefrom in a general northerly direction and to the southerly line of respondent's land, there exists a ravine, which is a natural watercourse, and during the rainy season of each year the rain that falls upon the hills naturally drains and runs into said ravine and is conducted thereby to the southerly line of respondent's land, at which place the water flowing in said ravine naturally flows upon, over and across the respondent's land. There is a small ravine running down from said hills and adjoining the large ravine on appellant's property at about the point where the sump holes hereinafter mentioned were located. During the year of 1927 appellant was operating oil wells upon said range of hills on which several other companies were also operating oil wells. At the foot of said ravine, and adjoining respondent's property, there were several sump holes that were filled with oil, from the wells of appellant and other companies operating wells on said range of hills. There was a storm in February, 1927, and the rainwater falling upon said hills during said storm naturally flowed down the range of hills and down said ravine, carrying oil, salt, and other hydrocarbon substances from said ravine and sump holes over upon the respondent's property, where it was deposited, and the damage from which is herein sought to be recovered.

The complaint alleges that plaintiff was damaged by the deposit on his land of oil and salt and hydrocarbon substances; that the defendant corporation negligently permitted same to run down the ravine and onto the lands of the plaintiff; and prays for an injunction and damages. The answer denies the allegations of the complaint as to damages and negligence and sets up a separate defense, alleging that the damages to plaintiff's land, if any were sustained, were due to the joint acts and omissions of certain other corporations, and that said companies had paid plaintiff in full for all of the damage sustained and said companies had been released from all claim or demand growing or arising out of the facts alleged in the complaint. Appellant urges that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings, making a number of specifications in this regard. The evidence shows there were about 30 oil wells draining into the ravine; that defendant company owned and operated two of such wells; that the oil that was in the ravine was an accumulation from all of the oil wells. The evidence does not disclose the quantity of the flow of oil, salt, or hydrocarbon substances from the wells of the defendant into the ravine that were washed down upon the plaintiff's lands. The evidence as to the flow of oil, salt, and hydrocarbon substances from the appellant's wells and sumps on the occasion complained of in this action is not from the testimony of eyewitnesses who saw the same drained into the ravine or the sumps overflowing, but is from the testimony of witnesses who testified to seeing evidences of overflow from the defendant's sumps shortly subsequent to the storm that caused the oil, salt, and hydrocarbon substances to be washed down on the plaintiff's property, and while not very clear and convincing, yet there is some evidence of the fact that some of said substances reached the ravine from the sumps of the defendant company.

[1] The respondent admits that the defendant is only one of a number of contributors to the flow that caused the damage, but maintains that the defendant was a separate tortfeasor. This position of the respondent is not directly challenged by the appellant, nor could it be successfully, for, as said in Miller v. Highland Ditch Co., 87 Cal. 430, 25 P. 550, 551, 22 Am. St. Rep. 254: "It is clear that the rule, as established by the general authorities, is that an action at law for damages cannot be maintained against several defendants jointly when each acted independently of the others, and there was no concert, or unity of design, between them. It is held that, in such a case, the tort of each defendant was several when committed, and that it does not become joint because afterwards its consequences united with the consequences of several other torts committed by other persons."

The record discloses that plaintiff's land was damaged by a deposit thereon of oil, salt, and hydrocarbon substances; that the total volume of the oil, salt, and hydrocarbon substances that caused said damage came from several independent sources.

There is no evidence as to the total quantity of oil, salt, and hydrocarbon substances that caused the damage or as to the quantity that defendant contributed to the total volume. Neither is there any evidence as to the percentage that the defendant's contributions bore to the whole.

Stating it in another way, plaintiff's land was injured by a deposit thereon of oil, salt, and hydrocarbon substances that came from a ravine, along the banks of which were 30 wells that contributed in some degree, more or less, to the full quantity of the injurious substances so deposited on the plaintiff's lands. Plaintiff proved the injury to his lands caused by said injurious deposits, but offered no evidence to prove the percentage of contribution by the defendant. However, the court finds that for its separate tort the defendant caused damage to the plaintiff in the sum of $3,200, and granted an injunction. Defendant contends that without evidence as to the proportion of contribution by the defendant, or evidence from which the proportion of the contribution of the defendants could be computed, the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding. Respondent relies upon the case of California Orange Co. v. Riverside Portland Cement Co., 50 Cal. App. 522, 195 P. 694, 695, as authority for the court to make such a finding. In that case the orange orchard was located on a piece of high bench land situated on the northerly bank of the Santa Ana river in Riverside county, about midway between the defendant's cement mill and the cement mills of the California Portland Cement Company. There was no question but that cement in considerable quantities from the mills of the California Portland Cement Company, as well as from the defendant's mill, settled upon the plaintiff's orange trees, coating the leaves with a white ash and dust which incrustrated from the action of dew and moisture, so that it neither could be washed off by the rains, nor blown off by the winds, but remained on the leaves for the period of their life, that is, for two or three years. The court said, in determining the amount of damages that should be assessed against this defendant:

"The trial court was at liberty to estimate as best it could, from the evidence before it, how much of the total damage caused by the operations of the two cement companies was occasioned by defendant's plant, and in doing so might measure with a liberal hand the amount of damage caused by defendant's mill. (Citing cases.) Though in cases of this sort entire accuracy is impossible, and the difficulty of accurately proportioning and assessing the damage done by defendant's mill is great, still that difficulty would have been avoided had defendant but taken care that no occasion should arise requiring such proportioning and assessing of the whole damages."

[2, 3] The court particularly points out that there was no question raised by the appellant cement company in that case, that it was charged with more than its total proportion of the damages caused by the plants of the two companies. This point was not raised. In that case the evidence showed an estimate of the quantity of the cement dust attributable by the several contributors to the deposit of cement dust on the plaintiff's land, and in addition thereto, there is direct testimony as to the contribution to the whole. Applying the rule stated in California Orange Co. v. Riverside Portland Cement Co., supra, it would appear that the exact contribution as between several tortfeasors may be difficult of exact admeasurement, and a court may exercise a liberal hand in arriving at a judgment in the matter; yet the court must arrive at the judgment from the evidence before it. The defendant is liable only for such portion of the total damage resulting from the commingled oil, salt, and hydrocarbon substances, which its contribution to the whole bore to the injury. Miller v. Highland Ditch Co., supra.

[4] Assuming that the total amount of oil, salt, and hydrocarbon substances deposited upon the plaintiff's land had been by actual measurement 100 barrels, that the defendant made some contribution thereto, and that the total injury done was $10,000, could it be said that a court, without any knowledge whatsoever as to the contribution by the defendant, and upon the statement alone that there was some contribution, could apportion the damages as between the several wrongdoers? We think not.

There being no evidence in the record upon which the court could make any finding as to the quantity of oil that came from the appellant's sumps and wells through the ravine and finally was deposited upon the plaintiff's land to its injury, and there being no evidence in the record to show the proportionate contribution of the defendant to the whole of the injurious substances so deposited on the plaintiff's land, there is no evidence to support the finding that the injury caused by the defendant's contribution was in the sum of $3,200 or for an injunction.

[5] In actions of this character a plaintiff must produce evidence as to the quantity of oil, salt, and hydrocarbon substances that the defendant contributed to the total volume that caused the injury to the plaintiff's land, in order to sustain a judgment for damages or injunction.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. HARVEY.
Cr. 1982.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.
Oct. 21, 1930.

1. Criminal law $\S$ 814(17), 1172(6).

General instruction, in murder prosecution, on circumstantial evidence, was improper, where killing was admitted, but was not reversible error.

2. Homicide $\S$ 230, 231.

Evidence of fight in which deceased received blow causing death did not show intent to kill and malice as to make killing murder.

3. Homicide $\S$ 250.

Evidence of fight in which defendant struck deceased with pipe, causing death, supported finding of manslaughter.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 922(2).

Error in refusing instruction that evidence did not warrant conviction of murder in first or second degree held not to warrant new trial (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1181).

5. Criminal law $\S$ 1184.

Judgment of murder in second degree may be modified to manslaughter by appellate court, where evidence supported only finding of manslaughter (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1181).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

William Ernest Harvey was convicted for murder in the second degree, and he appeals.

Modified and remanded, with directions to enter judgment of manslaughter.

SCHMIDT, Justice pro tem.

Appellant appeals from his conviction in the trial court of murder in the second degree and from the judgment thereon and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The killing is admitted. The facts and circumstances surrounding the killing rests entirely upon the extrajudicial statements of appellant and his wife given the police and the testimony of appellant and his wife given at the trial. There is substantially no conflict and very slight variance in the statements.

In the year 1927 the victim, Raymond Gottshal, and Lillian Harvey, wife of appellant here, were sweethearts, and in the latter part of that year lived together as man and wife without the formality of marriage. At that time Mrs. Harvey's name was Lillian French, but she was known and recognized by the name of Lillian Gottshal. Gottshal and Mrs. Harvey lived together until April or May, 1929, when Mrs. Harvey left Gottshal. In the latter part of the year 1928 Mrs. Harvey purchased with her own funds, taking title in the name of Lillian Gottshal, a lot located at Eighty-Ninth and Denker streets in the city of Los Angeles, upon which was built a double bungalow. After its completion Raymond and Lillian French, then known as Lillian Gottshal, moved into that part of the bungalow facing Eighty-Ninth street, and continued to live there until the separation hereinbefore stated. Lillian B. French, then known as Lillian B. Gottshal, at that time owned certain furniture which was placed in the house and was part of the furniture used by her and said Gottshal.

In June, 1929, said Lillian B. French commenced to "keep company" with appellant, and on September 1, 1929, married him, and continued to live with him as husband and wife up to the time of the fatal affray involved herein.

In the latter part of 1929 Lillian Harvey made efforts to eject Gottshal from the premises on Eighty-Ninth street, and for that purpose transferred the title to a niece, who brought legal proceedings to oust Gottshal, which proceedings were still pending at the time of the affray. Between the time of the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Harvey and the affray which resulted in the death of Gottshal, Gottshal had made numerous threats against appellant and his wife. No good purpose can be gained by setting out these threats in detail. In spite of these threats, appellant and his wife on the evening of March 1, 1930, drove to the Eighty-Ninth street premises in a Ford truck, believing Gottshal out of the city. Finding the house locked, a window in a French door was broken by appellant with a piece of pipe procured from his truck, which piece of pipe was claimed by appellant to be used by him to separate bundles in his delivery and collection of laundry, he being engaged in the laundry business as a route man. After breaking the window, appellant entered through the window, and his wife went around to the front of the house carrying the iron pipe, as stated by her, with the purpose of putting the same on the truck; but before she reached the truck appellant had opened the front door, and Mrs. Harvey dropped the iron pipe near the walkway which led from the porch to the sidewalk. Appellant and Mrs. Harvey then proceeded to collect the articles claimed by Mrs. Harvey to belong to her and to place them on the truck. They had hardly completed the removal of the articles to the truck when the decedent, Gottshal, drove up in another truck, jumped out, and rushed immediately toward appellant, who was at that time standing on the walkway, either by his truck or near same, used an opprobrious epithet in addressing appellant, and therewith struck appellant on the jaw, staggering him by reason of the force of the blow; almost simultaneously with this act of Gottshal Mrs. Harvey shouted to appellant, "Look out for the gun, he has got a gun." At this particular time the iron pipe was lying on the ground where left by Mrs. Harvey. Appellant picked up same and struck Gottshal with it. He (Harvey) testified that he feared for his own life as well as the life and safety of his wife. As a matter of fact, Gottshal did not have a gun on his person at the time, but it was undisputed that he usually carried his gun on Saturday evenings at the time he was making his laundry collections (the affray here involved took place on a Saturday evening). There is no dispute that Gottshal possessed a gun, same having been theretofore given to him as a Christmas present by Mrs. Harvey while she was living with him. Following the blow with the pipe, the two men continued to fight and struggle over the possession of the pipe, resulting in appellant's being struck several times on the legs by Gottshal while the pipe was in his possession. As the struggle continued, the pipe was abandoned and the men fought into the house, where they finally ceased fighting, when Gottshal requested a drink of water. Upon his release by appellant, Gottshal ran into his bedroom, whereupon Mrs. Harvey shouted to appellant that Gottshal was going after his gun and for appellant to run, whereupon both appellant and

Mrs. Harvey ran out of the house, followed shortly by Gottshal, who, after reaching the door, fired four shots, none of which took effect. Appellant disappeared, and after Gottshal, with the assistance of a neighbor, had carried all the furniture and other articles back into the house, Mrs. Harvey drove the truck away. Gottshal, in company with a neighbor, went to a doctor to have his wound dressed. Upon leaving the doctor, he became unconscious, was taken to his home, and subsequently to the hospital, where he died three days after the affray. Appellant had not known or seen Gottshal until the time of the affray. Appellant further testified that he had no intent to kill Gottshal.

Error is claimed first in the insufficiency of the evidence to warrant a conviction even of manslaughter, it being claimed that appellant acted in self-defense, and, secondly, upon errors committed in failing to instruct the jury as requested by appellant and in the giving of certain instructions.

[1] Appellant claims that the general instruction on circumstantial evidence should not, under the facts of this case, have been given. With this we agree. The case at bar is very similar to People v. Smith, 164 Cal. 451, where at page 463, 129 P. 785, 790, it is said:

"The court instructed the jury upon the distinction between direct and circumstantial evidence. There was not only direct evidence of the homicide in this case, but it was admitted. There was, therefore, no occasion to instruct upon the character and value of circumstantial evidence."

Appellant predicates error on the wording of some of the instructions given by the court on the subject of self-defense, and claims also that some of the instructions on self-defense as given should not have been given, and that certain instructions on that subject-matter requested by appellant and refused by the court should have been given. A recital of these instructions in detail cannot be of any benefit. It is sufficient to say that we have examined each and all of these instructions carefully, and find that the trial court correctly instructed the jury on self-defense, and further that the substance of the instructions refused were sufficiently embodied in the instructions given, and that appellant could not have been prejudiced by the giving of any of the instructions to which complaint is directed.

[2] Further error is claimed in the failure of the court to give two instructions requested by appellant to the effect that the evidence was insufficient to warrant a finding that appellant was guilty of murder in either the first or second degree, and in giving full instructions concerning murder and its various degrees. A careful reading of the entire transcript leads to the conclusion that there was no intent to kill and no malice shown so as to make the killing murder either in the first or second degree.

[3, 4] However, the evidence clearly supports a finding that appellant was guilty of manslaughter. Neither the error in giving the instruction on circumstantial evidence nor the error in the refusal to instruct that the evidence was insufficient to warrant a conviction of murder in either degree and the giving of the instructions on murder, in view of the entire record, is of such character as to warrant the granting of a new trial.

We find no error either in the giving or failing to give other instructions called to our attention by appellant.

[5] Following the Supreme Court in its interpretation of section 1181, Penal Code, as stated in People v. Kelley, 208 Cal. 387, 281 P. 609, it is ordered that the judgment of the lower court of murder in the second degree be modified, and the cause remanded to the trial court, with directions to enter a judgment against appellant finding him guilty of manslaughter, and thereupon to pronounce judgment accordingly.

We concur: WORKS, P. J.; CRAIG, J.

GRAY v. GIESEKE et al.
Civ. 3996.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.
Oct. 13, 1930.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court
Nov. 10, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨926(1).

Appellate court, in event of new trial, must presume that trial court will properly determine all questions of evidence presented to it.

2. Justices of the peace ⇨59.

Authority of justice's court is entirely statutory, with nothing presumed in favor of its jurisdiction.

3. Statutes ⇨225.

Latest expression of Legislature upon subject prevails in case of irreconcilable conflict between statutes.

4. Justices of the peace ⇨135(2).

Clerk of justice's court in county of fourth class was without right to issue writ of execution without justice's signature (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 91, 103a, 903, and § 902 as amended by St. 1921, p. 123, § 1, and § 905 as amended by St. 1929, p. 642; Pol. Code, § 4185).

5. Justices of the peace ⇨135(2).

Statute relating to issuance of legal process by justice's clerk on order of presiding justice has no general application to justices' courts (Code Civ. Proc. § 91).

6. Justices of the peace ⇨135(2).

County clerk's certificate to writ of execution for service in another county, failing to certify there was any justice of the peace or acting justice at date of writ, was fatally defective (Code Civ. Proc. § 902, as amended by St. 1921, p. 123, § 1, and § 905, as amended by St. 1929, p. 642).

It appears that at time writ was issued there were several justices of the peace within county, and for aught that appears in the certificate, the justice of that township where the case was tried may have resigned or died and office may have become vacant so that clerk of justice signing execution may have been accommodating clerk of justice of another bailiwick who had no jurisdiction in particular case.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

On rehearing.

Petition denied.

For former opinion, see 291 P. 590.

John Gray, in pro. per.

Gumpert & Mazzera, of Stockton, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Both parties have petitioned for a rehearing.

[1] The plaintiff's petition is without merit. He now asks this court to anticipate the rulings of the trial court and fix a measure of damages. In the event of a new trial we must presume that court will properly determine all questions of evidence which are presented to it.

The respondent calls attention to section 103a of the Code of Civil Procedure, which was enacted in 1915, and insists that it authorizes the clerk of a justice's court in counties of the twelfth class, to which Kern county belongs, to issue writs of execution without the justice's signature. That section provides: "In every township wherein provision is made by law for a clerk * * * for the justice of the peace, * * * said clerk * * * shall have power to * * * issue summons and other writs in civil actions.

[2] Justices' courts are of inferior jurisdiction. Their authority is entirely statutory. Nothing is presumed in favor of their jurisdiction.

[3, 4] Section 4185 of the Political Code provides that "Justices of the peace must perform such duties as are prescribed in title eleven, part two, of the Code of Civil Procedure." This title (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 831h-927g) has particular application to "Proceedings in Justices' Courts." Chapter 9 of this title (sections 901-905) specifically applies to "Executions from Justices' Courts." Section 902 is found in this last-mentioned chapter and provides in clear and unambiguous language that: "The execution * * * must be subscribed by the justice and bear date the day of its delivery to the officer." This section was amended in 1921 (St. 1921, p. 123, § 1). It is a general provision which appears to apply to all justices of the peace, except those of "Cities and Counties," so far as the issuing of executions is concerned. Section 103a was enacted in 1915. If these two sections are in irreconcilable conflict with respect to the issuing of executions, section 902 will prevail, since it is the latest expression of the Legislature upon that subject. 23 Cal. Jur. 693, sec. 83; 25 R. C. L. 1063, § 286. These two sections may, however, be reconciled. Section 103a does not specifically authorize the justice's clerk to issue executions. It does authorize the clerk "to issue summons and other writs." In supporting both of these sections, it may be held that section 902, which deals specifically with the subject of executions, requires the justice to subscribe in person an execution which is issued from his court. But writs other than that of an execution, which are authorized by law to be issued from a justice's court, may be signed by a clerk in townships where the law provides for the appointment of such officer. This construction of the statute which requires the justice to personally subscribe the execution is given added force by reference to sections 903 and 905 of the same Code. Section 903 provides that: "An execution may * * * be renewed * * * by the word 'renewed' written thereon, with the date thereof, and subscribed by the justice." Section 905 provides in part: "Where an execution * * * is to be served out of the county in which it was issued, the execution shall have attached to it a certificate under seal, by the county clerk of such county to the effect that the person issuing the same was an acting justice of the peace of said county at the date of the writ." This last-mentioned section was amended in 1929 (St. 1929, p. 642) by adding after the words "justice of the peace" the following language, to wit: "Or a clerk of the justice's court." The amendment was enacted too late to affect the validity of the execution involved in the present case. The very fact that the Legislature amended this section 905 indicates that it recognized the defect in the law prior to this change. The execution in this case was not properly executed or authenticated.

[5] Section 91 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that: "All legal process of every kind * * * in said justices' court * * * shall be issued by the said justices' clerk upon the order of the presiding justice." This section has no general application to justices' courts. It refers only to courts of a particular class, to wit, those of political subdivisions termed "cities and counties." This section is found in article 1, chapter 5, title 1, part 1, of the Code (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 85-102b), which is headed "Justices' Courts in Cities and Counties." It is distinguishable from the provisions of section 902. For this reason the case of Helms v. Dunne, 107 Cal. 117, 40 P. 100, held that section 844 of the same Code, with reference to the issuing of summons, had no application to justices' courts in cities and counties, and therefore did not conflict with section 91. This is not true with relation to the provisions which appear under the caption "Justices' Courts in Townships" (article 2, c. 5, tit. 1, pt. 1 [sections 103-107]), for the reason that some of these courts have clerks, and others do not.

[6] Regardless of the construction of section 902, the execution was invalid for service in another county, since the county clerk's certificate was fatally defective.

Even though this amendment to section 905 had been in force at the time of issuing the execution in this case, the county clerk's certificate was fatally defective for the reason that it failed to certify there was any justice of the peace of that particular township, or that there was any acting justice who could give validity to the execution "at the date of the writ." The certificate merely recited that "Rose Goldstein * * * was, at the date of same, and is now, a justice of the peace's clerk in and for said county." There were then several justices of the peace in Kern county. For aught that appears in the certificate the justice of the township where the case was tried may have resigned or died. That office may have become vacant. Rose Goldstein may have been the accommodating clerk of the justice of another bailiwick who had no jurisdiction in that particular case. It is not possible that the mere certificate that a named individual is a justice's clerk somewhere in the county conforms to the law or gives authenticity to a process issuing from a justice's court. We are of the opinion that the execution was not legally issued or properly authenticated. It furnished no authority to support the levy or sale of the bees.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court
Dec. 29, 1930.1. Banks and banking ⇨40.

Agreement to purchase bank stock, with attached agreement to pay buyer depreciation if bank loses pending suits, held single agreement of sale for conditional purchase price, not "indemnity" agreement (Civ. Code, § 2772).

The bank lost the pending suits because the transactions were based on illegal contracts, and in this action by the buyer of the bank stock against the sellers for a refund of the purchase price to the extent of the depreciation, up to the limit set by the agreement, sellers contended that the agreement to pay such depreciation was an indemnity agreement, purporting to indemnify buyer against acts constituting a felony committed by third person, and was therefore void and unenforceable.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Indemnity," see Words and Phrases.]

FINCH, P. J.

[1, 2] This action arises out of a sale by the defendants to the plaintiff of a part of the capital stock of the Bank of Orland. The defendants executed a written option to sell their shares of stock to the plaintiff at prices per share stated in the option. The option contained the following:

"It is expressly understood and agreed that should the sale of this bank stock hereinbefore mentioned, be consummated and completed hereunder, that upon the payment for the same as herein provided by the party of the second part, the parties of the first part will sign, execute and deliver to the party of the second part that certain agreement, a copy of which is attached hereto and marked 'Exhibit A' and made a part hereof * * * the execution of the said agreement by the parties of the first part * * * being part of the consideration for the sale of the said capital stock and the purchase thereof by the party of the second part."

The agreement referred to contained the following:

"Whereas, there is now pending in the Superior Court, State of California, County of Glenn, two law suits in which the Bank of Orland is plaintiff, and T. W. Harlan is defendant, the amount involved in the said two suits being the sum of $10,000., and the said $10,000., being equal to the sum of $20., per share of all of the capital stock of the Bank of Orland, and

"Whereas, the loss to the Bank of Orland of the said $10,000., the amount involved in the said two suits or any portion thereof, will depreciate the value of the capital stock of said bank which may be sold under said option agreement to said George A. Barceloux proportionately as the amount of said loss which said bank may sustain in said suits bears to the whole capital stock of said bank.

"Now, therefore, we, the undersigned, respectively undertake and agree to pay to George A. Barceloux, at the conclusion of said litigation hereinbefore mentioned, whatever sum per share the whole capital stock of said Bank of Orland may have been depreciated by reason of loss of the said sum or any part of said sum of money involved in said two suits to said Bank of Orland on the said stock sold by us respectively to him under said option, provided, however, that said sum shall not exceed $11.34 per share on each share of stock of the Bank of Orland so sold to him."

These instruments were delivered to the plaintiff, together with the capital stock referred to therein, and he thereupon paid the full purchase price of the stock agreed upon between the parties. The two suits of the Bank of Orland v. Harlan, referred to in the agreement, terminated without any recovery by the bank, for the reasons stated in Bank of Orland v. Harlan, 188 Cal. 413, 419, 206 P. 75, in which it was held that the transaction between the bank and Harlan, upon which the suits were based, was in violation of law constituting a felony, and that therefore no recovery could be had thereon.

The court found, on uncontradicted evidence, "that by reason of the said final judgment entered in the Harlan lawsuits, the said Bank of Orland did lose the same and failed to recover anything therein, and that the actual loss to the Bank of Orland by reason of the loss of said two lawsuits was and is the sum of $8,810, besides cost of suit, attorney's fees, witness fees, and other expenses. That the said loss of $8,810, by the Bank of Orland did depreciate the value of the capital stock of said bank in the amount of $17.62 per share on each share of the stock of said Bank of Orland sold by defendants to plaintiff."

Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff against the respective defendants for the amount of the depreciation of their respective shares of stock at the rate of $11.34 per share. The defendants have appealed from the judgment.

The appellants' principal argument is that the agreement attached to the option contract "is an indemnity agreement and purports to indemnify plaintiff against acts constituting a felony committed by the Bank of Orland and T. W. Harlan and is therefore void and unenforceable," under the provisions of section 2772 of the Civil Code. Appellants arrive at this conclusion by treating such agreement attached to the option contract as an independent agreement. Plainly, it is not such. The terms of the two instruments must be construed together as a single contract, and upon the consummation of the transaction constituted an agreement of sale for a conditional purchase price dependent upon the outcome of the Harlan suits. The fact that Barceloux paid to the defendants the conditional part of the purchase price, instead of retaining it until the litigation was ended, is wholly immaterial. The agreement between the parties must be construed to the same effect as if it still remained executory, in which case no one would contend that it constituted anything other than an agreement of sale at a conditional purchase price.

The other points made by the appellants are so obviously without merit that no discussion thereof is deemed necessary.

The judgment is affirmed.

SCHMIDT, Justice pro tem.

Respondents brought suit in the lower court on a promissory note in the sum of $1,250 alleged to have been given in payment of legal services rendered. By answer appellant set up the defense of want of consideration and failure of consideration in that the attorneys acted against the interests of appellant, and in that the services were rendered under a written agreement that a fee should be charged only if at the conclusion of a trusteeship of appellant's property for the benefit of creditors there was any salvage. Appellant was the owner of a showcase and fixture factory and was in financial difficulties. Pursuant to a recommendation of one of his creditors, appellant consulted respondents, who at that time were the attorneys for Charles E. Clifford Company, a creditor of appellant, and as such attorneys for said creditor were threatening attachment proceedings against appellant. After consultation between appellant and respondent Spencer, an employment was agreed upon whereby appellant paid to respondent Spencer $75, and, upon the recommendation of respondent Spencer, appellant assigned all of his property for the benefit of creditors to three trustees, one of whom was respondent Spencer, with the understanding that Spencer "will act as one of the trustees and will keep in close touch with your (appellant's) business as he has been doing for the last few days; he will counsel and advise you whenever necessary in connection with the matter and assist in working out your finances."

"At the conclusion of the trusteeship if there is any salvage and property returned to you, you shall at that time pay us a reasonable fee for all services rendered, which fee shall not be less than $2,500.00, and may be more if the services which are rendered are reasonably worth more."

During the course of the trusteeship appellant apparently became dissatisfied with the services rendered by respondent Spencer and employed other counsel, after which a compromise was reached between appellant and his creditors. Respondent Spencer, acting on behalf of the Charles Clifford Company, declined to sign the compromise or permit the Charles Clifford Company to sign same until all other creditors had signed and until appellant had paid him in cash the sum of $500 and executed the promissory note sued upon. It must be borne in mind that at this juncture appellant was being counseled by another attorney and actually did pay to respondent Spencer said sum of $500 and did execute the promissory note sued upon. Subsequently two payments were made upon the note of $50 each. When no other payments were made suit was brought.

At the conclusion of the trial the court rendered judgment in favor of respondents, making findings of fact, finding, among other facts, "plaintiffs were employed by defendant to render services as attorneys and also to render other services to defendant, and they did render such services, and that defendant paid them therefor the sum of $500 at the conclusion of said services and delivered to them the promissory note sued upon here; that at said time defendant was represented by other counsel and the consideration for said note and for said cash payment was adequate."

[1] The evidence was conflicting as to the services rendered and the value thereof. The court having found in favor of respondents upon the conflict, this court will not disturb such finding.

[2] Appellant claims that by reason of the original employment, to wit, the payment of the $75, and that the fee to be paid respondents was conditioned that "at the conclusion of the trusteeship if there is any salvage and property returned" precluded respondents from obtaining any fee whatever. With this we cannot agree, for it was the privilege of appellant to discharge respondents as his counsel and employ other counsel, and it was perfectly proper for appellant to agree to pay respondents a fee for the services rendered up to the time of the discharge, and this in lieu of what respondents might have received, if anything, under the original employment.

Judgment affirmed.

TYLER, P. J.

Action in claim and delivery for the recovery of a steam heating plant.

There is no dispute concerning the facts. Plaintiff in the year 1927 entered into an oral agreement with one Patch to install a complete steam heating system and water plant in an apartment house which Patch was constructing in Berkeley. At this time nothing was said as to terms of payment. After the installation of the plant and after it was in full operation two payments were made by Patch upon the same, amounting to the sum of $1,900. Being unable to pay the balance due, Patch thereafter signed a conditional contract of sale covering the plant, by the terms of which title was reserved in plaintiff. Subsequently Patch made application to defendant corporation for a loan upon the premises. The loan was granted, and the apartment house was conveyed to defendant under a deed of trust to secure the payment of the loan. At the time defendant was appraising the property for the purpose of making the loan, nothing was said by any one concerning the title to the heating plant, and defendant was of the belief that the plant constituted a part of the building. Subsequently defendant, pursuant to a sale under the deed of trust, became the purchaser of the premises with appurtenances. Thereafter suit was brought by plaintiff to recover the plant. The trial court found that at the time defendant corporation made an inspection of the premises and appraised the value thereof for the purpose of making the loan, the plant was completely installed in the apartment house and was providing heat and hot water to seventeen apartments in the building; that the boiler unit of the plant was set in the basement upon a brick foundation built to receive it and cemented in at the base; that the pipes ran to and from the burner and boiler and storage tank, and conduits and pipe ran up through the partitions and walls of the building to the various rooms, where the heat was discharged through radiators; that the plant was a part of the equipment used in the operation of the house and contributed to the use of the building for the purposes for which it was intended; that the system was a part of the building. It further found that plaintiff or any other person had never made any claim to defendant that they had any interest therein until after the loan had been made, and there was nothing to indicate that plaintiff had any right or interest therein. Additional findings are to the effect that the plaintiff did not record his conditional contract of sale or any notice thereof with the county recorder. Judgment was thereupon rendered in favor of defendant.

[1-3] The sole question involved in the appeal is whether or not the heating plant was a fixture, or did it remain a chattel under the conditional sales contract entered into between the owner of the premises and plaintiff. This precise question has been answered in the comparatively recent case of Oakland Bank of Savings v. California Pressed Brick Co., 183 Cal. 295, 191 P. 524, where it is held that, while the owner of personal property of this character has the right to make an agreement to sell and deliver possession of the same upon the condition that the title thereto shall remain in him until the same is paid for, this rule prevails only so long as the property retains its character as personalty and it ceases to prevail when one voluntarily places it in the possession and control of the vendee with knowledge that, if it was to be put to the use for which it was designed, it would be affixed to the land. The seller, because, of these facts, is presumed to have agreed that the personal property should be, or might be, converted into real property. By this transformation it is brought under the operation of the laws for recording contracts affecting realty and for the protection of innocent purchasers. The case cited extensively deals with the question, and we do not deem further discussion on our part to be necessary. See, also, Kohler v. Brasun, 249 N. Y. 224, 164 N. E. 31; Leo Co. v. Jersey City Bill Posting Co., 78 N. J. Law, 150, 73 A. 1046; King v. Title Trust Co., 111 Wash. 508, 191 P. 748. Here defendant, having no notice of any secret title, and not being charged with notice, was entitled to conclude that the plant was a part of the realty.

The judgment is affirmed.

SCHMIDT, Justice pro tem.

On March 30, 1925, appellant, city of Whittier, a city of the sixth class, entered into a contract with Erdman Company for the construction of a cement culvert at an agreed consideration of $2,214.61. Afterwards, on April 30, 1925, the Erdman Company in writing assigned and transferred to respondent, First National Bank of Monterey Park, all its interest in and to said contract. On May 1, 1925, respondent sent said assignment to the city clerk, who indorsed upon it the following: "Contract dated 3/30/25 and assignment dated 4/30/25 on file in the office of the city clerk of the City of Whittier. Paul Gilmore, city clerk. [Seal.]" Thereafter the Erdman Company completed the work and on June 8, 1925, in spite of its assignment to respondent, filed with the city clerk a claim and demand in writing for $1,494.86, the balance due on the said written contract of March 30, 1925. On June 10, 1925, the claim of the Erdman Company was allowed by the city council of Whittier in the sum named, $1,494.86, and a warrant was drawn and delivered to the company for its payment. The treasurer's check issued thereon was cashed by the Erdman Company through the respondent bank. Almost two years after the work had been completed under the contract and the warrant for $1,494.86 had been paid to the Erdman Company, namely, on the 24th of May, 1927, respondent, claiming under the assignment, presented to and filed with the city clerk of the city of Whittier its claim and demand for the said sum of $1,494.86. The claim was disallowed and rejected by the city council, whereupon suit was instituted in the lower court. The facts were stipulated to as hereinbefore set forth. From a judgment of the lower court in favor of the respondent bank, the city of Whittier has appealed to this court.

The sole question for consideration is the effect of Ordinance No. 17 of the city of Whittier, in force during all of the time involved herein. section 2 thereof provides: "The board of trustees must not hear or consider any claim in favor of any public officer, person, corporation, company or association against the city, nor shall the board credit or allow any claim or bill against the city, unless the same be itemized * * * and is presented and filed with the clerk of the board within a year after the last item of the account or claim accrued." Concerning this section respondent in its brief says, "We desire to state at this point that we do not question the validity or constitutionality of such section nor do we question the public policy behind its adoption," but contends that the section applies only to unliquidated damages and not to a contractual obligation. With this viewpoint we cannot agree.

Similar statutes of limitations as found in city charters have received repeated construction from our higher courts; it being held that, as a condition precedent to filing suit, claim must be presented within the time fixed in the charter provision. In Ames v. City and County of San Francisco, 76 Cal. 325, 18 P. 397, it was held that, in an action to recover a salary due a gas inspector under Consolidation Act of city and county of San Francisco of March 4, 1878, the salary became due and payable monthly at the end of each month of the applicant's term of office, and that, unless the claim for such monthly salary be presented to the board of supervisors for allowance within the time limited by section 90 of the act (30 days), it becomes barred and thereafter cannot be paid from the treasury. See, also, Continental Insurance Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 92 Cal. App. 585, 268 P. 920, and Crescent Wharf & Warehouse Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 207 Cal. 430, 278 P. 1028.

In view of the conclusion reached, it is unnecessary to consider any other question presented.

Judgment reversed, with directions to the lower court to enter judgment in favor of appellant.

Original application by Ben A. Hill for a writ of prohibition prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles to restrain further proceedings in matter of election contest after primary election to nominate candidate for the assembly.

Writ granted.

Fall & Fall, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Henry E. Carter, and Wheeler & Wackerbarth, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J.

The petitioner Ben A. Hill and Frank McGinley were opposing candidates for the state assembly at the primary election of August 7, 1930, the canvass of which resulted in favor of the former. McGinley instituted a contest of certain precincts, which was set by the superior court of Los Angeles county for September 22, 1930. The parties then failing to appear, the matter was ordered off calendar, and on the following day was reset for September 29, 1930. A petition for a writ of prohibition was filed in this court to restrain further proceedings, upon the ground that the date last mentioned would not be within the statutory period specified for such recount.

The pertinent provisions of section 28 of the act to provide for and regulate primary elections (Stats. 1913, ch. 690, p. 1379, Am. Stats. 1917, ch. 711, p. 1363) are as follows: "Any candidate at a primary election, desiring to contest a nomination of another candidate for the same office, may, within five days after the completion of the official canvass, file an affidavit in the office of the clerk of the superior court of the county in which he desires to contest the vote returned from any precinct or precincts in such county, and thereupon have a recount of the ballots cast in any such precinct or precincts, in accordance with the provisions of this section. * * * Upon the filing of such affidavit and the posting of the same, the superior court of the county shall have jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the parties to such contest, and all candidates at any such primary election are permitted to be candidates under this act, only upon the condition that such jurisdiction for the purposes of the proceeding authorized by this section shall exist in the manner and under the conditions provided for by this section. * * * On the eighth day after the completion of the official canvass the county clerk shall present the affidavits * * * and proof of posting, * * * to the judge of the superior court of the county, * * * which judge shall, upon such presentation, forthwith designate the time and place where such contest shall proceed, * * * which time must not be less than one nor more than three days from the presentation of the matter to the court by the county clerk as herein provided. * * * If the number of votes which are sought to be recounted, or the number of contests are such that the judge shall be of opinion that it will require additional judges to enable the contest or contests to be determined in time to print the ballots for the election, if there be only one judge for such county, he may obtain the service of any other superior judge. * * * If the proceeding is in a county or city and county where there is more than one superior court judge, the judge to whom the case or cases shall be assigned, shall notify the presiding judge forthwith, of the number of judges which he deems necessary to participate, in order to finish the contest or contests in time to print the ballots for the final election."

[1-3] We are of the opinion that the construction placed upon the provisions of the general election laws having to do with election contests are not applicable nor controlling here. It is obvious that the recount contemplated by the foregoing section must be had immediately following the canvass. The law provides that the judge shall designate the time and place where such contest shall proceed "which time must not be less than one nor more than three days from the presentation of the matter to the court." We think this language is mandatory, at least that by no possible construction could the time be extended further than such date as would still permit the finishing of the contest "in time to print the ballots for the final election." In considering the nature of the provisions of this law as being mandatory or directory, we are bound to take into account further requirements as to preparation for the ballot by the secretary of state. These make it clear that the requirement that the contest be finished "in time to print the ballots for the final election" is mandatory. This is so because the secretary of state must "make such changes in the record in his office as such judgment or judgments require," must "not later than the twenty-fifth day after any primary election compile the returns," and also certify the revised compilation showing the name of every person who has received the nomination to the county clerk or registrar of voters, not less than thirty days before the November election. Sections 21, 22, 23, Ibid.

[4, 5] Taking judicial notice of the statutes and of the dates of election, it becomes apparent that the compilation of the secretary of state will have been certified prior to any possible determination of judicial proceedings in this instance. No action of the superior court could avail anything, and would only determine a question already moot.

The petition for writ of prohibition is granted.

Affirmed.

O. Douglass Smith, of Long Beach, for appellant.

Nowland M. Reid and George W. Trammell, Jr., both of Long Beach, for respondent.

Mr. Presiding Justice FINCH delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for the death of his son, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. The court refused to direct a verdict for the defendant and one was returned in favor of the plaintiff. Thereafter, on motion of the defendant, the court rendered judgment in its favor, notwithstanding the verdict, as permitted by section 629 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment. The statement of facts herein is taken largely from appellant's opening brief.

The defendant "owned and maintained as a part of its general system of public recreation," from which it received no revenue, "a channel of water," known as Recreation Park Lagoon, connected with the ocean and in which the ocean tides ebbed and flowed. More than six months prior to the accident the defendant "caused the channel to be dredged and deepened to a depth of twenty-five feet. * * * Earth was removed from the channel and deposited upon the property adjacent to form the slope of the channel and establish a bathing beach. Sand was also placed adjacent to the water's edge to provide a more suitable condition for bathers. * * * At the point and place in question at said channel a lifeline was stretched crosswise of the channel, but no markers, notices or signs indicating the depth of the water in the channel at the particular point and place in question had been or were present on the 3d day of September, 1926, the date of the tragedy. * * * On said 3d day of September, 1926, one James Scott, junior, a minor son of the plaintiff in this action and of the age of fifteen years, together with several other boys of approximately his own age," and their leader "proceeded to said channel for the purpose of swimming, where, after approximately ten minutes after having reached the channel, he was drowned. * * * There were no eye-wit nesses to the drowning of young Scott. When last seen by any of his companions, he was holding to the rope which stretched crosswise the channel, kicking his feet in an endeavor to learn the art of swimming, and about four or five feet from the edge of the water." About seven feet from the edge of the water the bottom of the channel was slippery in places, and at about the same point the slope of the bottom became steeper.

It may be conceded, as appellant contends, that the defendant negligently failed to place warning signs at the commencement of the deep water in the channel. Stats. 1923, p. 675. The only purpose such signs would have served, as applied to the facts of this case, would have been to inform the deceased of the depth of such water. But the uncontradicted evidence shows that he was given that information a few minutes before the accident, after he had himself discovered the line of deep water by getting beyond his depth. The leader of the boys testified:

"Right after we arrived there * * * I noticed he was out of breath and I said, 'What's the matter, Jimmie?' He said, 'I got out over my head.' I said, 'What's the matter? Don't you know how to swim?' He said, 'No, I don't; will you teach me, will you show me?' I said, 'Yes,' and he said, 'All right, just a minute until I get my breath.' * * * When he said, 'I got out over my head,' I said, 'Yes, there is a drop off, you want to be careful, Jimmie,' and at the same time some of the other boys who were gathered around also spoke up and said, 'Yes, there is a big drop off, twenty-five feet deep out there, you better look out, Jimmie.'"

[1-3] There is an entire lack of evidence as to the cause of the accident. Appellant contends that the jury may have drawn certain inferences of negligence on the part of the defendant. It is true that many conjectures may be indulged as to the cause of the accident, some favorable to the defendant, but inference are not to be drawn from conjectures. The burden of proof is on the plaintiff. In the absence of any evidence as to the cause of the accident, that burden has not been sustained. Appellant relies on the language of Davis v. Pacific Power Co., 107 Cal. 563, 575, 40 P. 950, 48 Am. St. Rep. 156; but the court was there considering the question of the plaintiff's alleged contributory negligence, it having been shown that the plaintiff was injured through the defendant's negligence. There is nothing in this case warranting the inference of contributory negligence, but it does not follow that the defendant was negligent. Many serious accidents occur which are not due to the negligence of any one.

The judgment is affirmed.

IMPERIAL IRR. DIST. v. WOOD, Superintendent of Banks.

Civ. 440.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Oct. 21, 1930.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing
Nov. 18, 1930.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Jan. 15, 1931.

1. Pledges ⇨55.

Pledgee may sue on debt without first exhausting his security and resort to general assets of debtor for satisfaction, returning pledge or so much thereof as remains after debt is fully paid.

2. Pledges ⇨19.

"Pledge" is collateral security for payment of entire debt and not any divisible part thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Pledge," see Words and Phrases.]

3. Banks and banking ⇨80(5).

Statute held to give bank depositors and claimants mentioned therein prior rights to participate in bank's assets (St. 1909, p. 87, § 27, as amended by St. 1913, p. 151, § 26).

St. 1909, p. 87, § 27, as amended by St. 1913, p. 151, § 26, provides that all money and assets belonging to each department, whether on hand or with other banks, and the investments made, shall be held solely for the repayment of depositors and other claimants of each department until all depositors and other claimants of each department shall have been paid, and the overplus then remaining shall be applied to any other liabilities of such bank.

4. Marshaling assets and securities ⇨6.

Doctrine of marshaling assets cannot be invoked by one creditor to defeat part of demand of prior lienholder (Civ. Code, §§ 2899, 3433).

5. Banks and banking ⇨80(1).

Irrigation district held entitled to receive dividend on total amount of its deposit, regardless of security given to secure deposit, if pledge of security was legal.

This being true, the depositor could not be compelled to first exhaust its security and then participate equally with other creditors in the general assets of the bank for the balance due depositor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; A. C. Finney, Judge.

Petition by the Imperial Irrigation District against Will C. Wood, as Superintendent of Banks for the State of California, for payment of dividend on petitioner's claim against the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Imperial in liquidation. From an order dismissing an order to show cause, petitioner appeals.

Reversed with direction.

Charles L. Childers and D. B. Roberts, both of El Centro, for appellant.

Albert A. Rosenshine, Elbert W. Davis, and J. H. Hoffman, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

MARKS, J.

The Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Imperial is a commercial and savings bank organized and existing under the banking laws of the state of California. It will be referred to hereafter as the bank. The Imperial irrigation district is an irrigation district organized and existing under the California Irrigation District Act approved March 31, 1897 (St. 1897, p. 254), and the acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto. It will be referred to hereafter as the district. Will C. Wood is the superintendent of banks of the state of California.

On October 10, 1927, the superintendent of banks closed the bank and took possession of its assets and proceeded to administer upon and liquidate its affairs in accordance with the provisions of the Bank Act of the State of California. On this date the district had on deposit in the commercial department of the bank the sum of $64,285.69, divided into three accounts, as follows: $9,738.07 in a cashier's account; $14,547.62 in a treasurer's account; and four certificates of deposit in the sum of $10,000 each, representing money also belonging to the treasurer's account. The bank had given the district United States Liberty bonds of the par value of $50,000 as a pledge to secure the return of all or a part of the deposits. Whether the attempted pledge was given to secure the repayment of all the deposits, or only the treasurer's account funds of $54,547.62, is not clear from the record. We assume, however, that the security was given for the treasurer's account funds only.

The district filed two claims against the bank, one for $54,547.62 and the other for $9,738.07. Both claims were allowed and approved by the superintendent of banks, but he denied the right of the district to hold the bonds as security for the deposit, and demanded their return, which demand was refused. He thereupon instituted suit for their recovery or the recovery of their value, the bonds having been retired and the district having received the sum of $51,062.50 in their stead. According to the information before us this suit has not been finally determined.

On April 18, 1928, the superintendent of banks filed in the court below a report of his administration of the affairs of the bank, together with his account, and requested an order for the payment of a dividend of 15 per cent. on the approved claims against the commercial department of the bank, except the claim of the district in the sum of $54,547.62. The petition was granted and the court ordered the dividend paid "excepting only that no dividends be declared or paid upon the claim of Imperial Irrigation District claim #433 until further order of this court." This claim was the one for $54,547.62. Thereafter the district filed its petition for payment of the dividend upon this claim. An order to show cause was issued and a hearing had which resulted in a dismissal of the order. Thereupon the district prosecuted this appeal.

The question presented here is new in this state. For the purposes of this decision we will assume, without so holding, that the pledge of the bonds by the bank to the district was a lawful act and gave to the district a valid security for the deposit in question here. This leaves the following question for us to decide: Is the district entitled to receive the dividend on the total amount of its deposit regardless of the security, or only upon that portion of its deposit in excess of the value, or the money it has received for the security, it having been reduced to cash?

In cases similar to the one at bar there are two sharply conflicting rules prevailing in different jurisdictions in the United States. One is called the "bankruptcy rule," under which the creditor must first exhaust his security and participate in the dividends for the balance of his claim only, or surrender his security and receive dividends on the full amount of his claim. The other is called the "chancery rule" or the "equity rule," under which the creditor may receive dividends upon the full amount of his claim regardless of his security or any sum received upon it, until the dividends and security amount to the total sum of his claim.

Counsel for the district urge the adoption of the equity rule. In support of their position they cite the following cases, all of which support this contention: Merrill v. National Bank of Jacksonville, 173 U. S. 131, 19 S. Ct. 360, 362, 43 L. Ed. 640; Aldrich v. Chemical National Bank, 176 U. S. 618, 20 S. Ct. 498, 44 L. Ed. 611; Wheeler v. Walton & Whann Co. (C. C.) 72 F. 966; London & San Francisco Bank v. Willamette Steam-Mill, etc., Co. (C. C.) 80 F. 226; Hitner v. Diamond State Steel Co. (C. C.) 176 F. 384; Commercial & Savings Bank v. Robert H. Jenks Lumber Co. (C. C.) 194 F. 732; Goodman Mfg. Co. v. Pittsburgh-Buffalo Co. (C. C. A.) 265 F. 561; International Banking Corp. v. Lynch (C. C. A.) 269 F. 242; People v. E. Anderson, 18

B. Mon. (57 Ky.) 114; In re Bates, 118 Ill. 524, 9 N. E. 257, 59 Am. Rep. 383; Third National Bank of Detroit v. Haug, 82 Mich. 607, 47 N. W. 33, 11 L. R. A. 327; Mead v. Randall, 71 N. W. 31, 68 Minn. 233; Merchants' National Bank v. Flippen, 158 N. C. 334, 74 S. E. 100; Kellogg v. Miller, 22 Or. 406, 30 P. 229, 29 Am. St. Rep. 618; In re Jamison & Co.'s Estate, 163 Pa. 143, 29 A. 1001; First National Bank of Richmond v. Wm. R. Trigg Co., 106 Va. 327, 56 S. E. 158; Williams v. Overholt, 46 W. Va. 339, 33 S. E. 226; Harrigan et al. v. Gilchrist et al., 121 Wis. 127, 99 N. W. 909, 975.

Counsel for the superintendent of banks is equally earnest in urging us to adopt the bankruptcy rule as governing relying upon the following authorities which support his contention: Amory v. Francis, 16 Mass. 308; Petition of Allen, 241 Mass. 346, 136 N. E. 269; Bank Commissioners v. Security Trust Co., 70 N. H. 536, 49 A. 113; State v. Nebraska Savings Bank, 40 Neb. 342, 58 N. W. 976; In re Frasch, 5 Wash. 344, 31 P. 755, 32 P. 771; First National Bank v. Mansfield State Bank, 127 Wash. 475, 221 P. 595; Citizens' & Southern Bank v. Alexander, 147 Ga. 74, 92 S. E. 868, L. R. A. 1918B, 1021; Blackman v. Pettingill, 25 Idaho, 307, 137 P. 182.

No great good could come from a review or analysis of the various decisions cited. In some jurisdictions the courts are aided in their conclusions by the statutes they are construing. Speaking generally, however, the two lines of decisions are simply conflicting. In California the Bank Act superseded the Insolvency Act (People v. Bank of San Luis Obispo, 154 Cal. 194, 97 P. 306), so the decisions under the earlier statutes are of no assistance to us. The Bank Act itself furnishes us no assistance. It contains nothing to indicate whether the Legislature in adopting it intended to have the bankruptcy rule or the equity rule apply to the claims of creditors holding pledges as securities for their demands against banks in course of liquidation.

The equity rule finds one of its ablest exponents in the Supreme Court of the United States. In the case of Merrill v. National Bank of Jacksonville, supra, it was said:

"The inquiry on the merits is, generally speaking, whether a secured creditor of an insolvent national bank may prove and receive dividends upon the face of his claim as it stood at the time of the declaration of insolvency, without crediting either his collaterals, or collections made therefrom after such declaration, subject always to the proviso that dividends must cease when, from them and from collaterals realized, the claim has been paid in full.

"Counsel agree that four different rules have been applied in the distribution of insolvent estates, and state them as follows:

"Rule 1. The creditor desiring to participate in the fund is required first to exhaust his security, and credit the proceeds on his claim, or to credit its value upon his claim, and prove for the balance, it being optional with him to surrender his security and prove for his full claim.

"Rule 2. The creditor can prove for the full amount, but shall receive dividends only on the amount due him at the time of distribution of the fund; that is, he is required to credit on his claim, as proved, all sums received from his security, and may receive dividends only on the balance due him.

"Rule 3. The creditor shall be allowed to prove for, and receive dividends upon, the amount due him at the time of proving or sending in his claim to the official liquidator, being required to credit as payments all the sums received from his security prior thereto.

"Rule 4. The creditor can prove for, and receive dividends upon, the full amount of his claim, regardless of any sums received from his collateral after the transfer of the assets from the debtor in insolvency, provided that he shall not receive more than the full amount due him."

"The circuit court and the circuit court of appeals held the fourth rule applicable, and decreed accordingly.

"This was in accordance with the decision of the circuit court of appeals for the Sixth circuit, in Chemical National Bank v. Armstrong, 59 F. 372, 16 U. S. App. 465, 8 C. C. A. 155, 28 L. R. A. 231, Mr. Justice Brown, Circuit Judges Taft and Lurton, composing the court. The opinion was delivered by Judge Taft, and discusses the question on principle with a full citation of the authorities. We concur with that court in the proposition that assets of an insolvent debtor are held under insolvency proceedings in trust for the benefit of all his creditors, and that a creditor, on proof of his claim, acquires a vested interest in the trust fund; and, this being so, that the second rule before mentioned must be rejected, as it is based on the denial, in effect, of a vested interest in the trust fund, and concedes to the creditor simply a right to share in the distributions made from that fund according to the amount which may then be due him, requiring a readjustment of the basis of distribution at the time of declaring every dividend, and treating, erroneously as we think, the claim of the creditor to share in the assets of the debtor, and his debt against the debtor, as if they were one and the same thing.

"The third and fourth rules concur in holding that the creditor's right to dividends is to be determined by the amount due him at the time his interest in the assets becomes vested, and is not subject to subsequent change, but they differ as to the point of time when this occurs. * * *

"Differences in the language of voluntary assignments and of statutory provisions naturally lead to particular differences in decision, but the principle on which the third and fourth rules rest is the same. In other words, those rules hold, together with the first rule, that the creditor's right to dividends is based on the amount of his claims at the time his interest in the assets vests by the statute, or deed of trust, or rule of law, under which they are to be administered.

"The first rule is commonly known as the 'bankruptcy rule,' because enforced by the bankruptcy courts in the exercise of their peculiar jurisdiction, under the bankruptcy acts, over the property of the bankrupt, in virtue of which creditors holding mortgages or liens thereon might be required to realize on their securities, to permit them to be sold, to take them on valuation, or to surrender them altogether, as a condition of proving against the general assets.

"The fourth rule is that ordinarily laid down by the chancery courts, to the effect that, as the trust created by the transfer of the assets by operation of law or otherwise is a trust for all creditors, no creditor can equitably be compelled to surrender any other vested right he has in the assets of his debtor in order to obtain his vested right under the trust. It is true that, in equity, a creditor having a lien upon two funds may be required to exhaust one of them in aid of creditors who can only resort to the other; but this will not be done when it trenches on the rights or operates to the prejudice of the party entitled to the double fund. Story, Eq. Jur. (13th Ed.) § 633; In re Bates, 118 Ill. 524, 9 N. E. 257, 59 Am. Rep. 383. And it is well established that in marshaling assets, as respects creditors, no part of his security can be taken from a secured creditor until he is completely satisfied. 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. (4th Am. Ed.) pt. 1, pp. 258, 322. * * *

"Certainly, the giving of collateral does not operate of itself as a payment or satisfaction either of the debt or any part of it, and the debtor, who has given collateral security, remains debtor, notwithstanding, to the full amount of the debt; and so in Lewis v. United States, 92 U. S. 623, 23 L. Ed. 515, it was ruled that 'it is a settled principle of equity that a creditor holding collaterals is not bound to apply them before enforcing his direct remedies against the debtor.'

"Doubtless, the title to collaterals pledged for the security of a debt vests in the pledgee so far as necessary to accomplish that purpose, but the obligation to which the collaterals are subsidiary remains the same. The creditor can sue, recover judgment, and collect from the debtor's general property, and apply the proceeds of the collateral to any balance which may remain. Insolvency proceedings shift the creditor's remedy to the interest in the assets. As between debtor and creditor, moneys received on collaterals are applicable by way of payment; but as, under the equity rule, the creditor's rights in the trust fund are established when the fund is created, collections subsequently made from, or payments subsequently made on, collateral, cannot operate to change the relations between the creditor and his co-creditors in respect of their rights in the fund.

"As Judge Taft points out, it is because of the distinction between the right in personam and the right in rem that interest is only added up to the date of insolvency, although, after the claims as allowed are paid in full, interest accruing may then be paid before distribution to stockholders.

"In short, the secured creditor is not to be cut off from his right in the common fund because he has taken security which his co-creditors have not. Of course, he cannot go beyond payment, and surplus assets or so much of his dividends as are unnecessary to pay him must be applied to the benefit of the other creditors; and, while the unsecured creditors are entitled to be substituted as far as possible to the rights of secured creditors, the latter are entitled to retain their securities until the indebtedness due them is extinguished.

"The contractual relations between borrower and lender, pledging collaterals, remain, as is said by the New York court of appeals in People v. Remington, 121 N. Y. 328, 24 N. E. 793, 8 L. R. A. 458, 'unchanged, although insolvency has brought the general estate of the debtor within the jurisdiction of a court of equity for administration and settlement.' The creditor looks to the debtor to repay the money borrowed, and to the collateral to accomplish this in whole or in part; and he cannot be deprived either of what his debtor's general ability to pay may yield, or of the particular security he has taken.

"We cannot concur in the view expressed by Chief Justice Parker in Amory v. Francis (1820) 16 Mass. 308, that 'the property pledged is in fact security for no more of the debt than its value will amount to, and for all the rest the creditor relies upon the personal credit of his debtor, in the same manner he would for the whole if no security were taken.'

"We think the collateral is security for the whole debt and every part of it, and is as applicable to any balance that remains after payment from other sources as to the original amount due, and that the assumption is unreasonable that the creditor does not rely on the responsibility of his debtor according to his promise."

The bankruptcy rule was first adopted by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in 1820, in the case of Amory v. Francis, supra, wherein it was said:

"The rule adopted by the court of chancery in England, and enforced by the commissioners of bankruptcy, is certainly just and equitable; requiring that every creditor, having a mortgage or other security, shall, before he is admitted to prove his debt, surrender his security for the benefit of the other creditors, the proceeds of the sale going into the common fund; or shall suffer the pledge to be sold, taking the proceeds toward his debt, and proving under the commission for the residue. If it were not so, the equality, intended to be produced by the bankrupt laws, would be grossly violated; and the creditor holding the pledge would, in fact, have a greater security than that pledge was intended to give him. For originally it would have been security, only for a proportion of the debt equal to its value: whereas by proving the whole debt, and holding the pledge for the balance, it becomes security for as much more than its value, as is the dividend, which may be received upon the whole debt.

"This rule was adopted in England on account of its reasonableness, and because consistent with the nature of the contract. For the property pledged is in fact security for no more of the debt, than its value will amount to; and for all the rest, the creditor relies upon the personal credit of his debtor, in the same manner he would for the whole, if no security were taken. The same rule would undoubtedly be applied in England to cases of insolvent estates, when the debtor has deceased; if any mode of settlement and distribution of such insolvent estates existed there.

"There seems to be no good reason, why the same rule should not be applied to the settlement of the estates of deceased insolvent debtors in this Commonwealth. For the statute, which provides for the distribution of these among creditors, requires an equal pro rata distribution; and it never could have been intended by the legislature, that a creditor, having security, should have any advantage, beyond the actual value of the property secured."

The two foregoing quotations illustrate the reasoning used by the various courts adopting one or the other of the rules we are considering, except where statutory construction influenced the results reached. As the Bank Act (St. 1909, p. 87, as amended) does not indicate the course to be followed under the facts of the case before us, we must consider the rights of a pledge holding creditor in enforcing his debt against his debtor under the law and decisions of this state.

[1] It is the well-settled law in this state that as a pledge is only collateral security for the debt, the pledgee may sue upon the debt without first exhausting his security, and resort to the general assets of his debtor for the partial or total satisfaction of the debt, returning the pledge or so much thereof as may remain after the debt is fully paid. As was said in the case of Sonoma Valley Bank v. Hill, 59 Cal. 107:

"Now it is well settled that in the absence of a statute or stipulation to the contrary, the possession of the pledged property does not suspend the right of the pledgee to proceed personally against the pledgor for his debt, without selling the pledge, for the reason that the security is only collateral. It has been repeatedly so held. (See Bank of Rutland v. Woodruff, 34 Vt. 89; Robinson v. Hurley, 11 Iowa, 410 [79 Am. Dec. 497]; Butterworth v. Kennedy, 5 Bosw. [18 N. Y. Super. Ct.] 143; Elder v. Rouse, 15 Wend. [N. Y.] 218; Langdon v. Buell, 9 Wend. [N. Y.] 80, 83; Case v. Boughton, 11 Wend. [N. Y.] 106; Beckwith v. Sibley, 11 Pick. [Mass.] 482; Townsend v. Newell, 14 Pick. [Mass.] 332; Whitaker v. Sumner, 20 Pick. [Mass.] 399.)

"In the case above cited from the Vermont reports (Bank of Rutland v. Woodruff), the law is stated in the opinion of the Court: 'It is claimed, too, that if the plaintiffs held these bills as collateral security for the money merely, they should have offered to surrender them before suing for the money; that they cannot pursue their remedy directly for the money, and hold the bill at the same time. But it is a new doctrine that a creditor holding collateral securities for a debt, cannot enforce his debt without surrendering his securities. He is entitled to hold them until he gets his pay; then they belong to the debtor.'

"The rule on this subject is thus stated in Robinson v. Hurley, above cited: 'After the debt falls due the pledgee under the law has his election to pursue one of three courses: First, to proceed personally against the pledgor for his debt without selling the collateral security; or second, to file a bill in Chancery and have a judicial sale under a regular decree of foreclosure; or third, to sell without judicial process, upon giving reasonable notice to the debtor to redeem.' In Smith v. Strout, 63 Me. 205, it was held that judgment recovered against the pledgor on the debt does not preclude the pledgee from continuing to hold the pledge.

"As a pledge is a security for the payment of the debt, the pledgee must have the right to retain it until the debt is paid. Such is the character of the security, and the decisions in the cases above referred to are in accordance therewith. (See further on the subject Comstock v. Smith, 23 Me 202; Whitwell v. Brigham, 19 Pick. [Mass.] 117; Buck v. Ingersoll, 11 Mete. [Mass.] 226; Story on Bail, § 315; Redfield on Carriers, etc., § 666; 2 Kent's Com. 582.)" See, also, Ehrlich v. Ewald, 66 Cal. 97, 4 P. 1062; Savings Bank v. Middlekauff, 113 Cal. 463, 45 P. 840; Hawley Bros. v. Brownstone, 123 Cal. 643, 56 P. 468; French v. McCarthy, 125 Cal. 508, 58 P. 154; Perry v. Parrot, 135 Cal. 238, 67 P. 144; Com- mercial Savings Bank of San Jose v. Hornberger, 140 Cal. 16, 73 P. 625; Traders Bank of Los Angeles v. Wilcox, 42 Cal. App. 24, 183 P. 256.

[2] It would therefore seem clear that in California a pledge is given and received as collateral security for the payment of the entire debt and not any divisible part or portion thereof. It is as much security for the first dollar of the obligation as it is the last dollar of the debt which may remain unpaid after the application of credits derived from other property of the debtor. We cannot see how the pledge holder can be compelled to treat the pledge as a security for a portion of his debt only in the absence of a statute which might be construed as a part of the contract, compelling him so to do. Also in the absence of any mandate of the law changing the general rule, we cannot see how the fact of the debtor being a bank, the affairs of which are being administered by the superintendent of banks, can change the general rule. The rights and obligations of the parties to a pledge are fixed by the contract under the provisions of law, and the Bank Act being silent upon the subject, the rights and obligations of the parties must remain the same after the commissioner of banks entered the transaction as they were before that event.

[3] Section 27 of the Bank Act (Stats. 1913, p. 151, § 26) provides as follows: "All money and assets belonging to each department, whether on hand or with other banks, and the investments made, shall be held solely for the repayment of the depositors and other claimants of each such department, as herein provided, until all depositors and other claimants of each such department shall have been paid, and the overplus then remaining shall be applied to any other liabilities of such bank."

This section gives to the depositors and claimants mentioned a prior right to participate in the money and assets belonging to the bank, and to that extent gives them a preference over other creditors. People v. California Safe Deposit & Trust Co., 160 Cal. 374, 117 P. 321.

[4, 5] Counsel for the superintendent of banks urge that under sections 2899 and 3433 of the Civil Code the district should be compelled to first exhaust its security and then participate equally with the other creditors in the general assets of the bank for the balance due it. It is admitted that the depositors cannot be paid in full. The two Code sections cited state the rule for marshaling assets in force in this jurisdiction. Neither requires the prior creditor to first resort to the fund or property upon which he has the sole lien if such action would impair his right to the complete satisfaction of his debt. The marshaling of assets is an equitable doctrine which cannot be invoked by one creditor to defeat part of the demand of a prior lienholder. This rule is clearly stated in 16 California Jurisprudence, 950, as follows:

"A lien claimant may invoke the rule of marshalling assets only when it will benefit him without injuring others. The right to marshal is a mere equity which may never be invoked when its operation will accomplish inequity. Marshalling will not be enforced, for example, where the holder of the senior security will be prejudiced by it." Kent v. Williams, 114 Cal. 537, 46 P. 462; Harrington v. Taylor, 176 Cal. 802, 169 P. 690.

If the district were required to exhaust its security and then participate equally with the other creditors in the other assets of the bank, its demand for which the pledge was given would not be paid in full.

Throughout this opinion we have assumed that the pledge of the bonds to the district was a legal and valid transaction. If the superintendent of banks is finally successful in his suit to recover the bonds, or their value, the question we have been discussing will immediately become moot, as the district will have no pledge to secure its deposit; it then occupying the same position as the other unsecured depositors. This case should not have been submitted until the legality of the pledge had been determined.

The order dismissing the order to show cause is reversed.

Suit on note held not premature, where makers did not show holder had consented to further extension under stipulation for extension at holder's option.

The extension stipulation which was a part of the note provided in part that, if the note was not paid on or before June 6, 1927, it was thereby renewed from year to year at the holder's option.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; B. Rey Schauer, Judge.

Action by N. J. Morehouse against W. S. Allen. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

W. S. Allen, in pro. per.

William S. Mitchell, for respondent.

CRAIG, J.

The respondent commenced an action upon a promissory note, to which the appellant pleaded an extension of time for payment until a date subsequent to the filing of suit, and denied that the same was due. Judgment upon the pleadings was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendant appeals.

The complaint alleged that the plaintiff had previously assigned to the defendant a certain promissory note, signed by third parties, for $3,000, dated February 15, 1921, due six months after its date; that on February 28, 1921, the defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiff a promissory note for $3,000 (the instrument in controversy), due six months after the date last mentioned; that in this latter note it was stipulated and agreed that, in the event of the extension, renewal, novation, or substitution of the note of February 15, 1921, "the time for the payment of this note shall automatically be extended to the same date as the maturity of such aforesaid extension, renewal, novation or substitution"; that the defendant did thereafter make a novation and substitution of the note of February 15, 1921, accepting therefor a new note payable June 6, 1927, which latter had matured prior to the filing of this action, and was due, owing, and unpaid.

The defendant affirmatively alleged facts admitting the execution of each of said instruments, but denied that any amount was yet due upon either of the notes. Incorporated in and made a part of the answer is a contract signed by the defendant and said third parties (the payors named in the first note), embodying the note of February 15th, and entitled "Contract of Novation," dated June 6, 1922, and containing the usual provisions of a promissory note, as well as other covenants relating to certain personal property and a mining claim in which all of the parties were interested. It recites that the new note is given in lieu of that executed February 15, 1921, and shall be due and payable on or before June 6, 1927; and that, "if this note is not paid on or before June 6, 1927, it is hereby renewed from year to year, at the option of the holder, until paid." It was further alleged in the answer that "the note or obligation contained in said novation was not paid on or before June 6, 1927, and has not yet been paid, and that the obligation contained in said novation, in accordance with its terms, and at the request of the makers, and in accordance with the option of the defendant, the holder thereof, was on or about June 6, 1927, renewed for one year from June 6, 1927; and that said note or obligation contained in said novation is not yet due, and has not yet been paid."

It is contended by the appellant that the judgment upon the pleadings was erroneous, for the reason that the suit was premature. He relies upon the stipulation of the contract of novation that, "if this note is not paid on or before June 6, 1927, it is hereby renewed from year to year, at the option of the holder, until paid," and upon the allegation that the same had not been paid, had again been extended for one year, and was not due.

[1-4] Authorities cited by the respective parties afford no aid other than in support of the elementary rule that a note may by its own terms provide for its renewal or extension. To this there can be no controversy, and the contention of appellant has been recognized in former cases. Kleinsorge v. Kleinsorge, 133 Cal. 412, 65 P. 876; Caffaro v. Romani, 70 Cal. App. 448, 233 P. 412. It may be conceded, therefore, that by agreement of appellant and respondent as expressed by the terms of the note of February 28, 1921, the note of February 15, 1921, was legally extended by novation or renewal, rendering the first note due June 6, 1927. But it has been held that, where an agreement to renew a note, made at the time of executing it, does not state the number of renewals, it must be construed as an agreement to renew only once. Farmers', etc., Bank v. Laird, 188 Mo. App. 322, 175 S. W. 116. And it is equally well established that, if there be an agreement for renewal at the holder's option, the exercise of the option must be shown by one claiming such extension. California State Bank v. Webber, 110 Cal. 538, 42 P. 1066; Woolwine v. Storrs, 148 Cal. 7, 82 P. 434, 113 Am. St. Rep. 183; Brenneke v. Smallman, 2 Cal. App. 306, 83 P. 302. There must exist a valid and binding contract between the holder and the other party, precluding action to enforce the note. Hamilton Nat. Bank v. Breeden, 130 Tenn. 465, 171 S. W. 86, L. R. A. 1915C, 831;

Illinois Life Ins. Co. v. Young, 118 Kan. 308, 235 P. 104; Farmers' State Bank of Lisbon v. Fausett, 54 N. D. 696, 210 N. W. 638, 48 A. L. R. 1219; Lake St. State Bank of Minneapolis v. Hunter, 170 Minn. 128, 212 N. W. 2; Oetjen v. Robinson-Rodere Co., 98 N. J. Law, 282, 117 A. 629. Appellant's answer does not disclose, by allegation or documentary exhibit, a consent by the respondent to the extension or forbearance of suit after June 6, 1927. We think the action was not premature, and that the answer did not set forth facts sufficient to constitute a defense to the cause of action alleged by the plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

LEGGETT v. COOPER et al.

Civ. 88.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Oct. 27, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ☞1011(1).

Appellate court cannot disturb judgment merely because of conflict in evidence.

2. Appeal and error ☞882(19).

Where defendant assisted in fixing valuation of property stolen from plaintiff, she could not complain because trial court took this valuation as basis of judgment against her.

3. Appeal and error ☞673(2).

Finding that action for conversion of merchandise stolen was not barred could not be disturbed, where there was nothing in record fixing exact date of act of larceny.

The written confession of defendant recited that theft had taken place during period of fourteen months ending on January 5, 1924, and the complaint was filed on December 23, 1925. Plaintiff's witness testified that defendant had said during conference that she did not begin her speculations until number of months after commencement of her employment in July, 1922.

STROTHER, Justice pro tem., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by N. H. Leggett against Anne E. Cooper and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant named appeals.

Affirmed.

Henry C. Mack, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

G. W. Zartman, of Tulare, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The plaintiff and respondent conducted one or more stores in the city of Tulare, county of Tulare, state of California. The defendant and appellant, Anne E. Cooper, was employed by respondent as a clerk from about July, 1922, to about January, 1924, when she left his employ and went to the city of Stockton, Cal. The defendant A. S. Cooper is her husband.

In September, 1924, appellant returned to one of the stores of respondent in Tulare and was there seen stealing and carrying away merchandise. A few days later two employees of respondent went to the city of Stockton and located the residence of appellant and her husband. They found the husband, and with his consent and assistance opened appellant's trunk and found therein a large quantity of merchandise which had been taken from respondent's store in Tulare. They also found a number of unopened bundles of merchandise which had been shipped from respondent's store in Tulare to appellant in Stockton. They also found a number of dresses and other wearing apparel which showed slight wear and which appellant subsequently admitted had been stolen by her from respondent. Appellant had several trunks stored at another address which were opened and found to contain merchandise belonging to respondent. With the consent of appellant's husband all of the merchandise so recovered, which had not been worn, was shipped back to respondent in Tulare.

On the night of the same day, and after the new goods had been returned to respondent, appellant and her husband were interviewed by the employees of respondent at their hotel in Stockton. At this conference, according to the testimony of the witnesses for respondent, appellant was informed of the shipment of all the new goods back to respondent. She admitted stealing these goods from respondent, as well as the slightly worn merchandise, together with small sums of money, and a large amount of other merchandise, which she had sent as presents to her relatives residing in other states. The question of making restitution for the stolen money and merchandise which could not be returned, namely, the worn goods and those sent to relatives of appellant, was discussed between appellant and her husband on the one side and R. E. La Posea and his wife, the employees of respondent, on the other. Mrs. La Posea testified that she listed the articles which appellant admitted stealing from respondent and which were not returned, together with the money taken, and their respective values as given her by appellant, and that this valuation totaled between $1,250 and $1,300. A paper was prepared for the signature of appellant in which she admitted the thefts of the unreturnable property and the money. Her husband, however, objected to the amount, protesting that the valuation of $1,250 was too large. After a considerable discussion it was finally decided by the four that the valuation of the stolen goods which could not be returned, together with the money taken, was $1,000, and that appellant would repay this amount to respondent. The negotiations resulted in an instrument being signed by appellant in words and figures as follows:

"Stockton, California

"Nov. 24th, 1924.

"I hereby voluntarily admit I stole from N. H. Leggett of Tulare California the following listed amount. I hereby release and forever discharge the N. H. Leggett their officers, agents, and employees, jointly and severally from all claims I now have or ever had against them, their officers, agents and employees, by reason of any statement, charge or thing whatsoever made by them concerning me. I sign this of my own free will, under no duress and with no promise of immunity. Merchandise and money for 14 months—ending about Jan. 5th, 1924, amounting to One Thousand Dollars—$1000.00.

"[Signed] Mrs. A. S. Cooper.

"Witness:

"A. S. Cooper.

"R. E. La Posea."

It appears from the testimony of the witnesses for respondent that appellant admitted the theft of this wearing apparel and money from respondent, and that the valuation was fixed as a matter of compromise between the parties, the representatives of respondent maintaining that the total value was in excess of $1,000, and appellant and her husband that the value was $1,000 or less. It also clearly appears from the testimony of Mrs. La Posea that these negotiations at the hotel between the parties, and the written instrument referred only to the money taken and to the merchandise which had either been worn by appellant or given away by her so that it could not be returned and placed in stock. At the time of the signing of this document appellant was fully informed that all new merchandise had already been returned to respondent. The description or valuation of the merchandise returned was not discussed at the conference which resulted in the signing of the written instrument.

Appellant failed to pay for the stolen property not returned, and respondent brought this suit to recover its value. The trial court found in his favor on all questions at issue and rendered judgment against appellant in the sum of $1,000. A judgment of nonsuit was entered in favor of A. S. Cooper who had no knowledge of the thefts of his wife. From this judgment appellant appeals primarily upon the ground that the evidence does not support the findings of the trial court as to the value of the stolen property not returned.

[1] It is true that on the witness stand appellant denied stealing any merchandise or money from respondent. She further testified that all of the merchandise bearing the price marks of respondent which were found in her possession had been purchased and paid for by her, and filed a cross-complaint for the value of the merchandise returned. The trial court, however, found against all her contentions. The evidence for respondent and appellant presents a sharp conflict which the trial court resolved in favor of respondent. In our opinion the evidence is ample to support the findings of the trial court, and these findings are binding upon this court on appeal. We cannot disturb a judgment merely because of a conflict in the evidence. This rule of law is too elementary to need citation of any authorities to sustain it.

[2] According to the testimony of the witnesses for respondent, appellant actually admitted the theft and a consequent indebtedness to respondent. A controversy arose over the amount of this indebtedness. This controversy was finally settled by the parties, who agreed upon the sum of $1,000 as the value of the property stolen by appellant and not returned to respondent. Appellant assisted in fixing this valuation of the stolen property not returned. It is therefore binding upon her and she cannot complain because the trial court took this valuation as a basis of its judgment against her.

[3] Appellant pleaded the statute of limitations as a bar to respondent's demand. The trial court found against her on this defense, and she complains of this finding and maintains that it is not supported by the evidence and is contrary to the evidence. It appears from the record that appellant was employed by respondent in July, 1922, and left early in January, 1924. The complaint was filed on September 23, 1925. R. E. La Posea testified that appellant said during the conference in Stockton that she did not begin her peculations until a number of months after the commencement of her employment. The written confession of appellant recites that the thefts had taken place during the period of fourteen months ending on January 5, 1924. There is nothing in the record to fix the exact dates of the various acts of larceny and nothing which would compel the trial court to conclude that any thefts occurred at such a time prior to the filing of the complaint that any portion of respondent's demand was barred by the statute of limitations. Therefore, the trial court having found against this contention of appellant, its finding cannot be disturbed here.

The findings are supported by ample and competent evidence and the findings support the judgment. There is no prejudicial error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

STROTHER, Justice pro tem.

I dissent. This is an action for conversion of merchandise and money, alleged to have been received by defendants, which belonged to plaintiff, and which, upon demand, they refused to deliver to plaintiff. It is also alleged that defendants admitted in writing their wrongful receipt of the property.

The answer denies the receipt of the property by the defendants and the making of the alleged admission, and by way of counterclaim sets up the wrongful taking and withholding by plaintiff of certain personal property of defendants.

At the close of plaintiff's evidence, the court, on motion, granted a nonsuit as to the defendant A. S. Cooper, and at the conclusion of the trial, ordered judgment against the other defendant, who appeals from the judgment entered against her.

The court found that it was true that the defendant Anne E. Cooper received, between July 22, 1922, and January 5, 1924, merchandise and money to the amount alleged in the complaint, which belonged to plaintiff; that plaintiff upon discovery of the facts, on November 23, 1924, made demand upon defendant for return of the property, but that she failed to return it; that said defendant on November 24, 1924, signed an admission in writing that she had received money and property belonging to plaintiff, in the amount claimed.

The appellant had been employed by the plaintiff in his store in Tulare, and had quit her employment and moved with her husband to Stockton. While on a visit to Tulare she was observed by a Mrs. Pa Posea taking some articles of wearing apparel.

A few days later, at the instance of plaintiff, Mrs. La Posea went to Stockton to get a settlement with appellant for property stolen. Appellant admitted considerable thefts from plaintiff while in his employ, amounting to $1,000 in value and signed a written admission as follows:

"Stockton, California,

"Nov. 24th, 1924.

"I hereby voluntarily admit I stole from N. H. Leggett, of Tulare, California, the following listed amount. I hereby release and forever discharge the N. H. Leggett, their officers, agents and employees, jointly and severally, from all claims I now have or ever had against them, their officers, agents and employees, by reason of any statement, charge or thing whatsoever made by them concerning me. I sign this of my own free will under no duress and with no promise of immunity. Merchandise and money for 14 months, ending about Jan. 5, 1924, amounting to one thousand dollars $1,000.00

"[Signed] Mrs. A. S. Cooper."

The only evidence introduced by plaintiff in support of his cause of action was the above-signed statement and the testimony of Mrs. La Posea of the theft by appellant, on the occasion of her visit to Tulare, of articles worth about $24, and the additional testimony of Mrs. La Posea and her husband relating their conversation with the appellant in Stockton, which was practically to the same effect as the signed statement. No evidence of the taking of any specific article or money was introduced. Mrs. La Posea further testified to the recovery by her, with the assistance of appellant's husband and, apparently without appellant's knowledge, of a large amount of merchandise with plaintiff's tags on the articles, which were shipped back to plaintiff.

The plaintiff himself testified at the trial as follows:

"Q. You are jocular when you say two truck loads, you are not testifying as a fact you recovered two truck loads? A. I think the automobile made three, if not three or four big sedan cars, and I am not sure one of the transfer men didn't go down and bring up a load also. That was Tulare."

He further testified: "I didn't take an inventory. Those goods were placed in a box, and they were nailed up, and they have been nailed up ever since."

The plaintiff alleged in his complaint a demand and refusal of appellant to return the goods. As his testimony and that of his other witness was to the effect that a considerable part of the goods was returned and was in his possession at the time of the trial, he failed to sustain the charge in the complaint that the goods were not returned, at least to the extent of the value of the goods that were returned. Aside from the fact that those articles were returned, he had no evidence, except the general confession of appellant, that any goods were taken. As to what the value of the goods returned was, he, certainly, and probably no one else, was in a position to ascertain.

As the allegation of the complaint as to the return of the goods, and the finding of the court thereon, is not supported by the evidence, the judgment should be reversed. The pleadings in the case are not so framed as clearly to present the issues, and should be amended.

The judgment should be reversed and the court below directed to try the cause anew upon such amendments to the pleadings, if any, as the parties may be advised to make.

PEOPLE v. McINTIRE.*

Cr. 1973.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Oct. 21, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 5, 1930.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court
Nov. 20, 1930.

1. Witnesses ⇨79(3).

Trial court had jurisdiction to determine as fact whether or not witness testifying in criminal prosecution was wife of defendant.

2. Criminal law ⇨1158(4).

Conclusion of trial court that purported marriage of witness in criminal case to defendant was void cannot, where evidence is in conflict, be disturbed (Civ. Code, § 79).

3. Criminal law ⇨671.

Whether or not to excuse jury pending argument as to admissibility of evidence is within discretion of trial court.

4. Criminal law ⇨1144(12).

Presumptions are that court acted with discretion in refusing request to excuse jury pending argument as to admissibility of evidence.

5. Automobiles ⇨336.

Automobile driver may be convicted of failure to do any one of several things required when automobile collides with pedestrian (St. 1923, p. 517, § 141, as amended by St. 1929, p. 544, § 62).

6. Automobiles ⇨355(8).

Evidence held insufficient to sustain conviction for failure to stop and render aid after automobile accident (St. 1923, p. 517, § 141, as amended by St. 1929, p. 544, § 62).

7. Automobiles ⇨355(6).

Evidence held insufficient to sustain conviction for driving automobile on public highway while under influence of liquor (St. 1923, p. 517, § 112, as amended by St. 1929, p. 537, § 44).

8. Criminal law ⇨560.

Conviction is not justified upon mere conjecture or suspicion.

9. Automobiles ⇨355(13).

Facts respecting death of pedestrian struck by automobile held not to warrant conviction of driver for murder in second degree.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William T. Aggeler, Judge.

W. R. McIntire was convicted of second degree murder and driving a motor vehicle while under the influence of liquor and of failure to stop and render aid after accident, and he appeals.

Judgment as to conviction of murder in the second degree modified, and otherwise reversed.

Paul Taylor, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Ralph O. Marron, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SCHMIDT, Justice pro tem.

Appellant, William R. McIntire, in the lower court was convicted under count 1 of the information with the crime of second degree murder, under count 2 of driving a motor vehicle while under the influence of intoxicating liquor in violation of section 112, California Vehicle Act (as amended, Stats. 1929, p. 537, § 44), and under count 3 of failure to stop and render aid, etc., in violation of section 141, California Vehicle Act (as amended, Stats. 1929, p. 544, § 62).

On January 1, 1930, at the intersection of Atlantic boulevard and Hubbard streets in the county of Los Angeles, one Mrs. Margaret Towers, while crossing in a pedestrian lane, was injured by being struck by an automobile, resulting in injuries that caused her death. In connection with this unfortunate accident, appellant was charged in the lower court with the various offenses set forth. This appeal is from the judgment upon the verdicts and from the order of the court denying appellant's motion for a new trial.

Appellant claims error was committed by the trial court in compelling the witness Ruby Burroughs to testify after she claimed she was the wife of appellant.

Between the time of the preliminary hearing and the trial it appears that a purported marriage ceremony was performed; the parties thereto being said witness Ruby Burroughs and appellant. To a great extent this appeal rests upon the admissibility of her testimony—in fact, her testimony was more important than that of all other witnesses combined, to prove who drove the car, as well as other facts.

[1] The contention is made that the court had no power to permit a collateral attack upon the purported marriage once it had been established that a marriage ceremony had been performed. But the attack here made was not collateral. It was the duty of the trial court, and it had jurisdiction, to determine as a fact whether or not the witness was the wife of appellant.

[2] The trial court, after taking testimony, held that the purported marriage having been attempted to be performed under section 79 of the Civil Code, was void, in that the evidence did not show that appellant and said Ruby Burroughs had "been living together as man and wife." There being a conflict in the evidence on this question, we cannot disturb the conclusion reached by the trial court. There was therefore no error committed in compelling Ruby Burroughs to testify.

[3, 4] Error is further assigned in the refusal of the court, upon request of the appellant, to excuse the jury while the lengthy arguments as to the admissibility of the testimony of Ruby Burroughs and the evidence taken pro and con upon this question was being heard. It is well settled that it is within the discretion of the trial court whether or not to excuse the jury pending argument as to the admissibility of evidence. All presumptions are that the court acted with discretion. Appellant has failed to show any prejudice in this regard.

The final point made is insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict of guilty as to each count in the information. For convenience we will consider the counts in their reverse order.

Count 3 was worded substantially in the language of section 141, California Vehicle Act, as amended in 1929 (Stats. 1929, p. 544, § 62), which section, in so far as this case is concerned, reads:

"(a) The driver of any vehicle involved in an accident resulting in injury or death to any person shall immediately stop such vehicle at the scene of such accident and shall fulfill the requirements of subdivision (c) and any person failing to stop or to comply with said requirements under such circumstances shall be guilty of a felony," etc.

"(c) The driver of any vehicle involved in any accident resulting in injury or death to any person * * * shall also give his name, address and the registration number of his vehicle and exhibit his operator's or chauffeur's license to the person struck * * * and shall render to any person injured in such accident reasonable assistance," etc.

[5] Under this section a defendant may be convicted of a failure to do any one of the several required things when his automobile collides with a pedestrian, namely, (1) to stop immediately; or (2) give his name and address; or (3) registration number of his vehicle; or (4) exhibit his operator's or chauffeur's license to the person struck; or (5) to render necessary assistance. People v. Scofield, 203 Cal. 703, page 710, 265 P. 914.

[6] Substantially all the testimony, including that of the said Ruby Burroughs, was that appellant drove the automobile that caused the death of Mrs. Towers; that he stopped about 100 feet from the accident and went about half way to where Mrs. Towers was lying in the street; was accosted by the witness David T. Williams, who stated to appellant, "You have killed that lady," whereupon appellant returned to his car and drove away.

Miss Gladys M. Gould, granddaughter of Mrs. Towers, testified that at the time of the accident she "crossed over to where her grandmother was and saw her laying there; quite a few people gathered just a few minutes after it happened; my mother took my grandmother's head I think, and tried to hold it on her arm but they (the people around there) would not let us touch her."

Immediately following the accident many automobiles and persons gathered at the scene of the accident. Although there is no direct testimony that Mrs. Towers was rendered unconscious, nevertheless it is a very reasonable inference from all the testimony concerning her injuries and her condition that she was not able to talk or understand what was going on.

As to stopping immediately, this appellant did. With reference to the data in subdivisions 2, 3, and 4, the statute requires same to be given to the person struck. If the collision is with another vehicle, which is not the case here, the statute requires that the information shall be given to "the driver or any occupant of any vehicle collided with." It must be borne in mind that the charge in the information related exclusively to said Margaret Towers.

In People v. Scofield, 203 Cal. 703, it was said, at page 708, 265 P. 914, 916: "It was possible for the defendant to have placed on the person of Gilliam" (who was rendered unconscious) "the specified information" (called for by section 141, California Vehicle Act), "but the law would seem to contemplate that such information be given to some one consciously able to receive it. This interpretation of the statute does not, as has been suggested, render it possible for a reckless driver to escape punishment by being sure that he renders his victim unconscious and then proceed on his way. There is still the obligation to stop and render the necessary assistance to the injured party. In this connection it must be noted that the statute requires that necessary assistance be rendered. Under the facts in this case, the deceased was given all the assistance that could be required without the aid of the defendant. It is suggested that the defendant might have interjected his person into the midst of the several individuals who were caring for the deceased and insisted upon his own ministrations. This, we think, he was not required to do under the circumstances here shown. In other words, his assistance was not necessary. To have forced himself into the company of those who were rendering aid might have been an impertinence and not at all justifiable. A failure to do so should not subject the defendant to criminal responsibility under the statute." This language applies with equal force to the case at bar, in which the facts were almost identical. It necessarily follows that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict of guilty under count 3.

[7, 8] II. Count 2 charged appellant with violation of section 112, California Vehicle Act, namely, driving an automobile along and upon a public highway while under the influence of intoxicating liquor. The testimony shows that the accident occurred at about 6:30 to 7 p. m. in the evening. Ruby Burroughs testified that she had seen appellant taking a drink or two in his office early in the afternoon; "I seen him take it out of the bottle, I don't know how much he drank;" that she could not tell whether the bottle contained alcoholic liquor by merely looking at it; that she was not sufficiently familiar with intoxicating liquors to be able to distinguish between various kinds of liquor; that after the accident appellant drove the car from the scene of the accident several miles to the city of Burbank, where some one (the record does not disclose whom) stopped them and asked if they had been drinking, and, receiving an answer in the affirmative, suggested they have some one else drive the car; that thereupon said Ruby Burroughs drove the car for a short distance, but, not being familiar with the driving of cars, appellant again drove the final few blocks to their destination, the Simmons home; that appellant was not under the influence of liquor. Another witness, Sam Maz, testified that right around 6 o'clock appellant drank one glass of light wine containing about six ounces which the witness gave appellant; that it contained not to exceed 3 per cent. of alcoholic content. Another witness, Mrs. Simmons, testified that upon returning to her home about two hours after the accident she found the defendant at her home, and in her opinion he was drunk, and, when asked as to the degree of drunkenness, replied: "He" (appellant) "was still able to stand but he was in a stupor; he was not able to hold any conversation." This, in substance, is all the testimony on this count.

The question is, Was the defendant under the influence of intoxicating liquor within the meaning of the statute? We have here evidence that prior to the accident appellant had had some intoxicating liquor. However, there is an utter lack of any evidence that the liquor had "so far affected the nervous system, brain, or muscles of the driver of an automobile as to impair, to an appreciable degree, his ability to operate his car in the manner that an ordinarily prudent and cautious man, in the full possession of his faculties, using reasonable care, would operate or drive a similar vehicle under like conditions," as the rule was laid down in People v. Ekstromer, 71 Cal. App. 239, at page 246, 235 P. 69, 71, or facts from which the jury could so infer. It is a well-known fact that some people can and do take several drinks without being substantially affected thereby, while others are affected by the mere taking of one drink. It is likewise a well-known fact that with many people the effect resulting from drinking alcoholic liquors is not produced until some time after taking, while with others the effect is almost immediate. There is no substantial evidence upon which it could be legally found that at the time of the accident appellant was driving his car while under the influence of intoxicating liquor. The evidence in this case only creates a conjecture or suspicion that at the time of the accident appellant was under the influence of intoxicating liquor. A conviction is not justified upon mere conjecture or suspicion. The situation in this case is quite similar to a civil action in which a collision is proved, but not any negligence. It necessarily follows that the evidence is wholly insufficient to sustain a conviction under count 2.

[9] III. We come now to consider count 1, under which appellant was found guilty of murder in the second degree. The theory of murder arises from a death resulting in the commission of a felony, in this case, resulting from driving an automobile in violation of section 112, California Vehicle Act. Having heretofore held that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the conviction under count 2, namely, violation of section 112 California Vehicle Act, the conviction of murder in the second degree cannot stand. We are, however, satisfied that the facts of the case show and justified the verdict of the jury in so far as it held appellant responsible for the death of Mrs. Towers. We are equally satisfied that the verdict of guilty should not have been greater than manslaughter.

Section 1181, Penal Code, as amended in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1037), provides that, if the evidence in criminal cases shows the defendant to be not guilty of the degree of the crime of which he was convicted, but guilty of a lesser degree thereof or of a lesser crime included therein, the trial court may modify the judgment accordingly without granting or ordering a new trial, and this power shall extend to any court to which the cause may be appealed.

This section received interpretation from the Supreme Court in People v. Kelley, 208 Cal. 387, 281 P. 609, and, applying the construction given section 1181, Penal Code, in that case to count 1 in this case, the same order as made in the Kelley Case should be made here.

As to count 1, the judgment of the lower court of murder in the second degree is modified. The cause is remanded to the trial court, with directions to enter a judgment against appellant finding him guilty of manslaughter, and thereupon to pronounce judgment upon him as prescribed by law. As to count 2, the judgment of conviction and order denying a new trial are reversed; and as to count 3 the judgment of conviction and order denying a new trial are reversed.

We concur: WORKS, P. J.; CRAIG, J.

NORTH BRITISH & MERCANTILE INS.
CO., Limited, et al. v. INGALLS.

Civ. 209.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Oct. 22, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 7, 1930.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court
Dec. 13, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ☞907(2).

Appellate court, in absence of evidence, must assume that it supported findings which are therefore binding.

2. Appeal and error ☞907(2).

Appellate court, in absence of testimony, must assume that facts were of such character as to sustain findings and judgment.

3. Fraudulent conveyances ☞39.

Transfer of proceeds of insurance policy to wife as result of death of husband was not fraudulent as to creditors of husband (Civ. Code, §§ 1149, 1153, 1571-1573, 3439, 3440, 3442).

Since death is an involuntary happening that most people desire to avoid as long as possible, such involuntary fact of death would not be an act by which one could commit a fraud, nor was it an omission to perform a duty from which constructive fraud might be inferred.

4. Exemptions ☞4.

Statutes exempting property from levy of execution are to be liberally construed.

5. Fraudulent conveyances ☞39.

Statute relating to exemption from execution was inapplicable in action by husband's creditors against beneficiary in insurance policy (Code Civ. Proc. § 690, subd. 18).

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Charles L. Allison, Judge.

Action by the North British & Mercantile Insurance Company, Limited, and others, against Ruth L. Ingalls. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

W. W. Hindman and Jennings & Belcher, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Isaac Jones, of Ontario, and Martin J. Coughlin and W. E. Byrne, both of San Bernardino, for respondent.

MARKS, Acting P. J.

Appellants are corporations organized for the purpose of writing various forms of insurance, and are licensed to do business in the state of California. Respondent is the widow of J. S. Ingalls, deceased, who died November 26, 1924. During his life he was engaged in the business of writing insurance as agent for the appellant companies. Shortly after the death of J. S. Ingalls, respondent was appointed executrix of his last will and testament and entered upon the discharge of her duties as such. The life insurance companies hereinafter referred to had written insurance upon the life of deceased, with respondent named as beneficiary in each policy, except two. These two policies were in the sum of $2,000 each, and were made payable to his estate. In each of the policies here involved the insured reserved the right to change the beneficiary. After the death of deceased, respondent received from the insurance carriers the sum of $67,355.22, for herself, and $4,000, as executrix of the estate of deceased. On the 14th day of December, 1925, she filed an inventory and appraisal of the property of deceased which showed total assets of the value of $17,966.58. The claims and debts of deceased amounted to the sum of $44,591.34. Among them were claims in favor of the insurance companies who are appellants here, in the sum approximately of $28,000.

Appellants instituted this action against respondent to subject the insurance moneys received by her personally to the debts of deceased. It is alleged in the amended complaint that at the time of the death of deceased he was insolvent and that the payment of the money to respondent on the insurance policies was an act in fraud of the creditors of deceased, and was therefore void as against such creditors. It is the theory of appellants that the insurance policies were the community property of the deceased and respondent; that a gift of such community property was effected by deceased to respondent and became effective upon his death, at which time his estate was wholly insolvent; and that such gift was in fraud of creditors. As a further argument, it is urged on behalf of appellants that if a gift or transfer of the policies of insurance became effective prior to the death of deceased, it was a gift in contemplation of death and must be regarded as a legacy in so far as the creditors of deceased are concerned.

The case was tried before the court without a jury and after judgment rendered in favor of respondent comes before us on the judgment roll alone.

It appears that the insurance policies upon the life of deceased were issued and the premiums made payable upon the following dates: March 22, 1920, policy No. 387114 of the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company was issued, premium ($85) made payable quarterly on the 22d days of June, September, December, and March of each year. Policy No. 464363 of the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company was issued July 24, 1922, premium ($669) made payable in advance annually on the 24th day of July each year. Policy No. 500184 of the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company was issued June 5, 1923, premium ($136.80) made payable annually in advance on the 5th day of June of each year. Policy No. 1159324 of the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company was issued June 20, 1916, premium ($63.38) made payable annually on the 20th day of June in advance of each year. Policy No. 1304260 of the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company was issued January 2, 1919, premium ($30) made payable quarterly on the 2d days of January, April, July, and October of each year. Policy No. 1304261 of the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company was issued January 2, 1919, premium ($30) made payable quarterly on the 2d days of January, April, July, and October of each year. Policy No. 104345 of the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company was issued May 27, 1921, premium ($61.26) made payable annually in advance on the 20th day of May of each year. Policy No. 1159323 of the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company was issued June 25, 1923, premium ($63.38) made payable annually in advance on the 20th day of June of each year. Policy No. 560727 of the Union Central Life Insurance Company was issued November 2, 1917, premium ($38.40) made payable quarterly on the 2d days of February, May, August, and November of each year.

Policy No. 648474 of the Union Central Life Insurance Company was issued April 26, 1920, premium ($82) made payable quarterly on the 2d days of July, October, January, and April of each year. Policy No. 707272 of the Union Central Life Insurance Company was issued December 22, 1921, premium ($311.10) made payable annually in advance on the 17th day of December of each year.

The deceased became indebted to the appellants as follows: To the National Fire Insurance Company of Hartford during the months of June, July, August, September, October, and November, 1924; to the Colonial Fire Underwriters Agency of Hartford during the months of August, September, October, and November, 1924; to the Pennsylvania Fire Insurance Company of Philadelphia during the year 1924; to Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York during the year 1924; and to the North British & Mercantile Insurance Company during the year 1924.

On all issues of fraud the court found against the contentions of appellants. The portions of the findings essential to this appeal are as follows:

"That the said J. S. Ingalls was not insolvent at the time of his death; but that the estate of said J. S. Ingalls, deceased, is insolvent."

"That the policies of insurance referred to in the affirmative allegations contained in paragraph X of defendant's answer to the first cause of action set forth in plaintiffs' amended complaint on file herein, upon which defendant alleges she collected certain moneys from certain life insurance companies, are the same policies of life insurance herein found in which defendant was named the beneficiary thereof and upon which it is herein found certain sums of money herein specified were paid to her as such beneficiary. That at the time each of said policies of life insurance, in which it is herein found that defendant was named beneficiary thereof, was obtained, acquired and issued, and during all the times each thereof was maintained, and at the time each, every and all of the premiums thereon were paid, the said J. S. Ingalls was solvent and not in contemplation of insolvency. And that none of said life insurance policies was obtained, acquired or issued, or any premium thereon paid, and that the defendant herein was not named therein or permitted to remain as the beneficiary of any thereof, and defendant did not collect any of the proceeds from any of said life insurance policies, with the intent on the part of either said J. S. Ingalls or the defendant herein, to hinder, or delay, or defraud any creditor of said J. S. Ingalls, or any other person of his demands."

"That the only creditors the said J. S. Ingalls had, and of his estate, are those who after his death presented to and had allowed by the said executrix and probate court claims against said J. S. Ingalls, deceased, and his said estate. That each and every one of the obligations of the said J. S. Ingalls for which such creditors so presented and had allowed such claims, was incurred at a time long subsequent to the respective times when the said J. S. Ingalls obtained and had issued each, every and all of the aforesaid life insurance policies, and at a time subsequent to the payment of most of the premiums thereon. That at the respective times each, every and all of the said policies of life insurance were obtained and issued the said J. S. Ingalls was not indebted to the plaintiffs, or to any, or either of them, or to any one of the persons, firms, or corporations, who presented to and had allowed by said executrix and probate court any claim against the said J. S. Ingalls, deceased, or to his said estate; that none of the plaintiffs, or any one of the persons, firms or corporations who presented to and had allowed by said executrix and probate court any claim against said J. S. Ingalls, deceased, or his said estate, was a creditor of the said J. S. Ingalls at the or a time when any of said policies of life insurance were obtained or issued. That each and every one of said policies of life insurance were obtained and issued, and most of the premiums thereon paid, at a time long prior to the time the said J. S. Ingalls became indebted to any one of the plaintiffs or to any one of the persons, firms or corporations who after the death of the said J. S. Ingalls presented to and had allowed by said executrix and probate court any claim against said deceased, J. S. Ingalls, or his said estate."

"That the defendant was not named as beneficiary in any of said life insurance policies as trustee, or otherwise, for the said J. S. Ingalls, or for any of his creditors."

"That the plaintiffs at the commencement of the trial of this action in open court expressly waived any and all right plaintiffs may have had to a judgment for the amount of premiums paid by the said J. S. Ingalls on account of said life insurance policies at a time when he, the said J. S. Ingalls, may have been insolvent."

The question presented upon this appeal is a new one in the jurisprudence of California. We have been cited to but few decisions of the courts of this state that are of material value to us in reaching our conclusions. The identical question has been passed upon many times by the courts of sister states which have held with surprising unanimity against the contention of appellants.

Appellants' arguments, based upon numerous California decisions and Code sections, are extremely ingenious and are forcefully presented. They base their theory of the case upon the doctrine announced in Union Mutual Life Insurance Company v. Broderick, 196 Cal. 497, 238 P. 1034, 1038, and other kindred cases. In the Broderick Case, the deceased, Herbert D. Broderick, took out a policy of insurance on his life with his wife named therein as his beneficiary, with the right reserved to himself to change the beneficiary. In consideration of a loan to him of $1,000 by his sister, he changed the beneficiary in the policy from his wife to his sister, who paid some of the subsequent premiums on the policy. In reaching its conclusions the Supreme Court held as follows:

"The policy of insurance in this case reserved to the assured the right to change the beneficiary. The rule in such cases is well stated in New York Life Ins. Co. v. Bank of Italy, 60 Cal. App. 602, 214 P. 61, wherein it is said: 'It is true that under a policy reserving to the assured the right to change the beneficiary the interest of the designated person prior to the death of the insured is a mere expectancy in an inchoate or incompleated gift, which is subject to revocation at the will of the insured, and that the power of revocation which would defeat it might be exercised up to the moment of his death. When, therefore, the deceased substituted the different enumerated persons in the place of his estate as beneficiaries he initiated a gift which, in the case of appellant, became complete by the death of the insured without revocation. And this is so notwithstanding that the premiums were paid from community funds. McEwen v. New York Life Ins. Co., 23 Cal. App. 694, 139 P. 242; Shoudy v. Shoudy, 55 Cal. App. 447, 203 P. 437.'"

See, also, Blethen v. Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co., 198 Cal. 91, 243 P. 431; New York Life Insurance Co. v. Dunn, 46 Cal. App. 203, 188 P. 1028; New York Life Insurance Co. v. Bank of Italy, 60 Cal. App. 602, 214 P. 61; Estate of Castagnola, 68 Cal. App. 732, 230 P. 188; Mutual Benefit Co. v. Clark, 81 Cal. App. 546, 254 P. 306; Denike v. Denike, 86 Cal. App. 493, 261 P. 322; Dotson v. International Life Insurance Co., 89 Cal. App. 653, 265 P. 357; Blackburn v. Merchants' Life Insurance Co., 90 Cal. App. 362, 265 P. 882.

From the doctrine we have quoted from the Broderick Case, appellants next pass to four sections of the Civil Code, which provide as follows:

Section 1149. "A gift in view of death is one which is made in contemplation, fear, or peril of death, and with intent that it shall take effect only in case of the death of the giver."

Section 1153. "A gift in view of death must be treated as a legacy, so far as relates only to the creditors of the giver."

Section 3440. "Every transfer of personal property, other than a thing in action, or a ship or cargo at sea or in a foreign port, and every lien thereon, other than a mortgage, when allowed by law, and a contract of bottomry or respondentia, is conclusively presumed if made by a person having at the time the possession or control of the property, and not accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the things transferred, to be fraudulent, and therefore void, against those who are his creditors while he remains in possession, and the successors in interest of such creditors, and against any persons on whom his estate devolves in trust for the benefit of others than himself, and against purchasers or encumbrancers in good faith subsequent to the transfer. * * *

Section 3442. "In all cases arising under section twelve hundred and twenty-seven, or under the provisions of this title, except as otherwise provided in section thirty-four hundred and forty, the question of fraudulent intent is one of fact and not of law; nor can any transfer or charge be adjudged fraudulent solely on the ground that it was not made for a valuable consideration; provided, however, that any transfer or encumbrance of property made or given voluntarily, or without a valuable consideration, by a party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, shall be fraudulent, and void as to existing creditors."

To the foregoing sections cited by appellants we add, as pertinent, the following section of the same Code:

Section 3439. "Every transfer of property or charge thereon made, every obligation incurred, and every judicial proceeding taken, with intent to delay or defraud any creditor or other person of his demands, is void against all creditors of the debtor, and their successors in interest, and against any person upon whom the estate of the debtor devolves in trust for the benefit of others than the debtor."

[1] With these provisions of law before them, counsel for appellants argue that respondent had only an expectancy, and not an estate, in the benefits to be derived under the policies of insurance; that this expectancy did not ripen into an interest until the death of deceased; that upon the death happening, a gift of the benefits occurred from the husband to the wife; that as the gift was without consideration, and as the husband was insolvent at the time, it was void as against his creditors. As an alternative proposition they argue that if the gift did not occur at the time of the death of the husband, it took place at some prior date and was in contemplation of death and therefore void. We need spend no time on this latter proposition. The trial court found all the facts against the contention of appellants, upon which they must rely to establish a void gift inter vivos. As the evidence is not before us, we must assume that it supported these findings which are, therefore, binding upon us.

The trial court further found that J. S. Ingalls was not insolvent at the time of his death. It also found with great particularity that the value of his estate was $17,966.58, and his debts, $44,591.34. In view of this latter finding we will assume that Ingalls was insolvent at the moment of his death. As the court found that at the times all the premiums on the insurance policies were paid, Ingalls was solvent, and, as the last premium was paid on November 2, 1924, we will further assume that the insolvency occurred after that date, and at the time of or just before his death, on November 26, 1924. The trial court found that the insurance premiums were paid with either the separate funds of deceased, or with the funds of the community. Counsel for appellants have assumed that community funds were used for this purpose.

[2] The record is silent upon the question of whether the demands of appellants were the separate debts of deceased, or obligations of the community. In the absence of the testimony, we must assume that they were of such a character as to sustain the findings and judgment. E. E. McCalla Co. v. Sleeper (Cal. App.) 288 P. 146.

[3] Under the law as it now stands, we would probably hold that a wife named as beneficiary in an insurance policy on the life of her husband, the premium having been paid from community funds, and in which the right had been reserved to the insured to change the beneficiary, has a greater interest in the insurance than a bare expectancy which might be defeated by the caprice of her husband. Blethen v. Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co., supra; Union Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Broderick, supra. For the purpose of this opinion, however, we will assume that the contention of appellants on this phase of the case is correct, and using this assumption, we will then consider the question of whether or not there was any fraud on the part of either the husband or the wife, in the change of the rights of the wife from a mere expectancy to a vested interest in the insurance benefits.

Section 3440 of the Civil Code makes every transfer of personal property void as to creditors under the conditions specified therein. Section 3442 of the Civil Code provides that every transfer of property made or given voluntarily, or without consideration, void as to existing creditors. Section 3441 of the same Code gives the creditor the right to avoid the act of the debtor where the fraud obstructs the right of the creditor to take the property affected.

Certainly, in the case before us there was no fraud on the part of any one in the act of the deceased in taking out the policies of insurance on his life. He was solvent at the time and none of the appellants were then his creditors. There was nothing wrong in naming his wife as beneficiary in these policies. The law looks with favor upon the attempt of the husband to provide a competence for his widow. There was nothing wrong in his paying the premiums on this insurance. He was solvent when all these premiums were paid. If they had not been paid the policies would have lapsed and appellants would not be before the courts pressing this suit for the relief they desire. At the time the great majority of the premiums were paid appellants were not the creditors of deceased. Of what, then, must the appellants complain, and upon what must they base their charges of fraud? There are but two elements in the case left to them, namely, the death of deceased and the ripening of the expectancy in the insurance benefits into an interest by operation of law. Can fraud be predicated solely upon death and the operation of law? Death has cheated many creditors and canceled many debts, and the law has frequently placed property beyond the reach of creditors. We do not believe that a dead man can commit a fraud even when aided in the change of an interest in property by the operation of law. The change in the interest came only after death. As long as life remained in Ingalls the status of the parties and the property remained unchanged. When the breath of life departed the change occurred. The same moment that made respondent a widow vested in her the right to the benefits under the insurance policies. The community of husband and wife was then dissolved.

"Fraud is either actual or constructive." Section 1571, Civ. Code. Actual fraud consists of acts committed by a party. Section 1572, Civ. Code. Constructive fraud is a breach of duty by a party or an act or omission which the law specially declares to be fraudulent. Section 1573, Civ. Code. As we have seen, the Code sections relating to fraudulent instruments relate to transfers of property. Actual fraud and fraudulent transfers imply an act on the part of one committing the fraud. Implied fraud arises from an act or omission or a breach of duty. We find nothing in the record to show an act or omission on the part of any party to the contracts of insurance, either during the insolvency of the insured or in contemplation of such insolvency that would bring the case within the Code provisions. The policies were issued and the premiums paid prior to the insolvency of deceased. The best of faith on the part of the insured, the insurance companies, and the beneficiary appears in the issuance of the policies and the payment of the premiums and with everything connected with the insurance up to the time of the death of the insured. There was no change in the relation of the parties and no act or omission upon which to predicate fraud up to the moment that life departed from the body of the insured. A dead man cannot act. Here the law acted for him. What omission or breach of duty can be charged to deceased? The failure to live and pay his debts is the one suggesting itself. Death generally comes unasked and unsought. It is an involuntary happening that most people desire to avoid as long as possible. An act implies a will to perform. An omission indicates a failure to do an act. Both imply a will to do or not to do something that should or should not be done. The involuntary fact of death is not an act by which one can commit a fraud, nor is it an omission to perform a duty from which constructive fraud may be inferred. The "transfer" of property in this case was consummated, not by an act or omission on the part of deceased, but by his death and the "act" on the law itself.

We find the reasoning used by the Court of Appeals of Colorado in the case of Hendrie & Bolthoff Mfg. Co. v. Platt, 13 Colo. App. 15, 56 P. 209, 211, particularly applicable to the case before us. The court said:

"Besides, the contract is based upon and its fruits finally realized, if at all, because of the insurable interest of the beneficiary in the life of the assured. The latter is equally as essential, and is equally an important consideration of the contract. Upon what principle or theory, then, can it be said that rights based upon this insurable interest, which is an interest or right purely personal to the beneficiary, can inure to the benefit of the creditors of the assured? Can they say to the wife: 'Though it is true that this fund was realized upon your insurable interest in the life of your husband, not upon his interest in his own life, nor upon our interest in it as creditors, yet, because he paid the cash premiums required while insolvent, we should subject to the payment of our debts, not only so much of the fund as equals the amount of premiums so paid, which is all he took from his estate, and all of which he deprived us, but we will take the whole fund. We will take back that which he took from us, and also that which could not have been secured without your insurable interest in his life.' The questions, in our opinion, suggest their own answer.

"Again, the fund, which is the property against which the creditors seek to enforce their claims, has not come into existence, has not become property till after the death of the debtor. How, then, can it be said that he made a voluntary or fraudulent conveyance of that which did not exist during his life? If a creditor's rights would attach to any portion of the proceeds of the insurance, would it not be more reasonable to say that in such case the right of recovery would be limited to the amount of funds so diverted, which in this instance would be the aggregate amount of premiums paid by the insolvent debtor? This would be what he gave to or voluntarily expended for the benefit of his wife. The fund, realized by her was not from the payment of the premiums only, but from and by reason of, in addition thereto, her insurable interest in his life, which he neither gave nor conveyed to her, and in which he had no interest. In this state a married woman has a right to acquire, hold, manage, and convey her own separate property, free from any claim of her husband or of his creditors. Suppose that an insolvent husband should give to his wife $1,000, and that such a gift was under such circumstances as to make it manifestly fraudulent against his creditors; and suppose that his wife, by prudent management of the money, and by successful speculation, should, in course of time, acquire property of the value of $5,000. Could it be successfully contended that the husband's creditors could enforce their claims against this property to the full extent of its value? Obviously not. Certainly, in the absence of actual fraud upon the part of the wife, their right would be limited to the amount of the original money gift, with interest. This was what he gave in fraud of the creditors; this, what he took from them. It became none the less her absolute property because she might afterwards be compelled to repay it; and upon no principle of either law or justice could she be required to answer to her husband's creditors for its accretions while it was her property. All which the creditors could have demanded from the debtor was the amount of the gift had he retained it, and certainly this was all which they could demand from the donee or grantee. Upon precisely the same principle it would seem clear that the proceeds of life insurance effected in favor of an insolvent debtor's wife could be chargeable, if at all, with his debts only to the extent that he, while insolvent, had used the funds of his estate to secure and carry the insurance."

The following cases from other jurisdictions tend to support the position of respondent: Tyler v. Treasurer, 226 Mass. 306, 115 N. E. 300, L. R. A. 1917D, 633; Pullis v. Robison, 73 Mo. 201, 39 Am. Rep. 497; Sternberg v. Levy, 159 Mo. 617, 60 S. W. 1114, 53 L. R. A. 438; Harriman National Bank v. Huie (C. C. A.) 249 F. 856; Bailey v. Wood, 202 Mass. 549, 89 N. E. 147, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 722; Shaver v. Shaver, 35 App. Div. 1, 54 N. Y. S. 464; Pence v. Makepeace, 65 Ind. 345; Stigler v. Stigler, 77 Va. 163; Pinneo v. Goodspeed, 120 Ill. 524, 12 N. E. 196; Chapin v.

Fellowes, 36 Conn. 132, 4 Am. Rep. 49. Citation of further authorities might be greatly extended, but no good could come of it. A contrary rule has been adopted in but few states.

Appellants further contend that under the provisions of subdivision 18 of section 690 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is their right to have applied to their claims the benefits of all insurance policies on the life of deceased whose annual premium payments were in excess of $500. They admit that respondent is entitled to receive and retain the benefits purchased by an annual premium up to that amount. In support of this argument they cite the cases of Hall v. Hess, 97 Misc. Rep. 331, 161 N. Y. S. 418; Stone v. Knickerbocker Life Insurance Company, 52 Ala. 589; Fearn v. Ward, 80 Ala. 555, 2 So. 114; Kimball v. Cunningham Hardware Co., 197 Ala. 631, 73 So. 323; Red River National Bank v. DeBerry, 47 Tex. Civ. App. 96, 105 S. W. 998; and Holmes v. Marshall, 145 Cal. 777, 79 P. 534, 69 L. R. A. 67, 104 Am. St. Rep. 86, 2 Ann. Cas. 88. The cases from New York, Alabama, and Texas turned upon the particular provisions of the debtor's exemption laws of those states. On account of the marked difference between these laws and the provisions of our Code, they do not furnish authority for a like holding here.

In the case of Holmes v. Marshall, supra, the following facts appear: J. F. Jenkins died intestate leaving Annie J. Jenkins as his surviving widow. He had three policies of insurance on his life, one payable to his estate in the sum of $982.50, and the others in the total sum of $1,484 payable to his widow. The money was paid to the respective beneficiaries, and after deducting the expenses and costs of administration, the balance, which was paid to the estate, was set aside to the widow as exempt property. The widow placed these moneys in her bank account where they were attached by Holmes. The attachment was dissolved and an appeal taken. The Supreme Court sustained the order dissolving the attachment, holding that the money was exempt from all executions. The question which confronts us was not involved in this case and was not considered or decided by the court.

We are brought to the consideration of the question of whether or not insurance benefits payable to the widow, in excess of the amount that could be purchased with an annual premium of $500, can be subjected to the debts of her deceased husband. In considering this phase of the case we are faced with the fact that the expectancy of the wife in the insurance did not vest and become an interest until the moment she became a widow, at which time the community was broken. The only value taken from the property of the husband in acquiring the insurance was the premiums paid. The benefits paid to the widow were the results of the payments of these premiums and her insurable interest in her husband.

[4] Statutes exempting property from the levy of an execution are enacted by the Legislature on grounds of public policy for the purpose of providing for a debtor and the members of his family (Estate of Millington, 63 Cal. App. 498, 218 P. 1022), and it is the policy of the law to construe the exemption statute liberally (Crown Laundry Co. v. Cameron, 39 Cal. App. 617, 179 P. 525), so as to carry out the intention of the Legislature (12 Cal. Jur. 332).

[5] If this action were based upon debts of the wife, the answer to the question would be simple. If the insurance policies had matured and the benefits had been paid to the husband, and the action was against him upon his debt during his lifetime, our course would be clear. But the debt is that of the husband, and the action is against the wife after his death. Section 690 of the Code of Civil Procedure is a part of chapter 1 of title 9 of this code. This title is headed "Execution of Judgment in Civil Actions." Section 690 is headed "What Exempt from Execution." The preceding sections of the chapter relate to the levy of the execution by the judgment creditor upon the property of the judgment debtor. From the context of the chapter it would seem to us that the provisions of section 690 were intended by the Legislature to relate to exemptions from execution against the judgment debtor and not a stranger to the indebtedness. With this conclusion reached, we are of the opinion that the limitations on the amount of insurance exempt, contained in subdivision 18 of section 690 of the Code of Civil Procedure, would only apply in an action by the creditor against his judgment debtor who has received insurance moneys in excess of an amount purchased by an annual premium of $500. The limitation does not apply in an action of a creditor of the husband on the husband's debt against a stranger to the indebtedness who happens to have been the beneficiary in insurance policies and to have received the money thereon. Had any of the premiums been paid by the insured during his insolvency, many cases uphold the right of the creditor to recover such premiums. However, this question is not involved in this case in view of the waiver of appellants contained in the findings, and the findings as to the solvency of the insured when the premiums were paid.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Constitutional law ⇨12.

Exception to general and prevailing rule must be strictly construed and not extended beyond its letter.

2. Indictment and Information ⇨2(3).

In construing constitutional provision, relating to prosecutions by information, presumption must be indulged there was no intention to affect existing system any further than plain terms required (Const. art. 1, § 8).

Const. art. 1, § 8, provides that offenses heretofore required to be prosecuted by indictment shall be prosecuted by information, after examination and commitment by magistrate, or by indictment, with or without such examination and commitment as may be prescribed by law.

3. Constitutional law ⇨80(1).

Legislature has no power to confer upon district attorney, as executive officer, judicial authority (Const. art. 3, and art. 6, § 1).

Const. art. 6, § 1, vests judicial power of state in Senate sitting as court of impeachment, in Supreme Court, District Courts of Appeal, superior courts, such municipal courts as may be established, and such inferior courts as Legislature may establish, and article 3 distributes and divides powers of government into three separate departments.

4. Criminal law ⇨1167(1).

Where magistrate committed defendant for manslaughter, but district attorney filed information charging him with murder, and jury returned verdict of manslaughter, district attorney's error required reversal of judgment (Pen. Code, § 809; Const. art. 1, § 8).

*Hearing granted 300 P. 23.

David Welts and Cooper & Collings, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the State.

Joseph W. Ryan, of Los Angeles, amicus curiæ.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

A complaint against the defendant in this case was filed in the municipal court on December 3, 1929, charging him with murder. A preliminary hearing was had and the magistrate refused to bind him over for the offense mentioned, but committed him to the sheriff to await trial for the crime of manslaughter. In due course the district attorney filed an information charging him with manslaughter in accordance with the commitment. Subsequently and on January 23, 1930, the district attorney made a motion for leave to file an amended information, which motion was denied. On the following day, with the consent of the court, the information was dismissed and a new complaint charging murder was filed in the municipal court. Again a preliminary hearing was had before another judge of that court, and again the magistrate declined to hold the defendant for murder, but committed him for manslaughter. On this occasion, however, the district attorney, claiming to act under the authority of section 809 of the Penal Code, filed an information by which he charged the defendant with murder. A trial was had and the jury returned a verdict of guilty of manslaughter. Prior to the trial and after the filing of the second information the defendant made a motion to set it aside on the ground that he had not been legally committed, and for the further reason that the offense alleged in the information was not shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary hearing. This is an appeal from the judgment pronounced upon the verdict.

The first point, and the one most insistently pressed upon us by the appellant as well as amicus curiæ, is that section 809 of the Penal Code is unconstitutional in so far as it purports to authorize the district attorney to charge an offense not named in the order of commitment. The enactment reads as follows: "When a defendant has been examined and committed, as provided in section 872 of this code, it shall be the duty of the district attorney, within fifteen days thereafter, to file in the superior court of the county in which the offense is triable an information charging the defendant with such offense. The information shall be in the name of the people of the State of California, and subscribed by the district attorney, and shall be in form like an indictment for the same offense. It may charge the offense, or offenses, named in the order of commitment, or any offense, or offenses, shown by the evidence taken before the magistrate to have been committed."

It is asserted that the section is in violation of section 8 of article 1 of the state Constitution, which reads: "Offenses heretofore required to be prosecuted by indictment shall be prosecuted by information, after examination and commitment by a magistrate, or by indictment, with or without such examination and commitment, as may be prescribed by law. A grand jury shall be drawn and summoned at least once a year in each county."

The first question which presents itself for consideration concerns the reason why the people wrote this provision into the fundamental law and particularly into the article defining and declaring a bill of rights. When the barons of England exacted from King John a declaration of their rights and liberties they incorporated in the Great Charter these words: "No freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or disseized, or outlawed, or exiled, or in any way harmed—nor will we go upon or send upon him—save by the lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land." (Italics ours.) This provision alone, says Blackstone, "would have merited the title it bears, of the great charter" because it protected every individual of the nation in the free enjoyment of his life, his liberty, and his property, unless declared to be forfeited by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land." 4 Blackstone's Comm. 424. In Cooley's Constitutional Limitations (vol. II, p. 736) we read concerning this section of the Magna Charta this language: "Perhaps no definition is more often quoted than that given by Mr. Webster in the Dartmouth College Case [4 Wheat. 518, 4 L. Ed. 629]: 'By the law of the land is most clearly intended the general law; a law which hears before it condemns; which proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial. The meaning is that every citizen shall hold his life, liberty, property, and immunities, under the protection of the general rules which govern society. Everything which may pass under the form of an enactment is not therefore to be considered the law of the land.'" (Italics ours.) Mr. Webster went further than the quotation evidences. He continued: "Such a strange construction would render constitutional provisions of the highest importance completely inoperative and void. It would tend directly to establish the union of all powers in the legislature. There would be no general permanent law for courts to administer or men to live under. The administration of justice would be an empty form, an idle ceremony. Judges would sit to execute legislative judgment and decrees, not to declare the law or administer the justice of the country." Any student of history is cognizant of the fact that this section of the great charter was not always proof against the seizure and incarceration of men contrary to the "law of the land" and the dictates of natural justice. For example, let us call to mind how the Duke of Buckingham was ordered to the Tower by Henry VIII, in defiance of the traditional law, the first in this sovereign's long list of martyrs. It would be the work of supererogation to set down further instances in English history where for one political consideration or another men were deprived of their liberty without the formality of indictment. Suffice it to say that such acts and the combining of the power of judge and prosecutor accounted for a not inconsiderable part of the immigrants to our shores. Nor is it surprising that with a background of many failures to observe the greatest section of the pledge of King John, the colonists viewed with suspicious eye the entire legal profession. When the time came for them to declare their independence they voiced their disapproval of the use of a conglomerate mixture of judicial and executive power by the sovereign in these words: "He has obstructed the administration of justice by refusing his assent to laws for establishing judiciary powers" and "for depriving us, in many cases, of the benefits of trial by jury" and "for transporting us beyond seas to be tried for pretended offenses." So important did this phase of government appeal to those upon whom fell the duty of framing the fundamental law that the general subject with which we deal was split into three articles in the Bill of Rights, made a part of the Constitution by the first ten amendments. One of these (Amendment 7) provides for jury trials "in suits at common law," another (Amendment 6) guarantees the accused in criminal prosecutions "the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury," and the third (Amendment 5), the one which directly bears upon our problem, reads: "No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any Criminal Case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation." It is impossible to accurately determine the weight and measure of words without having in mind to some degree at least an appreciation of those conditions which led up to their being set down. For practical illustrations of what may result in the absence of the efficacious acknowledgment of the principle of government herein involved, attention might be directed to the French Revolution, or to accounts of the recent upheaval in Russia, or to informal trials in China. But sufficient has been said to indicate the reason why the Constitutions of the various states of the Union contained articles similar to those found in our federal Constitution. In the Constitution of California, adopted in 1849, section 8 of article 1 was almost a repetition of the quoted article of the federal Constitution. It reads: "No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime (except in cases of impeachment, and in cases of militia when in actual service, and the land and naval forces in time of war, or which this State may keep with the consent of Congress in time of peace, and in cases of petit larceny under the regulation of the legislature), unless on presentment or indictment of a grand jury; and in any trial in any court whatever the party accused shall be allowed to appear and defend in person and with counsel, as in civil actions. No person shall be subject to be twice put in jeopardy for the same offence; nor shall he be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." In the constitutional convention of 1878-79, as a pure matter of "economy in the administration of government" (Proceedings of Constitutional Convention, p. 1177), the section was made to read as we have set it forth herein, but not without opposition, 22 of the delegates being in favor of retaining the old section. In other words, the majority believed that it would be more economical to have a hearing before a magistrate and a commitment by him, and that the liberty of the citizens would be substantially protected by a preliminary trial before a member of the judicial system, where impartiality reigns.

[1, 2] We are thus brought to a rule of construction. It is obvious from the history of the provision which we have hastily sketched that our people and our foremost students of government have considered the guaranty against being charged with an infamous crime without the indictment by a grand jury, of the very first importance, a system which we may pause to remark has continued to work successfully in federal courts. The esteem in which it has been held is well expressed in Jones v. Robbins, 8 Gray (Mass.) 329, as follows: "The right of individual citizens to be secure from an open and public accusation of crime, and from the trouble, expense and anxiety of a public trial, before a probable cause is established by the presentment and indictment of a grand jury, in case of high offences, is justly regarded as one of the securities to the innocent against hasty, malicious and oppressive public prosecutions, and as one of the ancient immunities and privileges of English liberty." As an exception to the general rule the people of California have provided for the alternative of a hearing before and the commitment by a fair, impartial, and independent magistrate. An exception to the general and prevailing rule is to be strictly construed and not extended beyond its letter. In other words, the presumption must be indulged that there was no intention to affect an existing system or policy any further than the plain terms of the exception requires. Lewis' Sutherland on Statutory Construction § 487. In the present instance we think the presumption simply confirms the plain meaning of the words employed. In simple language the constitutional provision requires a hearing before and a commitment by a magistrate in lieu of an indictment by a grand jury. It is immaterial what the district attorney thinks the evidence shows—the important thing is, What does the magistrate judge to be disclosed by that evidence? The district attorney is elected to prosecute and not to judge.

[3] Of course, it stands to reason (and we doubt if anyone would deny it) that the Legislature has not the power to confer upon the district attorney as an executive officer judicial authority, in the sense in which we now employ that term, in the face of the provisions of article 6, § 1, of the Constitution, vesting the judicial power of the state "in the senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, in a supreme court, district courts of appeal, superior courts, such municipal courts as may be established * * * and such inferior courts as the legislature may establish * * *," and article 3 thereof distributing and dividing the powers of government into the three separate departments. Such was the holding in the case of In re Sims, 54 Kan. 1, 37 P. 135, 25 L. R. A. 110, 45 Am. St. Rep. 261, where similar constitutional restrictions prevented the legislative action from becoming effective.

There is another approach to our present problem which has an important bearing in any effort to solve the question. After the section of the Constitution was adopted there existed grave doubts as to whether the exception provided for therein constituted due process of law. Justice Matthews, the author of the prevailing opinion in Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 517, 4 S. Ct. 111, 122, 292, 28 L. Ed. 232, characterized the question as "one of grave and serious import, affecting both private and public rights and interests of great magnitude." By the opinion therein, from which Justice Harlan dissented in an exhaustive statement of his reasons, it was determined that the substitution of a hearing before and a commitment by a magistrate in the place of an indictment did not do violence to the "due process of law" clause contained in the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution. It is interesting to speculate upon the answer which would have been given by the court had the constitutional provision contained the subject matter of the present legislative enactment. Certain it is that that authority cannot possibly be construed to substantiate the argument of respondent here. In fact, it is directly opposed. It is there said: "Tried by these principles, we are unable to say that the substitution for a presentment or indictment by a grand jury of the proceeding by information after examination and commitment by a magistrate, certifying to the probable guilt of the defendant, with the right on his part to the aid of counsel, and to the cross-examination of the witnesses produced for the prosecution is not due process of law. It is, as we have seen, an ancient proceeding at common law, which might include every case of an offense of less grade than a felony, except misprision of treason; and in every circumstance of its administration, as authorized by the [sic] statute of California, it carefully considers and guards the substantial interest of the prisoner." (Italics ours.) How different from the present situation, where, as in the case at bar, the information, it is said, may not only lack but be directly in conflict with the magistrate's certificate of probable guilt; and where the accused may, in practice, be actually deprived of the aid of counsel in examining the witnesses produced by the prosecution because he may be denied knowledge before hand of what the district attorney, secretly perhaps, intends to include in the information. We do not believe that the American people have become, or that we should be, so insensible to the liberties of the person as to intrust the accusation and confinement of men to the judgment of a public prosecutor, who, no matter how honest he may be, is naturally biased and prejudiced against the accused from the time he determines to prosecute. Rather do we believe we should adhere to the spirit of that enunciation of Blackstone (4 Blackstone Comm. 349-50) as follows: "The founders of the English law have, with excellent forecast, contrived that no man shall be called to answer the King for any capital crime, unless upon the preparatory accusation of twelve or more of his fellow-subjects, the grand jury; and that the truth of every accusation, whether preferred in the shape of an indictment, information or appeal, should afterwards be confirmed by the unanimous suffrage of twelve of his equals and neighbors, indifferently chosen and superior to all suspicion. So that the liberties of England cannot but subsist so long as the palladium remains sacred and inviolate, not only from all open attacks (which none will be so hardy as to make), but also from all secret machinations which may sap and undermine it; by introducing new and arbitrary methods of trial, by justices of the peace, commissioners of the revenue, and courts of conscience. (Italics ours.) And however convenient these may appear at first (as doubtless all arbitrary powers, well executed, are the most convenient), yet let it be again remembered that delays and little inconveniences in the forms of justice, are the price that all free nations must pay for their liberty in more substantial matters; that these inroads upon this sacred bulwark of the nation are fundamentally opposite to the spirit of our Constitution; and that, though begun in trifles, the precedent may gradually increase and spread, to the utter disuse of juries in questions of the most momentous concern."

We have not overlooked the fact that respondent relies upon the authority of People v. Sanders (Cal. App.) 283 P. 136, with assurance that it disposes of every contention advanced by the appellant herein. The majority opinion in that case proceeds upon the assumption that the change in the law is one regulating procedure and overlooks the very substantial and fundamental right of the individual not to be publicly charged and tried for an heinous offense except upon establishment of probable cause. Let us consider the concrete case with which we now deal. Two magistrates decided that there was reason to believe the appellant was guilty of manslaughter and not of murder. Perhaps the jury would not have determined he was guilty of manslaughter had he not been tried for murder. Can any one be so bold as to assert that the defendant was not irreparably and immeasurably damaged by being publicly accused and tried for murder? If so, let him without just cause be likewise charged and he will realize the impairment of a substantial right. Nor have we overlooked the dissenting opinion of Justice Houser in that case, with whose views we are in thorough accord. Were it not for the length of this opinion we would be inclined to set it forth in full herein. The illustration which he instances of a man being bound over for burglary and informed against for rape is sound and may conceivably be extended to any other infamous crime. His comment upon the authority of People v. Nogiri, 142 Cal. 596, 76 P. 490, constitutes a proper construction of the language of that case and demonstrates the impossibility of conferring upon the district attorney the "judicial, discretionary and appellate power" to ignore the commitment of the magistrate in the face of the constitutional provision requiring a hearing and a commitment by that judicial officer. Supporting our views and those of the dissenting opinion, we refer to an excellent comment upon the case of People v. Sanders, supra, in 18 California Law Review, 324, wherein, in addition to many authorities cited, it is pointed out that there is a very great difference between allowing the prosecutor the right to charge the offense in language different from that of the magistrate and charging an offense different from the one named in the commitment.

[4] It cannot be said that the error here found to exist does not require a reversal of the judgment. We cannot say that the jury was not largely induced, by the charge of murder and the introduction of evidence relevant thereto and the intimations necessarily attendant thereupon, to return their verdict, and a stigma was necessarily cast upon appellant, in the eyes of his fellow citizens, by the greater charge. The case in this particular is somewhat similar to that of People v. Dugat, 77 Cal. App. 263, 246 P. 344.

It is argued by appellant that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict of the jury, but in this we cannot agree. While the evidence is capable of the construction that he was not guilty, it is also susceptible of the construction that he was.

Complaint is also made of the failure of the court to give certain instructions. We have examined them, together with those given, and have concluded that no error was therein committed.

[5] The requested instruction, which was not given and which is made the basis of appellant's most insistent argument, contains this paragraph: "You are instructed that one who has ordered an intruder to leave his home has the right to draw a weapon and hold it in readiness as he goes toward the intruder and orders him to depart." There is no evidence to which this portion of the instruction could be made to apply. According to appellant's own testimony, he did not hold the gun in readiness, but actually fired it for the purpose of frightening the deceased. It is a familiar rule that, when a requested instruction contains a part which should not be given, it is not error to refuse the whole. People v. Golsh, 63 Cal. App. 609, 219 P. 456.

Judgment reversed, with directions to the trial court, upon request therefor, to permit amendment of the information to make it accord with the commitment and thereupon to retry the cause.

VALE et al. v. CITY OF SAN BERNARDINO et al.
Civ. 212.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Oct. 20, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨105.

Order of nonsuit, entered on minutes of court, is treated on appeal as judgment of nonsuit (Code Civ. Proc. § 581).

2. Municipal corporations ⇨721(2).

Evidence held insufficient to show diversion from park purposes by construction of log cabin representing pioneer home, used by pioneers' societies.

Evidence showed that log cabin in question was also used by Grand Army of the Republic, Women's Relief Corps, and Spanish American War Veterans. It was built by societies having for their object, besides benevolent and social purposes, the collection of historical data, formation of libraries, and provision for memorial hall for pioneers. Their membership was limited to early settlers and their descendants; they had no password; their meetings were open to public; and cabin would be opened at any time on request of visitors.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨721(2).

Although public park must not be diverted to other purposes, use thereof for buildings or purposes incidental to use as park will be upheld.

4. Municipal corporations ⇨721(2).

That log cabin in park, representing pioneer home, was open to public, did not show diversion from park purposes, or interference with free public use.

5. Municipal corporations ⇨721(2).

That pioneers' societies, permitted to use log cabin in public park, denied similar permission to rival society, did not alone show unlawful use of park.

6. Municipal corporations ⇨721(2).

Use of land for park purposes was not affected merely because pioneers' societies managed their meetings in log cabin in park.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

Action by M. W. Vale and others against the City of San Bernardino and others. From an order of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

John L. Campbell, of San Bernardino, and R. E. Bledsoe, for appellants.

BARNARD, J.

This is an action in equity to compel the defendants to remove from a public park in the city of San Bernardino, commonly known as Pioneer Park, a log cabin with additions thereto. The material parts of the deed by which the land in question was acquired by the city read as follows:

This Indenture, made the thirtieth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two, between Thaddeus Amat, Bishop of Monterey and Los Angeles, an ecclesiastical corporation sole of the religious persuasion known as the Catholic, party of the first part, and the 'Inhabitants of the Town of San Bernardino' the parties of the second part:

"Witneseth:

"That the said party of the first part, for and in consideration of one dollar to him in hand paid, by the said parties of the second part, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and the further consideration hereafter specified, has remised, released and by these presents doth remise, release and forever quit claim unto the said parties of the second part, and to their successors, all that certain lot, piece or parcel of land situate, lying and being in the Town of San Bernardino, County San Bernardino, State of California, and bounded and particularly described as follows, to-wit:" (Here follows description of property, containing 5.12 acres.) "Together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereunto belonging or in anywise appertaining, and the reversion and reversions, remainder and remainders, rents, issues and profits thereof; and also all the estate, right, title, interest, property, possession, claim and demand whatsoever, as well in law as in equity, of the said party of the first part, of in or to the said premises, and every part and parcel thereof, with the appurtenances. To have and to hold, all and singular the said premises, together with the appurtenances unto the said parties of the second part and to their successors forever.

"And for a further consideration binding upon the parties of the second part, and this conveyance is made upon the express consideration, that the premises hereby conveyed, shall be and remain forever a public plaza or square for the use and enjoyment of the parties of the second part and their successors—this conveyance revokable should other disposition be made of said premises."

[1] The complaint alleges that on or about July 1, 1911, and, since, the defendant city, by and through its mayor and common council, in violation of the trust created by the said deed, has permitted private buildings (being the log cabins referred to) to be erected on the premises for private use and not for the use and benefit of all of the inhabitants of the city, and has permitted the San Bernardino Society of California Pioneers and the Golden State Club to occupy the same to the entire exclusion of all other societies and all other persons. Also, that the mayor and common council have neglected and refused to comply with a request that said buildings be removed. The plaintiffs ask for an order compelling the specific execution of said trust, by directing the removal of the buildings in question. After an answer was filed a trial was had and at the conclusion of plaintiffs' evidence a motion for nonsuit was made, which was later granted by the court. The order of nonsuit was entered upon the minutes of the court, and is herein treated as a judgment of nonsuit. Code Civ. Proc. § 581; Brown v. Sterling Furniture Co., 175 Cal. 563, 166 P. 322. This appeal is from that order.

The respondents contend the order should be affirmed for a number of reasons, including the following: That the notice requesting a reporter's transcript was not filed within the time required by law; that the appellants have failed to set forth in their brief sufficient of the record to justify a reversal; that the plaintiffs have no legal right to maintain such an action; that an adequate remedy exists at law; that by the deed referred to the city became vested with title to the property in fee simple, without reservations or conditions; and, finally, that there is no evidence in the record to show that the buildings or any use made of them violate any park purposes.

[2] We think there is no merit in the first point, and, while one or more of the others could not be lightly dismissed, were it necessary to consider them, our views upon the last point raised, which is the meat of this controversy, makes the consideration of the other grounds named unnecessary. Assuming that the action may otherwise be maintained, and that the property in question was restricted by the above deed to use for park purposes only, we think the evidence, even when viewed in the light most favorable to appellants, shows no diversion from or violation of such use.

The evidence, including stipulations which is relied on by appellants as showing a use of the property for other than park purposes, is thus summarized in their brief: "The salient facts thus established, are that with permission of defendant, City of Bernardino, its Mayor and Common Council, defendants, San Bernardino Society of California Pioneers, and the Golden State Club, erected and placed in Pioneer Park, the premises described in plaintiffs' complaint, the log cabin, with its additions, and that said societies at the commencement of this action were occupying the same; that said defendants are associations which embrace members only possessing certain qualifications, set forth in their respective constitutions, and by-laws; that said defendants have absolute control of the management and conducting of their respective meetings which are held in the cabin in said park; that the members of said Golden State Club pay dues or some sum as membership fees; that plaintiffs requested said City and Common Council to remove said cabins, but that they have wholly neglected and refused to comply with such request. As might have a bearing upon the issue involved, it will be noted—that it is further stipulated that the only buildings upon this ground, is said log cabins, and the Auditorium, the latter not involved in this case."

The only other such evidence which is called to our attention by appellants is a request signed by more than fifty citizen pioneers, including all of the plaintiffs, addressed to the San Bernardino Society of California Pioneers asking permission to use the log cabin in question for one night a week. In their reply, as shown by the record, said society denied permission to use the building "for the purpose of organizing a rival Pioneer Society," for the reason that "the old pioneers concluded, after discussing the matter, that the granting of such application would lead to dissension instead of harmony among the pioneers." This reply then proceeds to disclaim any intention of depriving any pioneers of the use of the cabin; expresses regret that the signers of the petition have seen fit to refrain from participating in the use thereof; urges the lack of any good reason to justify the organization of a rival or second pioneer society; and invites the petitioners to return and use the premises, not only one evening a week, but every evening and every day.

It also appears from the record that, in addition to its use by the Pioneer Society and the Golden State Club, respondents herein, the log cabin in question is also used by the Grand Army of the Republic, the Women's Relief Corps, and the Spanish American War Veterans. It appears that the Pioneer Society and the Golden State Club are affiliated organizations, and that their objects, in addition to benevolent and social purposes, are to collect and preserve information and facts in connection with the early settlement and history of California, especially of San Bernardino county; to form libraries and cabinets; to provide for a memorial hall to perpetuate the memory of the early pioneers; and that their membership is limited to early settlers and their descendants. It further appears that they have no password; that their meetings are not secret, but are open to the public at all times; that any person may take part in such meetings even to the extent of making a speech; and that, even at times when the building is not open, it will be opened, upon request, for the pleasure of any one desiring to visit it.

[3] The rule is that, where land is dedicated as a public park, it must be so used, and not diverted to other and different purposes. Slavich v. Hamilton, 201 Cal. 299, 257 P. 60, 61. On the other hand, the use of such land for buildings or purposes which are incidental to its use as a public park will be upheld. Hall v. Fairchild-Gilmore-Wilton Co., 66 Cal. App. 615, 227 P. 649. In Slavich v. Hamilton, supra, the court said:

"It is a matter of public knowledge that the erection of hotels, restaurants, museums, art galleries, zoological and botanical gardens, conservatories, and the like in public parks is common. Spire v. City of Los Angeles, 150 Cal. 64, 66, 11 Ann. Cas. 465, 87 P. 1026. The court was not, at the time that case was before it, nor has it since been, 'pointed to any authority where it has been regarded as a diversion of the legitimate uses of the park to establish them, but, on the contrary, their establishment has been generally recognized as ancillary to the complete enjoyment by the public of the property set apart for their benefit.'"

In the case just cited it was sought to erect a veterans' memorial building upon land which had been given to the city of Oakland by private individuals for use as a public park, and which had been further dedicated to such use and purposes by the city. The proposed building was to "be used primarily as a meeting place and memorial hall for organizations whose membership is composed of soldiers, sailors, and marines who have served the United States of America honorably in any of its wars," it being contemplated that it would be used by the Grand Army of the Republic, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the American Legion, and other patriotic organizations. The court held that this intended use was not only a public use, but was one consistent with the park purposes to which the land had been dedicated, the court using this language: "The erection of monuments and memorials in public parks has long been recognized as a use consistent with park purposes. Brahan v. Meridian, 111 Miss. 30, 71 So. 170; Parsons v. Van Wyck, 56 App. Div. 329, 67 N. Y. S. 1054. While no case involving the question of the use of a public park as a site for a memorial building has come to our notice, we are of the view that the erection of the veterans' memorial hall, as here proposed, will not interfere with the enjoyment by the community in general of Adams Park, and will not be such a diversion of the property from its use for park purposes as to amount to an invasion of the settled principles of law relied on by the respondent."

[4] In the instant case, the log cabin in question has been used for many years; it is a replica of a typical pioneer home and in itself constitutes an exhibit commemorative of pioneer days, fully equal in historical, inspirational, and educational value to a good many exhibits in museums which are recognized as a legitimate part of a public park. It constitutes both a monument and a memorial, which have a fitting place in a public park. It is used by organizations which are contributing to the laudable purpose of promoting and stimulating patriotism, and which are of exactly the same style as those for which the building referred to in Slavich v. Hamilton was intended. It not only furnishes a meeting place for a number of such patriotic organizations, but the particular organizations whose use of the building is here objected to have the additional object and purpose of collecting and preserving historical information and facts in connection with the history of California, of forming libraries and cabinets, and perpetuating the memories of the early pioneers. Such collections, exhibits, libraries, and memorials are not uncommon in public parks and often constitute the most attractive feature therein to a large part of the public. It further appears from the evidence that the building, with all its facilities, even including such meetings and dances as are given by the organizations fostering and maintaining the same, are as much open to the public at all times as to any members of these organizations, and that, even at such times as the building may be closed, it will be opened for any one, upon request. To our minds this shows neither a diversion of the property from park purposes, nor such an exclusive use thereof as could be held to interfere with the full and free public use which is contemplated by law. Slavich v. Hamilton, supra; Spire v. City of Los Angeles, 150 Cal. 64, 87 P. 1026, 11 Ann. Cas. 465; Harter v. San Jose, 141 Cal. 659, 75 P. 344.

[5] All of the appellants were formerly members of the organizations here complained of, and, as such, participated in the alleged improper use of the park. The filing of this action followed the refusal of these organizations to permit the appellants and others to assume the same occupation and control of the premises at certain stated times. Whether other organizations should also be allowed to hold meetings in the building in dispute is another question, depending upon many things, and not involved here. We think, however, that the mere fact that such permission is denied to another body by one already allowed to meet in the building is not, in itself, sufficient to establish that the latter organization is not lawfully using the premises.

[6] Nor do we think the use of the premises for park purposes is affected, because, as appears, the respondent associations have control of the management and conduct of their meetings. It would hardly be held that a lawful use of a veterans' memorial building in a city park for meetings of the American Legion became an unlawful use if that body exercised control over its own meetings. Restaurants, libraries, museums, and various other concessions, even including hotels, have been held proper in public parks, when not inconsistent with general park purposes, but it seems apparent that all such accessories have to be controlled by some one and carefully managed. Parks are often used for public meetings, but the fact that such meetings are and must be promoted, managed, and conducted by some authority, usually some organization, does not even indicate that such use of a park is not a public one. To permit to such organizations, as may lawfully be allowed to meet in a building standing upon park property, the control and management of meetings that are open to the public, certainly does not change the use of the property from a public to a private one.

The evidence having failed to show any use of the property in question inconsistent with or contrary to its use as a public plaza or park, under the established rules of law, the motion for a nonsuit was properly granted.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

CRAIG, J.

Upon an information charging the crime of receiving stolen property, a felony, appellant was tried before a jury and found guilty as charged, after which conviction the court below sentenced her to serve a term of three months in the county jail. A motion for a new trial having been denied, she appealed, assigning as grounds for reversal the bar of the statute of limitations and insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the judgment.

[1, 2] The information was filed about two years after receipt of the property in question by the appellant. Reliance is placed upon the interpretation of sections 17 and 801 of the Penal Code, as announced in People v. Gray, 137 Cal. 267, 70 P. 20. It was there held that an offense punished as a misdemeanor must for all purposes be deemed as such, and that an indictment therefor, filed more than one year after the commission of the offense, was barred by the statute of limitations. In Doble v. Superior Court, 197 Cal. 556, 241 P. 852, 853, the Supreme Court in denying a petition for a writ of prohibition, prior to trial, limited the application of section 17 of the Penal Code to "purposes after a judgment imposing a punishment other than imprisonment in the state prison." Particular attention was called to the fact that while section 801 requires the filing of a misdemeanor charge within one year after its commission, said section contemplates only misdemeanors as distinguished from offenses for which the court may exercise judicial discretion in determining the nature of the penalty. While it is there recognized that People v. Gray arose after trial and judgment, yet the plain import of the decision is that in so far as it conflicts with this interpretation it is overruled, and that to such extent it was not founded upon any authority to the contrary of this later view. It is said of People v. Gray, supra: "The case is therefore only authority for the proposition that, where a defendant is charged with a felony but has only committed a misdemeanor, the statute of limitations for misdemeanors and not that for felonies will govern. However, that case is not authority under the provision of section 17 here involved, for that provision only has application to the judgment where the punishment may be either for a felony or a misdemeanor. It will be noted that in quoting section 17 the opinion in People v. Gray, supra, ignores the language, 'after a judgment imposing a punishment other than imprisonment in the state prison,'—following the phrase 'shall be deemed a misdemeanor for all purposes. * * * A fair construction of section 17, in order to give effect to every part thereof, requires us to hold, and we do so hold, that in prosecutions within the contemplation of that section the charge stands as a felony for every purpose up to judgment, and if the judgment be felonious, in that event, it is a felony after as well as before judgment; but if the judgment is for a misdemeanor it is deemed a misdemeanor for all purposes thereafter—the judgment not to have a retroactive effect so far as the statute of limitations is concerned." So, in the instant case, the jury having found the appellant guilty of a felony, as charged, the statute of limitations can be said to have no application, but for all purposes after judgment the offense may be deemed a misdemeanor.

Appellant urges that a distinction exists between the instant case and Doble v. Superior Court, supra, in that the issue was there raised on a petition for writ of prohibition to prevent a trial of the case, whereas here the trial was had and judgment pronounced. This difference in fact leaves the two prosecutions identical in principle. The decision in the Doble Case was entirely predicated upon the assumption that the defendant might upon trial be found guilty of the felony involved in the charge. In this action the defendant actually was found guilty of an offense of that grade; hence the law announced in that case is directly in point and controlling here.

[3] The evidence tended to show that the prosecuting witness identified a radio in ap-pellant's apartment which had previously been stolen from his residence. Appellant claimed to have taken it in payment of the indebtedness of a third person whom she did not produce at the trial and whom officers were unable to locate; she also stated that she had documentary evidence of its legal transfer to her, which she did not exhibit when demanded. A friend of appellant forcibly extorted from the prosecuting witness a paper upon which the latter had noted the serial number of the instrument, and on the following day appellant placed it in a warehouse, where it was subsequently discovered. An extended detail of the evidence is unnecessary. The jury were instructed upon the law in such cases, and we cannot say that legally they were not warranted in concluding that appellant knew that the property had been stolen. People v. Jacobs, 73 Cal. App. 334, 238 P. 770.

[4, 5] The only other point advanced is that the evidence affirmatively showed the property to have been purchased by the complaining witness upon instalments, and that he was not the owner as alleged in the information. A variance between allegation and proof of ownership in such a case is not prejudicial to the rights of the defendant if the property stolen can otherwise be sufficiently identified. Proof upon this issue is material only for the purposes of identification. Pen. Code, § 960; People v. Price, 143 Cal. 351, 77 P. 73.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

CRAIG, J.

The defendant was convicted of homicide in the first degree, and appealed from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for new trial.

In the early morning of November 9, 1929, while driving southerly toward the city of Santa Monica, in Los Angeles county, he was met at a point about three miles from said city by four men who were driving northerly toward the city of Ventura. He informed them that he had been robbed, and then shot, by bandits. In the front seat of his automobile, on the right side, lay a young woman, who proved to be his wife, whom he had married six months previously thereto. She also had been wounded, and was then apparently lifeless. He testified that during the preceding evening he drove around the streets of Los Angeles, arriving home at about midnight, when he was joined by his wife, and that they started for a ride; that they stopped at a café on Wilshire boulevard, then proceeded to Santa Monica, thence toward Ventura for some distance, and finally turned back "because it was getting late." The record is devoid of direct evidence as to subsequent occurrences except for his testimony upon the trial and his statements to numerous witnesses who testified on behalf of the people. The defendant swore that during their return his wife was driving the automobile, and that at a point about eight miles northerly from Santa Monica they were accosted by two men in a Chrysler car which had been following them; that the taller of these men leaped from the Chrysler, approached the left side of defendant's machine, commanded, "stick them up," and that the companion of this bandit then joined them, whereupon the taller one moved to the right side of defendant's car, and took his money, which amounted to about $26; that the highwaymen were about to depart, when Mrs. Bolton remarked to one of them, "Isn't your name Woods?" whereupon the shorter man exclaimed, "Bump them off," following which the other fired four shots from defendant's side of the car, two of which struck Mrs. Bolton in the head, and a third struck the defendant in the left breast. He testified that the men fled, and that, finding his wife unconscious, he removed her to the right side of the seat and drove toward Santa Monica until he met the parties already mentioned. The defendant and one of these four men, named Day, entered the rear seat of the machine, another by the name of Cannon took the wheel, and drove to Santa Monica, where they were joined by George Figuerredo, a police officer, and continued to a hospital. The defendant was there given preliminary treatment, a 25-caliber bullet was removed from beneath the surface of his left arm near the elbow, and he was then transferred to the general hospital, and was later charged with the crime of murder.

[1] It is strenuously insisted by appellant that the evidence adduced before the jury was insufficient to warrant their verdict or to support the judgment. Much of the evidence of witnesses called by the prosecution is criticized as improbable, unworthy of belief, or otherwise of questionable weight, but with these questions the trial court and jury were vested with conclusive jurisdiction except where their implied findings can be said to be unsupported by substantial evidence, regardless of evidence contrary to such findings. People v. Dant, 68 Cal. App. 588, 229 P. 983.

[2] In 1926, appellant was engaged by one Ruby W. Abbott as instructor and manager of certain dance halls. He became indebted to her in the amount of $4,000. She also loaned him other amounts aggregating $3,000, and assumed another $1,000 burden for which she had become liable as surety upon a loan to Bolton. He and his wife were each insured in the sum of $5,000 in favor of the other by policies providing for $10,000 indemnity in the event of accidental death. There is slight if any question that he was in deep financial straits at the time of the crime, notwithstanding the fact that he stated to witnesses that he had plenty of money in the bank, and that he was earning $100 per week. It further appears by the testimony of numerous witnesses that he had quarreled with his wife at least a year before they were married. In May, 1928, appellant used profane, violent, and obscene language toward her, attacked her with physical force. During that time he stated to a friend that if he ever married her he would kill her, and that he would "get rid of her quick." Eight days before his wife was slain he telephoned to Ruby Abbott that he soon expected to have $10,000, and that he would repay her, stating, "I am certain of it," "I will have it shortly." Another witness swore that appellant told him that he soon expected $10,000, that his wife might be "run over by a street car or killed somehow"; and that he stated to his wife in the presence of others: "One of these days I will bump you off," "I will shoot your block off." This evidence tended to prove that, even before marriage, defendant planned to do away with the deceased.

It is conceded that the tragedy must have occurred on the Roosevelt highway which parallels the Pacific Coast between the cities of Santa Monica and Ventura, at a point between about one and a half miles and three miles northwesterly from its intersection with Topango Canyon road. According to the defendant's testimony, he and the deceased had driven toward Ventura, beyond said intersection, and, having turned about, were driving toward Santa Monica, southeasterly from the Topango Canyon road, when attacked by the alleged highwaymen. The shorter of the bandits menaced them with a pistol from the left side of their car, while the taller one at first ordered them from the machine, but later entered it, reached in Bolton's inside pocket, took his billfold from which he extracted money, then threw the pocket book back to him. Appellant testified that, after the second shot was fired, "I threw myself against my wife in this manner and was backing out of the car and he fired one shot at me which missed and he fired another shot which strikes me in my left side but he was practically out of the car when he fired that shot—on the ground." He further stated to the jury that, previous to that time, "the window was down and the tall fellow was practically inside of the car directly in front of me * * * he fired one shot and my wife threw her hands to her face * * * and screamed, and leaning kind of forward * * * he shot again." Each of the wounds was caused by a 25-caliber bullet from an American or foreign make automatic pistol. Each of them had taken a somewhat downward course toward the left from the point of entry. One 25-caliber bullet which entered one inch in front of the right ear of the deceased was extracted from the lower portion of the left hemisphere of her brain; another had entered the cartilage of the right ear, and made its exit about one-half inch below the lobule of the left ear. One of the wounds bore a slight ring or contusion about it, tending to indicate that the weapon had been held at a distance of about six inches from the victim, but the other bore no evidence upon which to base an opinion as to the distance from which the shot had been fired. The middle finger of the right hand had been penetrated and fractured by a bullet which left pronounced black powder marks, from which it was estimated that the gun had been held "very close," possibly two inches or less from the hand. Accepting as we must the testimony of many witnesses as apparently believed by the jury to be true, the defendant stated that the crime was committed near certain road construction work, about one and one-half miles above the intersection heretofore mentioned. A night watchman, who had been stationed at this point all night of November 8, swore that he heard no shots, whereas a resident living three miles northerly testified that he heard two shots in quick succession at about 3:20 a. m., or twenty minutes before Day and his companions met the defendant. Appellant stated before the trial that, while driving up, and during his return, the Chrysler car passed him several times before he was halted. To others he stated that he had driven to Ventura by another route, and had there spent the night. From the testimony of at least five witnesses it appears that appellant late in July, 1929, carried a 25-caliber automatic upon his person, in September he had one in a drawer at his apartment, and in November a similar weapon was in his desk. When questioned by an officer Bolton remarked: "You can go up and look in my apartment * * * you can't find any gun there. * * * I never owned a gun in my life."

[3-5] There were so many discrepancies and diametrical contradictions between the defendant's statements to acquaintances and officers and his testimony before the jury, that they may well have rejected them all as unworthy of belief, including that of robbery, and even the existence of the bandits. Other equally irreconcilable statements and testimony in appellant's description of the highwaymen, whether one or both were armed, his attempt, if any, to resist them, and his unqualified denial that he had made any statements, need not be collated to determine that the jury doubtless may have deemed a satisfactory explanation of the crucial events wholly absent. The weight to be given to the defendant's evidence is a question for the jury to determine, and the fact that he was found guilty is sufficient indication here that they were not impressed with its truth. People v. Egan, 77 Cal. App. 279, 246 P. 337. Were it reconcilable and probable, the fact that, if accepted, it might entitle him to an acquittal, did not require the jury to believe it, if the circumstances were such as reasonably to justify an inference of guilt. People v. Sotelo, 102 Cal. App. —, 283 P. 388; People v. Oliver, 102 Cal. App. 29, 282 P. 813. The decision of the jury is final and conclusive, if circumstantial evidence, which bears against the defendant, without regard to evidence to the contrary, is substantial. It then ceases to be a question of law, and becomes one of fact. People v. Peete, 54 Cal. App. 333, 202 P. 51. The evidence in this case strongly tended to support the inference of guilt in the absence of a belief in the defendant's recital of the facts which the jury were at liberty to disregard.

[6] During the testimony of the surgeon who removed the bullet from the defendant's arm; he was examined on behalf of the people as to the position of the arm when wounded, and the course of the bullet from its entry. It was not attempted to show by the physician as an expert relative positions of the deceased and her assassin, nor the distance or direction from which the shots were fired. The admission of this evidence is assigned as error, but, if this be conceded, it does not appear prejudicial to a degree requiring a reversal. The jury were thereafter instructed to disregard the evidence of the doctor in this respect, and it was stricken out. We must assume that they followed this instruction.

Error is also assigned in the admission of testimony of the same witness from experience in extracting other bullets, inspection of the bullet in question, and an X-ray examination, that it did not strike a bone in the defendant's side. It is insisted that the doctor was not qualified to so testify, and that his testimony, connected with other opinions thereafter stricken out, was prejudicially erroneous. This objection is founded upon authority holding that, upon a plea of self-defense, in seeking the truth as between a dying declaration and the testimony of a defendant as to the position from which a shot was fired, it was not possible to say from the evidence of inexperienced autopsy surgeons who differed as to the results of a post mortem examination that the bullet could not have been deflected. It is sufficient to say that, not only was the inquiry complained of in no way analogous, but that this testimony also was stricken out, with forceful admonitions to the jury that it be disregarded. And, in any event, it was held in the cited case that the evidence there under discussion was harmless. People v. Yokum, 118 Cal. 437, 50 P. 686.

[7, 8] Strenuous argument, likewise apparently under misapprehension, is directed to asserted error in receiving over objections the evidence regarding appellant's previous possession of a 25-caliber automatic pistol. It is conceded that the prosecution may show preparation for crime, but it is contended that the evidence in controversy did not connect the defendant or his weapon with the crime, and that it was too remote and immaterial. Bolton's alleged statement that he had never possessed any revolver in his life was refuted by many witnesses, leaving the jury to determine for themselves the truth or falsity of his denials. It developed that from a period antedating the crime about a year down to the month in which the homicide was committed he did possess a black 25-caliber automatic, that the weapon with which he was shot, and with which Mrs. Bolton was assassinated was of like caliber and make. This evidence was therefore material and proper, and the question of its remoteness would go rather to its weight than to its competency. People v. Mount, 93 Cal. App. 81, 269 P. 177. Upon these matters the jury were fully instructed as to their duties.

[9, 10] Acquaintances of the defendant testified to violent language and physical abuse by him toward the deceased in 1928, and described facial disfigurements of the latter in 1929 which tended to show that she had then been beaten. This evidence is criticized as being in such detail as to inflame the minds of the jury. It is also claimed that the first altercation mentioned was remote. However, it was connected by other acts of a similar nature, before mentioned, all tending to prove a criminal plan, existing in the mind of the defendant from the beginning. That the remoteness of testimony as to altercations between the defendant and the deceased does not render it inadmissible, but affects its weight, is too well settled in this state to require discussion. People v. Colvin, 118 Cal. 349, 50 P. 539; People v. Palassou, 14 Cal. App. 123, 111 P. 109; People v. Wilson, 23 Cal. App. 513, 138 P. 971; People v. Holloway, 28 Cal. App. 214, 151 P. 975. That evidence of previous disagreements or encounters may not be introduced in detail to a degree which distracts the jury's attention from the offense in issue is an established rule, but it has not been so narrowed as to require mere conclusions. Appellant seeks in the instant case to predicate the assertion of error upon authorities from other jurisdictions which themselves suggest this distinction. People v. Fisher, 295 Ill. 250, 129 N. E. 196; Miller v. State, 158 Ga. 697, 124 S. E. 195; Sanders v. State, 19 Ala. App. 367, 97 So. 294; Keifer v. State, 199 Ind. 10, 154 N. E. 870; State v. Nelson, 148 Minn. 285, 181 N. W. 850, 854. In those cases it was held that, while the extent of the showing is in a measure discretionary, it is not proper to go into the details to such an extent as to confuse the issue and to prejudice the defendant by trying the merits of the controversy. In State v. Nelson, supra, it was observed that "all the facts that could have been told upon a charge of assault were narrated and the merits litigated." On the other hand, while not permitted to minutely examine into prior altercations for the purpose of determining which of the parties was at fault, a general statement of the facts has repeatedly been sanctioned in this state. A narration similar to that here in question was approved in People v. Palassou, supra, wherein it was held not a case where the court allowed proof of a separate and distinct crime disconnected from the offense charged. As there stated: "To indicate a state of mind of the defendant at the time of the killing the prosecution is always entitled to show any previous difficulties or troubles that have arisen between the parties, and this showing is not limited to physical encounters, but may consist solely in an affray of words; and this character of evidence is admissible, however much it may tend to disgrace and injure the defendant in the estimation of the jury. The objection upon such ground is not at all tenable." We conclude that the admission of this evidence was not erroneous.

Complaint is made of certain portions of the examination by counsel for the people of three witnesses, and of the defendant, which we do not deem it necessary to relate or discuss in detail. It is argued that the defendant's rights were injured thereby for the reason that it was incompetent and immaterial, tended to inflame the minds of the jury, and error is assigned because of a failure to strike out specified parts thereof. We have carefully perused the record in this respect, and it appears that in each instance such evidence was either justified by questions propounded by the defense or was exhaustively drawn out again by examination on behalf of the defendant; and the asserted objectionable evidence was also in each instance stricken out at the request of the defendant, and the jury were instructed to disregard it. We do not think all of the evidence so assailed was, under the circumstances, improper, nor was any error committed which was not cured by the action of the trial court at the instance of defendant's counsel.

[11] Neither can we accede to appellant's claim of reversible error in the admission of the testimony of an expert on interior ballistics. It is founded upon the assertion that the manner of action of an automatic pistol may not be shown without some evidence that a weapon of similar type was used in committing the crime. Since it appeared that both the deceased and the defendant were shot by a 25-caliber automatic pistol, this and other facts which we need not repeat rendered the evidence pertinent to a fair consideration of the whole case.

[12] The defendant having previously testified that he was under the influence of narcotics administered by hospital attendants at the time certain statements were testified by witnesses to have been made by him, and that he did not remember having made them, an interne was called in rebuttal who swore that the defendant talked coherently and appeared normal, mentally. At this point a juror remarked: "He testified he was full of hop all the time and didn't know what he was doing." When tendered permission to ask a direct question, the juror concluded: "Well, not more than that." It is insisted that this juror so indicated a predetermination of guilt as to render him capable of rendering an impartial verdict. We think the juror's expression disclosed, if anything, a belief in the truth of the defendant's testimony, or that he was merely comparing it with that of the witness. However that may be, it had no bearing upon the guilt or innocence of Bolton, and it is not stated in his briefs in what respect his cause was injured.

[13] Portions of instructions to the jury upon the credibility of witnesses, and the distrust with which the willfully untruthful testimony should be viewed, are segregated and criticized. The instructions should be considered as a whole. Besides, the portions of which complaint is made have been expressly approved. People v. Amaya, 134 Cal. 531, 66 P. 794; People v. Bollinger, 196 Cal. 191, 237 P. 25.

MOFFITT v. FORD MOTOR CO. et al. *
Civ. 7279.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.
Oct. 21, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 20, 1930.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court
Dec. 18, 1930.

1. Trial ⇨109.

Court may order nonsuit on opening statement when it seems clear that statement of proposed proof would not constitute cause of action (Code Civ. Proc. § 581).

2. Appeal and error ⇨113(4).

Order vacating nonsuit on opening statement was not appealable, even though case may have been of nature warranting trial by jury (Code Civ. Proc. § 581, and § 963, subd. 2).

3. Appeal and error ⇨110.

Order granting new trial after trial before court cannot be appealed (Code Civ. Proc. § 963).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

Action by Alice D. Moffitt against the Ford Motor Company and others. From an order vacating a previous order of nonsuit and directing trial of the issues, defendants appeal. On motion to dismiss appeal.

Motion granted.

Lucius K. Chase, Chase, Barnes & Chase, George L. Greer, Hardy, Elliott & Aberle, Joe Orider, Jr., Harry D. Parker, Dave F. Smith, Guy B. Graham, George H. Moore, and Gerald O'C. Egan, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Benjamin M. Stansbury and Mott, Vallee & Grant, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J.

A jury having been impaneled and sworn to try the issues in this case, counsel for the plaintiff made an opening statement, upon which statement the defendants interposed a motion for a nonsuit, which was granted. Thereafter the trial court vacated its order for nonsuit, and ordered a trial, on motion of the plaintiff. From this latter order the defendants appealed, and the plaintiff and respondent moves that the appeal be dismissed upon the ground that it is not authorized by existing statutes as amended.

[1] The first order was made under the provisions of section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure, authorizing a nonsuit when the plaintiff fails to prove a sufficient case for the jury. Such action has been approved when in the sound judicial discretion of the court it seemed clear that the statement of proposed proof would not constitute a cause of action. Bias v. Reed, 169 Cal. 33, 145 P. 516.

[2] Section 963, subd. 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure, permits of an appeal from an order "granting a new trial * * * in an action or proceeding tried by a jury where such trial by jury is a matter of right." Reduced to a concise construction of this provision as advanced by appellants, it overlooks an essential element incorporated in said section by the Legislature, and asserts the right of appeal from an order granting a new trial in any action or proceeding, whenever trial by jury is a matter of right. We do not accede to this view, firstly, for the reason that the conditions presented do not unquestionably fall within the designation of a "trial or proceeding" contemplated by the statutes, and, secondly, that it adds by construction a right which was eliminated by amendment in 1915. No evidence was offered, nor was any question officially considered by the jury or determined, under instructions of the court, or otherwise. The jury were simply called, examined as to their qualifications, sworn, and discharged. The judge alone considered and acted upon the opening statement of counsel, as a matter of law. Appellants refrain from conceding the inevitable conclusion, upon their suggested interpretation, that they had been afforded a trial by jury when the nonsuit was granted, and that such is not the fact must be admitted. John C. King Co. v. L. & N. R. Co., 131 Ky. 46, 114 S. W. 308; Vickers v. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co., 64 Ga. 307; Perlman v. Brooklyn, H. R. Co., 78 Misc. Rep. 168, 137 N. Y. S. 917. But they do insist that they may appeal from the order vacating the judgment of nonsuit and ordering a trial of the issues, because they were entitled to a jury as a matter of right, although such action as was taken was performed by the court. As we have indicated, this must be based upon the assumption that one may appeal from an order granting a new trial in all save expressly excepted cases, whether tried by a jury or by the court. That such was not the legislative intent is strongly indicated by decided cases. In re Estate of Baird, 195 Cal. 59, 231 P. 744, 748; Estate of Waters, 181 Cal. 584, 185 P. 951; McGoldrick v. Visalia Midway Oil Co., 58 Cal. App. 280, 208 P. 334, 335.

In In re Estate of Baird, supra, which was reversed after trial by a jury following two previous reversals, the Supreme Court directed that special findings and verdicts be set aside and that an order denying a petition for partial distribution be entered. The superior court having complied with the terms of that decision, the petitioner moved for a new trial which was granted, whereupon the respondents appealed. A motion to dismiss the appeal was denied upon the ground that "this is an appeal 'from an order granting a new trial * * * in an action or proceeding tried by a jury'—within the meaning of section 963, Code of Civil Procedure." All parties to the instant proceeding rely on the language of that authority, but it plainly held that, notwithstanding the entry of judgment under directions of the appellate tribunal under the circumstances related, it was clear "that this appeal rests as much upon the verdicts of the jury as does petitioner's motion for a new trial. The direction to the trial court in reversing the judgment to set aside the verdicts and findings and enter judgment for respondents, the compliance with said directions by the trial court, and the subsequent order granting a new trial, all have a direct connection with and are related to the verdicts of the jury, for, although the successive steps taken after the rendition of the verdicts represent in a sense independent proceedings, nevertheless each of them depends upon and rests on such verdicts." Section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure is clearly there construed as meaning "that there cannot be an appeal from an order granting a new trial unless there has been a trial by jury as distinguished from a trial by the court without a jury or in an equity proceeding." (Italics supplied.) Upon the authority of Estate of Waters, supra: "Section 963, Code of Civil Procedure, before it was amended in 1915, provided that an appeal might be taken from 'an order granting or refusing a new trial.' By the amendment of the year mentioned, the passage of the amendment long antedating the order now appealed from, this language was changed so as to permit an appeal only from 'an order granting a new trial in an action or proceeding tried by a jury where such trial by jury is a matter of right.' The Supreme Court, in reciting the history of this amendment and of others affecting appeals, has said: 'Separate appeals from orders granting new trials can be had only in those cases where a jury trial has been had as a matter of right.'" McGoldrick v. Visalia Midway Oil Co., supra. And again it was observed in Furlow Pressed Brick Co. v. Balboa L. & W. Co., 186 Cal. 754, 200 P. 625, 628, that said section "does not provide for an appeal from an order granting a new trial after trial by the court sitting without a jury," since "it was evidently thought by the Legislature to be more expeditious and economical to do away with the appeal from the order granting a new trial where there had been no trial jury and thus to allow the parties to try the case de novo than to permit such appeals."

[3] Hence we are impelled to hold that there was no jury trial, and that, in the absence of such a trial, the order was not appealable, even though the case may have been of such nature as to have warranted a trial by jury. This being so, the conclusion is inevitable that the order in controversy was not appealable, and it is immaterial whether or not the proceeding constituted a trial within the contemplation of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure. If it did not, of course the order would not be appealable, and, if it did, the trial was before the court, and an order granting a new trial under such circumstances cannot be appealed.

The motion to dismiss is granted.

STEVENS et al. v. SACRAMENTO SUBURBAN FRUIT LANDS CO.

LAYTON et al. v. SAME.

ISENBERGER v. SAME.

Civ. 4142-4144.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Oct. 22, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 21, 1930.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court
Dec. 18, 1930.

1. Fraud $\hookrightarrow$ 58(1).

Evidence held to support findings vendor misrepresented quality of land, and purchasers relied on misrepresentations.

2. Fraud $\hookrightarrow$ 58(1).

Evidence land was worth only $75 per acre, whereas, if representations had been true, it would have been worth $350 per acre, furnished basis for finding on damages.

3. Fraud ⚡59(2).

Damages suffered because of misrepresentations are to be ascertained by determining market value of land as it is and what it would have been had representations been true.

4. Fraud ⚡38.

In action for damages for fraud, question of laches does not enter into determination.

5. Fraud ⚡18.

Misrepresentations that land was fertile and that fruit trees would thrive thereon authorized action for damages for fraud (Code Civ. Proc. § 338).

6. Limitation of actions ⚡100(5).

In determining whether action for misrepresentations is barred, circumstances in each case must be examined to determine whether purchaser, as reasonable person, should have made prior discovery of fraud (Code Civ. Proc. § 338).

7. Limitation of actions ⚡100(5).

Where nonresident purchaser did not see land until December, 1924, action for damages for misrepresentations, commenced on August 15, 1927, held not barred by limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 338).

8. Limitation of actions ⚡197(2).

Evidence held to establish that purchaser's right to damages for misrepresentations regarding quality of land was barred by limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 338).

The evidence disclosed that the contract to purchase land was entered into on or about January 24, 1922; that the purchaser was advised that it would be necessary to blast the hardpan beneath the upper soil before setting out trees; that trees were planted without blasting in disregard of such advice, and that the trees lived only a few months; that purchaser had objective lesson as to hardpan on drilling well on premises; that he moved from premises in November, 1922, and made no inquiries regarding quality of land until year 1926; and that the action was begun on August 7, 1927.

9. Corporations ⚡672(6).

Instrument introduced in evidence showing foreign corporation had designated agent for service of process must be considered as though properly pleaded, where not objected to as not being within issues (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 1743).

10. Corporations ⚡646.

Amended statute requiring that instrument designating agent to be served with process for foreign corporation should give agent's residence held inapplicable, where statute under which designation was filed made no such requirement (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 1743).

11. Limitations of actions ⚡88.

That agent designated by foreign corporation for service of summons moves within state has no effect on operation of statute of limitations (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 1743; Code Civ. Proc. § 338).

12. Limitation of actions ⚡3(1).

Legislature alone can fix conditions under which limitation statute may operate (Code Civ. Proc. § 338).

13. Limitation of actions ⚡3(1).

Legislature alone can state circumstances necessary to suspend running of limitation statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 338).

14. Corporations ⚡646.

Agent designated by foreign corporation to be served with summons need not be employee or officer of company (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 1743).

15. Limitation of actions ⚡88.

That agent designated by foreign corporation on whom summons might be served left corporation did not sever designation so as to prevent running of limitations on cause of action for fraud asserted against corporation (Code Civ. Proc. § 338; Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 1743).

Appeals from Superior Court, Sacramento County; F. M. Jamison, Judge.

Separate actions by J. S. Stevens and another, by John R. Layton and another, and by N. E. Isenberger against the Sacramento Suburban Fruit Lands Company. From judgments for plaintiffs, defendant appeals.

Judgment of J. S. Stevens and another against defendant affirmed; judgment of N. E. Isenberger against the defendant affirmed; judgment of John R. Layton and another against defendant reversed.

Butler, Van Dyke, Desmond & Harris, of Sacramento, and Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, for appellant.

Ralph H. Lewis and George E. McCutchen, both of Sacramento, for respondents.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

Three separate actions are combined and presented for our consideration upon this appeal. The three actions are presented, in part, upon one transcript and argued in one set of briefs. The actions are prosecuted to obtain a judgment for damages based upon fraud and deceit, alleged to have been practised upon the respective plaintiffs by the defendant in the sale of distinct and separate parcels of land to the respective plaintiffs, one tract of land being sold to the plaintiffs Stevens, one tract of land to the plaintiffs Layton, and one tract of land to the plaintiff Isenberger. The land involved in the several actions is situate approximately nine or ten miles north of the city of Sacramento, in the district known as and called the "Rio Linda" district.

In 1912 the defendant company purchased a tract of 12,000 acres of land, subdivided the same, and entered upon the work of selling the land in tracts of 5 and 10 acres. The purchasers came mainly from the Northwestern States. The home office of the company was located in the city of Minneapolis. A local office was maintained in the city of Sacramento, under the charge of a general manager. The plaintiffs Stevens purchased a 10-acre tract; the plaintiffs Layton and the plaintiff Isenberger purchased 5-acre tracts. The complaints in the three actions are practically identical. The respective complaints, in setting forth a cause of action, alleged that the defendant, through its agents, represented to the purchasers that the land was rich and fertile, capable of producing all sorts of farm products; that the soil was entirely free from all conditions and things injurious or harmful to the growth of fruit trees. It was further alleged that the land was well adapted to the raising of fruits of all kinds; that fruit trees of all kinds would thrive and flourish thereon and produce fruit of best quality and in large and commercial quantities; that all kinds of fruits of finest quality and of commercial quantity were being grown and produced upon adjoining lands of the same quality and texture. The respective complaints further alleged that the land was represented to be of the reasonable market value of $350 per acre, whereas, in truth and in fact, it was worth only a sum showing a value of $15 per acre. The answers of the defendant deny the allegations of the complaints as to the fraudulent representations; admit its existence as a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Minnesota, and, as a further defense, plead the statute of limitations in the following words: "That this action and cause of action is barred by the provisions of section 338 and of subdivision IV thereof of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California."

While the defense of the statute of limitations is pleaded in the form above stated, the answers of the defendant contain no allegation of the corporation having complied with the statute relative to the filing with the secretary of state of the state of California a designation of an agent upon whom service of summons might be made, as provided by the act of the Legislature of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 371, and as amended by St. 1921, p. 638, and St. 1923, p. 1034, Deering's General Laws of California 1923, Act 1743), a necessary prerequisite in order to toll the statute of limitations.

As the argument upon this appeal revolves around the purchase made by the plaintiffs Stevens of lot 14 of Rio Linda, subdivision No. 5, this opinion will be devoted first to a discussion of the issues relating to that action.

The record discloses that, prior to the year 1923, the plaintiffs Stevens were residents of the town of Frederick in the state of Wisconsin, and owned 80 acres of land in Bayfield county, in said state, of the value of about $1,000, and a Ford automobile of the value of some $450; that neither one of the plaintiffs had ever visited the state of California, and that both of the plaintiffs were entirely unfamiliar with farming conditions, not only in the Rio Linda district, but also with farming conditions in the state of California; that while the plaintiffs were so residing in the state of Wisconsin the defendant furnished the plaintiffs with a booklet descriptive of the advantages of the Rio Linda district, and an agent of the company called upon the plaintiffs and made all of the representations contained in the complaint, and also other representations set out in the testimony, all of which were alleged to be false and fraudulent, and well known to be such; that, relying upon such false and fraudulent representations, the plaintiffs entered into a contract of purchase with the defendant, the purchase involving a transfer to the defendant of land then belonging to the plaintiffs in Bayfield, Wis., and also the transfer to the defendant of the Ford automobile herein referred to; the value of the land being represented to the plaintiffs at the sum of $350 per acre. The contract of purchase was entered into in December, 1922, and in September of the following year the plaintiffs came to California, and in November, 1923, bought a small tract about three-quarters of a mile from the land in controversy. It does not appear that the plaintiffs ever resided upon the land involved in this action.

The trial court, preceding the signing and filing of findings herein, expressed its views in a written opinion, from which we take the following: "The court is of the opinion that by reason of the thinness of the soil upon the tract of land, and the nature and thickness of the hardpan underlying it, that it is not adapted to, nor will it successfully produce fruit in any considerable quantity. The nature of the soil and the underlying hardpan, are of such a character that fruit trees will not mature and continue to bear, but, on the contrary, will wither away and die. The court is further of the opinion that plaintiffs were entirely ignorant of the nature and character of the soil and hardpan on said land, and for knowledge of the same relied entirely upon the representations of the agents of defendant, and that while these agents did set forth in booklets that the soil was underlaid with hardpan, yet by representations they led plaintiffs to believe that the hardpan would in no wise prove a detriment to the growing of fruit. Taking the evidence as a whole, it is apparent that representations were made to plaintiffs by defendant's agents that the land was well suited to the production of fruit in merchantable quantities, and that after the lapse of a few years the orchards planted and growing upon said land would net a considerable income. These representations were and are not true and must have been known to defendant's agents to be untrue when they were made." The court in its opinion further stated: "It appears to the court that these plaintiffs were wholly unfamiliar with the land, the nature of its soil, its productiveness, is adaptability to fruit growing, and that they relied entirely upon the representations of defendant's agents as to all these matters, and continued to do so until along in 1926, when the fruit trees planted a few years prior thereto began to wither and die." The court further stated in its opinion, relative to the provisions of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relied upon as a defense, as follows: "That this defense cannot avail defendant in this action. The untruthfulness of the representations made by defendant's agents were not discovered by plaintiffs until within the three-year period prior to the commencement of this action. Relying as they did upon the representations of defendant's agents, as aforesaid, they were not put upon notice of their falsity until the trees began to wither and die."

While the contract of purchase was entered into in the year 1922, the plaintiffs did not come to California until September, 1923, and, as stated, had not seen the land prior to the time of entering into the contract.

The record shows abundant testimony to the effect that the plaintiffs relied upon the statements of the defendant's agents as to the character and quality of the land, and, a review of the testimony satisfies us that the findings of the court in accordance with its opinion, and which we have quoted, are sufficiently supported. We may add that, in addition to stating that the land was suitable for the raising of all kinds of fruits, commercially, the agent represented to the plaintiffs that, while the price, at the time the negotiations were being had, was $350 per acre, on and after the 1st of January of the following year it would be advanced $50 an acre. A short excerpt from the testimony of one of the plaintiffs of what occurred at one of the interviews had between the agent of the defendant and the plaintiffs, while they were living in Wisconsin, is sufficient to illustrate the character of the representations: "He (referring to the agent) came to our home one evening about 7 o'clock and we were there until about 1 o'clock in the morning. He had photographs, an album of views, taken out there in the district. The views were very beautiful—fruit growing—and intimated they were taken here (referring to Rio Linda). I did not know before he wanted to sell us some of this land. He said there was nothing better in California. It would grow anything, and if Mr. Stevens and I would go there, we would be independent in a short time, say five years. We would have to keep poultry as an investment to make our payments. We realized we were not able to pay that amount, and we asked him about it. He said that our payments, we could make all those payments in 5 years, and we could let our poultry go. We could be independent in 5 years. He said the land certainly was adapted to grow anything; all kinds of fruit would grow there." The pamphlets referred to contained a great number of photographs of places many miles removed from Rio Linda, and do show what can be raised and accomplished in California where the character of the soil admits of a high degree of cultivation, and one unacquainted with distances and locations, and living in a distant state, would almost certainly be misled thereby. Two excerpts from the pamphlets or booklets will serve to illustrate what we have just said: "The Rio Linda district today is the home of nearly 250 families—a happy, thrifty people—all in possession of their own homes, their own orchards and gardens and profit-paying poultry flocks. The Rio Linda district is no painted picture—what we say here is no overdrawn description of what is hoped may come to pass. Rio Linda is an actuality. The people are there; the rapidly increasing poultry flocks are there, and the opportunity is there for you today at Rio Linda." A second excerpt from one of the booklets reads as follows: "Though the soil condition in California varies greatly in different districts, the soil in the Rio Linda district is very uniform. The surface of the land looks almost level to the eye, though actually it has gently rolling slopes and undulations which naturally assist in drainage and irrigation. The top soil, generally speaking, is what is known in California as a sandy clay loam. This top soil varies in depth, is a friable soil and variously adapted to the different fruit trees and vines. The subsoil is a closely packed clay, varying in depth, texture and character. With reference to this clay subsoil the United States Government soil reports show that the majority of the lands in the Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys are underlaid with a hard clay stratum commonly known as hardpan." This latter quotation is relied upon by the defendant as containing a statement sufficient to place the plaintiffs on notice relative to the existence of hardpan. We may here state, however, that, after the plaintiff came to California, and had been here some months, and heard some talk about hardpan, they asked a man who was acting as horticultural expert of the defendant as to the existence of hardpan and its effect upon fruit growing, and to their query the reply was made that the hardpan acted as a "sort of fertilizer." It will be noticed that the excerpt which we have last quoted makes no reference to the fact as to whether the hardpan in the Rio Linda district is near the surface, nor does it make any reference as to whether the hardpan in the fertile sections of the Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys is in the so-called "fertile" districts, so far below the surface as not to interfere with cultivation.

[1] Without further reference to the testimony establishing the alleged fraudulent representations, we will content ourselves with the statement that a review of the record satisfies us that the findings of the trial court as to such representations are sufficiently supported.

[2, 3] The minor point made by the appellant that the testimony does not show the damages allowed by the court we likewise think untenable. The record contains evidence to the effect that the lot in question was of the value of only about $75 per acre, and also that, had it been of the character represented, it would have been of the value of $350 per acre, which furnishes a basis for the court's conclusion as to the amount of the damages, and it satisfactorily appears that the court followed the California rule that the damages suffered on account of misrepresentations are to be ascertained by determining the fair market value of the land as it is, and what it would have been had the representations been true.

The main contention of the appellant is to the effect that the several causes of action involved in this appeal are barred by the statute of limitations. Upon this question the trial court found as follows: That the allegations of the plaintiffs' complaint to the effect that it was not apparent, to persons not expert in fruit culture, prior to 1927, that the lands were not well adapted to the raising of fruits; that prior to the year 1927 it was generally believed by all the settlers and neighbors situate on lands adjoining the plaintiffs that the lands were especially adapted to the culture of all kinds of deciduous fruits; that the plaintiffs did not have any occasion to suspect that they had been defrauded prior to the year 1927; that the plaintiffs relied upon the representations of the defendant's agents that the hardpan was not injurious to the raising of fruit trees; and that the agents of the defendant lulled the plaintiffs into security by representations that the hardpan was not injurious but acted as a fertilizer.

The record shows that the plaintiffs came to California on or about September 23, 1923; and, as we read the testimony, it indicates that there were sufficient facts and circumstances discovered by the plaintiffs to put them upon inquiry, some time the latter part of the year 1925, and at least during the year 1926. The action by the plaintiffs Stevens was begun on August 4, 1927. It is strongly insisted by the appellant that the discovery should have been made much earlier, and that there were sufficient facts and circumstances apparent from which the plaintiffs should, and could, have obtained knowledge of the fraud at a period antedating more than three years, the date of the beginning of the action. As said in 16 California Jurisprudence, 501; "In the determination of this question, if it appears that a person has notice or information of circumstances which, if followed, would lead to knowledge, or that the facts are presumptively within his knowledge, he will be deemed to have actual knowledge of the facts. In such case, the familiar rule that every person who has actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man on inquiry, is deemed to have actual notice of the fact itself in cases in which by prosecuting the inquiry he might have learned the fact is applied. The courts, however, do not lightly seize upon some small circumstance to deny relief to a party plainly shown to have been actually defrauded upon the ground that he did not discover the fact that he had been cheated soon enough. Where there is no duty upon a person to make inquiry and under the circumstances a prudent man would not be put upon notice, the mere fact that means of knowledge are open will not debar one from relief when discovery is afterwards made; the circumstances must be such that inquiry becomes a duty, and a failure to make it a negligent omission. And, where ignorance of the fraud is produced by the affirmative acts of the guilty party, a failure to discover the fraud is excused and the statutory period will not run until actual discovery of the facts.

The authorities supporting the text just quoted are exceedingly numerous, and need not be cited. The plaintiffs, during all the negotiations relative to the purchase of the tract of land involved, were residents of the state of Wisconsin, a state in which the soil is entirely dissimilar, the methods of cultivation almost wholly unlike those followed in California. One is a state where agriculturists depend upon rainfall; the other, where irrigation is necessary for the success of horticultural undertakings. The Rio Linda district is shown by the testimony to be what is called "upland" territory; it does not lie adjoining any stream of water; irrigation is necessary for the profitable cultivation and raising of any kind of fruit. For successful irrigation there must be sufficient drainage. Whether such drainage conditions exist depends upon the condition of the subsoil, and one unfamiliar with the character of the lands involved in this action could ascertain this fact only by experimentation. The testimony shows that the orchards pictured in the booklets were not upon lands similar to those sold the plaintiffs in these actions. The testimony does show that by experimenting in different parts of the 12,000 acres heretofore referred to as being the tract placed upon the market by the defendant fruit trees had been successfully propagated where the soil was underlaid with hardpan, but that to do so it was necessary to blast the hardpan. No one coming from Wisconsin, where such conditions do not exist, could reasonably be expected to have in mind the necessity of blasting in order to set out a tree. Again, whether even blasting will enable one to succeed in raising fruit trees depends upon whether sufficient drainage is thereby secured. Further, the testimony shows that it requires two or three years to determine whether a tree will grow. If drainage cannot be had, or is not had, the tree will apparently thrive for a year or two, and then wither and die. It does appear that the plaintiffs ascertained the existence of hardpan in the Rio Linda district but, as herein stated, were advised by a representative of the defendant that hardpan acted as a "sort of fertilizer."

[4] This being an action for damages, and not an action for rescission, the question of laches does not enter into a determination. However, cases having to do with that subject are applicable upon the question of discovery. In the case of Dickey v. Dunn, 80 Cal. App. 724, 252 P. 770, 772, it is said: "Where a purchaser is justified in relying, in fact does rely, upon false representations his right of action is not destroyed because means of knowledge were open to him (Teague v. Hall, 171 Cal. 668, 154 P. 851) and while it appears that the plaintiff visited the property before the transfer was made, the evidence sufficiently supports the finding that he relied upon the representations both as to its value and character. The statements as to the character of the soil and as to the water supply were clearly representations of fact. French v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 579, 217 P. 515; Stone v. McCarty, 64 Cal. App. 158, 220 P. 690."

Again, in Powell v. Oak Ridge Orchards Co., 84 Cal. App. 714, 258 P. 636, 638, on the subject of laches, we find the following: "There is no artificial rule as to the lapse of time or circumstances which will justify the application of the doctrine of laches [citing cases], the question of whether or not a party defrauded has rescinded promptly depending upon all the circumstances of the particular case and being primarily one for the trial court to determine (French v. Freeman, supra); and if its conclusions thereon find reasonable support in the evidence the reviewing court will not interfere therewith (Suhr v. Lauterbach, 164 Cal. 591, 130 P. 2). Interference here, under the circumstances stated, would, in our opinion, be clearly unwarranted, it appearing that plaintiffs acted with reasonable diligence."

Applying the principle announced in these cases to the Stevens and Isenberger cases, it would be primarily the duty of the trial court to ascertain and determine both discovery and knowledge on the part of the plaintiffs, and whether the circumstances were such as to put the plaintiffs upon inquiry by means of which they could and should have earlier discovered the character and condition of the soil, its unfitness for fruit raising, and the misrepresentations on the part of the defendant's agents.

In the Orchards Case, supra, the plaintiff purchased the premises on January 3, 1921, and took possession immediately. In July, 1922, he discovered the trees were dying. He made the offer of rescission on February 15, 1923, and began suit in April, 1923. As we have seen, the delay in that case was held excusable. A year and a half elapsed between the purchase and the discovery of the fraud. In the Dunn Case, supra, the delay in discovering the falsity of the representation as to the value and character of the soil was a trifle over two years.

In Scott v. Delta Land Co., 57 Cal. App. 320, 207 P. 389, in which it was held that misrepresentations as to the productive quality of the soil and the adequacy of the water supply were material factors, a delay of a few days over one year was held excusable. In that case we may say it further appeared that the quality of the soil could only be determined by chemical analysis or by actual experimentation. Hence there could be no imputation of negligence, because Scott, a farmer, having been afforded an opportunity to see and examine the soil, did not at once discover its true character. In the case at bar the plaintiffs, after coming to California, of course had an opportunity to view the lot in question, but could only determine the character of the soil by having an analysis made of it, or by actual experimentation. That the latter course is one which would be followed, and which it was reasonable for a farmer to follow, cannot be gainsaid, and therefore it cannot be held as a matter of law that the plaintiffs were negligent in relying upon experimentation rather than having an analysis of the soil made in order to determine whether it was fit for the setting out and cultivation of fruit trees.

[5] That the misrepresentations were all material and sufficient upon which to base an action, in addition to the cases listed we may cite the following: Stone v. McCarty, 64 Cal. App. 158, 220 P. 690; Palladine v. Imperial Valley, etc., 65 Cal. App. 727, 225 P. 291; Gammon v. Ealey & Thompson, 97 Cal. App. 452, 275 P. 1005; French v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 579, 217 P. 515; McMahon v. Grimes, 206 Cal. 526, 275 P. 440.

In support of its contention that the actions herein are barred by the statute of limitations, the defendant calls our attention to the recent decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals in the case of Sacramento Suburban Fruit Lands Co. v. Johnson, 36 F.(2d) 935, and the companion cases there referred to. The Johnson Case, however, is readily distinguishable from the case prosecuted by the plaintiffs Stevens. In the Johnson Case the following instruction on the subject of discovery of fraud was given: "Moreover, he is told by the circular that to bring an orchard to bearing takes five to seven years. He has a right to test it out. He wouldn't be obliged to grasp and believe anybody's statement if he heard it, that it was not adapted to commercial orchards, and he would have five to seven years, according to defendant's theory, to test it out, if he didn't otherwise find out it was not adapted to commercial orchards. He says he planted his trees in 1924, and seeing them die, as they did, mostly in 1927, his theory is that it was then that he discovered, and only then, that the land was not adapted to the commercial growing of fruit." The Circuit Court then says: "Under this instruction the plaintiff might bide his time for the full period required for the maturing of an unplanted orchard, unless he happened to find out through some other source that the land was not adapted for orchards. * * * The instruction falls short of the rule of diligence required in such cases."

In the Jensen Case, reported in the same volume, page 936, reversal was had by reason of error of the court in its instructions to the jury.

In the Anderson Case, reported in the same volume, page 937, the judgment of the trial court was affirmed.

In the Tipper Case, reported in the same volume, page 941, the judgment in favor of the plaintiff was also affirmed.

In the principal case of Sacramento Suburban Fruit Lands Co. v. Melin (C. C. A.), reported in the same volume above referred to, page 907, 908, it appears that the plaintiff visited the Rio Linda district before entering into a contract of purchase. It appears also in the Melin Case that the cause was reversed on account of errors in instructions, one of which related to the representation as to the value of the land; the court in the Melin Case saying: "In order that purchaser may rely on vendor's representations as to value of the property, it is not sufficient that vendor have greater information or superior judgment, but it generally must appear that land is remotely situated, or for other reasons the sources of information are not reasonably available to purchaser." Here we have a situation readily distinguishable. At the time the contract was entered into the plaintiffs were residents of the state of Wisconsin, and that the state of Wisconsin is a long distance from the Rio Linda district is a fact of which we must take judicial notice. At the time the contract was entered into, the plaintiffs had no information concerning the value of the land, its character, quality, or capabilities, other than that furnished by the defendant; nor can we say that they had any reasonable means of acquiring such information prior to the date of entering into the contract. Erroneous instructions as to the question of good faith on the part of the defendant also entered into the decision in the Melin Case. One of the tracts involved in the Melin Case was purchased in 1921; the action was commenced August 14, 1927. A much longer period was involved than in the case of the plaintiffs Stevens; likewise a dissimilarity as to the means of information possessed by the respective plaintiffs. One came to California and inspected the land before purchasing, and had an opportunity to make inquiries in the nearby populous city of Sacramento. The plaintiffs Stevens had no such opportunity. The following cases were reversed by reason of instructions held to be erroneous: Sacramento Suburban Fruit Lands Co. v. Boucher (C. C. A.) 36 F.(2d) page 912; McKew Case, same volume, page 917; Curtis Case, same volume, page 923; Haenggi Case, same volume, page 923. The following cases were affirmed by reason of there being no errors in the instructions: Loucks Case, same volume, page 921; Miller Case, same volume, page 922.

A review of the different cases cited in the volume to which we have referred we deem unnecessary, as the circumstances are different, and as the reversals were had for errors occurring during the course of the trial. We may, however, refer to the case of Sacramento Suburban Fruit Lands Co. v. Schreindl et al. (C. C. A.) reported in the same volume, beginning on page 932, wherein it was held not error to give an instruction to the effect that a purchaser, in an effort to discover the fraud practiced upon him, was not obliged to employ experts, or make abstruse and difficult investigations, just as we have stated heretofore in this opinion. It was not necessary for the plaintiffs to have employed some one qualified to make an analysis of the soil, but they had a right to rest upon experimentation and the usual means employed by farmers, in determining whether the lands in question would or would not fulfil the representations which had been made. In the case just referred to the judgment was affirmed.

[6] The conclusion to be gleaned from the cases relied upon by the appellant is that the circumstances must, in each case, be examined to determine whether the plaintiff, as a reasonable person, should have made prior discovery of the fraud, and that no hard and fast rule can be laid down as to the time within which such discovery must be made in order to bar the plaintiff's right of action. If the facts show that the purchaser, as a reasonable person, had the means of discovery, and should have made the discovery and prosecuted his inquiry leading up to the knowledge of the fraud practiced upon him at a period more than three years prior to the beginning of the action, then the cause should be held barred; otherwise, not.

[7] In the companion case of N. E. Isenberger against the defendant, the testimony relative to representations is practically the same as what we have hereinbefore set forth, but, in addition thereto, it clearly appears that Isenberger came to California, first, in December, 1924. The complaint in his action was filed on August 15, 1927. Three years had not elapsed from the date in which this plaintiff came to the state and the beginning of his action. The testimony showing that he had no reasonable opportunity to discover the existence of the fraud and did not have any actual opportunity to discover the same, there is no basis upon which the plea of the statute of limitations can rest. The circumstances presented in the case of the plaintiff Isenberger is very similar to the circumstances considered in the case of Nichols v. Moore, 181 Cal. 131, 183 P. 531. The findings of the court in the Isenberger case are sufficiently sustained, and nothing presented as to this cause seems to merit further consideration.

In the action entitled "John R. Layton and Louise S. Layton" we have a state of facts which calls for a consideration of whether the statute of limitations should be held to run in favor of the defendant. The record shows that John R. Layton has lived in California ever since 1912; that prior to coming to California he had lived for twenty years on a farm in Iowa; had given most of his attention to raising oats, wheat, and grain; had had no experience in the fruit business, other than raising fruit trees which supplied fruit for family use; had never attempted to raise fruit for commercial purposes. The plaintiff Louise S. Layton was raised on a farm in Oregon, and has lived in Sacramento ever since 1916. The plaintiff John R. Layton came to the city of Sacramento to live in the year 1921, and prior thereto, for a number of years, had lived in different places in the county of Sacramento, within a few miles of the city of Sacramento. On or about January 24, 1922, the plaintiff Layton entered into a contract with the defendant to purchase the west half of lot 134 of subdivision No. 6 of the Rio Linda tract, and thereupon went to the Rio Linda district to live, and remained there until November, 1922, when they came back to Sacramento. The return to Sacramento was made in order that the plaintiff John R. Layton might obtain work as a carpenter—that being the real vocation followed by him after coming to California in 1912. The record shows that John R. Layton, while out riding in the Rio Linda district, saw a sign on the highway indicating the persons handling the tract of land under consideration, and thereafter went and looked up the party at his office at 613 J street and inquired about the land. Thereafter a man by the name of McNaughton, on behalf of the company, called for and took the Laytons out to inspect the Rio Linda district. McNaughton, appears, was not a salesman, but a horticulturist. McNaughton showed the Laytons several pieces of land. About one-half day was spent in looking at different tracts. "McNaughton showed us the Reese place, Reese's young orchard and poultry farm. We stopped at the Reese corner and walked up about a quarter of a mile north, and McNaughton showed us a piece of land there; I think it was five acres. I didn't like that piece, so we came back and got in his car and we drove over to the west of Rio Linda. I don't remember the man's place, but a little place northwest of Rio Linda; showed us the young orchard he had out. He had a nice flock of chickens running in the orchard; he showed us how the man was taking care of it; then he took us out to Mr. Campbell's place; showed us his young orchard; showed us, also, a flock of young pullets. Campbell told us what his intentions were with his chickens and his orchard. McNaughton took us about $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile west and showed us another piece of land; then we came back to Sacramento. McNaughton also took us out to Mr. Lydon's place, and Mr. Lydon lectured to us on the poultry-house, about raising poultry. Also Mr. McNaughton gave us a short talk to show people how to plant their trees, and also the care of them. On the next occasion we visited Rio Linda, Mr. Brennan took us out. He came to our house and took myself and wife. Mr. Brennan simply showed us the same piece of land Mr. McNaughton showed us at first that didn't suit us; then he took us on north of Rio Linda and showed us another piece that didn't suit us; then he took us over to Subdivision 6 and showed us land over there. I didn't like the way the land lay; the water was standing on it; you couldn't walk out to a part of it. Then he showed us a piece that we passed; it was really the best drained from water standing on it. I asked if that piece had been sold. Mr. Brennan said no. It was a 10-acre tract, and I told him I couldn't handle 10 acres. Then he said he would see if the company would split it. It suited me very well. He told me that piece of land was worth \$350.00 an acre. He said it was good, fertile soil, rich loam soil, and would raise any kind of fruit that could be raised in California. He told us also that from that particular piece of land we could get an income of \$1,200 or \$1,500 a year when the orchard got to bearing, got to full bearing. Mr. Brennan told us to get a flock of chickens for the first thing, and raise chickens while the fruit was coming on. In the office of the company we asked Mr. Crinkley what kind of fruit the land would raise, and what he would suggest planting on the ground. He said peaches, plums, cherries, apricots and pears. He said it would grow commercially." The foregoing is taken from the testimony of the plaintiff John S. Layton, and covers the representations.

The witness further testified that he believed what was told him, and to the question whether that influenced him in any way in signing up the contract answered: "Nothing, only telling me it was good, rich, fertile land, will grow all this stuff." The witness further testified that, if they had not told him such things, he would not have signed. The witness also testified that, prior to the signing of the contract, Mr. Brennan told him that there was hardpan upon the land, the language of the witness being: "Brennan told me there was hardpan. Brennan said there was hardpan, but that it didn't amount to much." With reference to its effect upon fruit raising, the witness testified that Brennan said it would not hurt them at all. He said, "Just blast; the stuff didn't hurt them at all." He said, "Usually, it would be a fertilizer for the ground." The testimony is further to the effect that, after the plaintiffs moved out to the tract of land in question, a well was sunk and hardpan was disclosed by the digging of the well, or, rather, boring of the well, but that no attention was paid to it. After going out to the premises in 1922, the Laytons planted six trees. The hole in which the trees were planted was dug down about a foot or a little more. The plaintiffs did not consult any one in connection with the company about planting the trees. These trees only lived about three months. In planting the trees, the holes were not dug down to hardpan, the witness testifying: "I didn't go down to hardpan at that depth where I set out the trees." On November 22, 1922, the plaintiffs moved back to Sacramento. The plaintiffs did not set out any more trees on the land or make any further improvements or developments because they did not have any money. The plaintiffs then bought a lot in the city of Sacramento, and testified that in the laying of a sewer or sewer pipe in said lot hardpan was encountered. This, the witness stated, was given little or no attention. It further appears that the plaintiffs inquired of Mr. McNaughton, one of the men connected with the defendant, as to the cause of the death of the six trees which they had set out in 1923, shortly after their death, and McNaughton replied that he could not tell them. John R. Layton further testified that the death of the trees did not arouse any suspicion in his mind; that he could not imagine what was the matter with the trees. The record then shows that the plaintiffs moved back to the Rio Linda district late in the year 1925, being away from the property in controversy nearly three years. After returning to the five-acre tract in 1925, the plaintiffs planted a garden thereon in the year 1926, from which they obtained no returns. The plaintiffs testified that this aroused their suspicions, and that they began to make inquiries and were told that they had been cheated. Prior to this the plaintiffs had not talked to anybody about the value of the land or to any one about its cultivation.

This action was begun on August 11, 1927, five years and eight months after the contract of purchase herein referred to, and after the plaintiffs moved out to the five-acre tract to live. The record also shows that there was some conversation between John R. Layton and a representative of the company as to being able to obtain carpenter work in the Rio Linda district, in which the witness was informed that he thought he could obtain such work. No such work, however, was obtained. The testimony of the plaintiff Louise S. Layton was substantially the same as that of the testimony of the plaintiff John R. Layton.

The record further shows that some time during the latter part of 1923 and early in 1924 the plaintiffs endeavored to sell the tract of land in question, and were informed that the price was too high.

While the record shows that the plaintiff John R. Layton had lived in the county of Sacramento for a number of years, had come in contact with farms where orchards were being planted and cultivated, it does not show that he availed himself of the opportunity to become acquainted with the various soils found in the different portions of the county where he had lived and worked. The price at which the plaintiffs offered their property for sale was less than they had contracted to pay for it, and, as just stated, were informed that the price was too high. According to the testimony of the plaintiffs, none of these occurrences caused them to make any inquiry as to the value of the land or the quality of the soil contained therein. The record further shows, as stated by the witness John R. Layton, that in planting trees it was necessary to blast. This blasting was for the purpose of breaking up the hardpan to permit drainage, and also to permit the roots of the trees to penetrate the soil the necessary depth below the surface to maintain tree life. The testimony further shows that the plaintiffs, while living in Sacramento for a number of years and close to the lands involved, made no inquiry of any one concerning the same, either as to value or quality of soil or the adaptability thereof for fruit raising, or for any purpose. Likewise, the record shows that a number of days elapsed between the time the plaintiffs first considered purchasing the land in the Rio Linda district and the time when the final contract of purchase was entered into, during which time the plaintiffs made no inquiries of any one as to the quality of the soil, or as to the value of the property. This case differs also from that of the Stevens and Isenberger cases in that the plaintiffs were informed that there was hardpan in the five-acre tract, and that it would be necessary to blast through the hardpan when setting out trees. The plaintiffs also in this case had an object lesson as to hardpan in the boring of the well upon the premises. Likewise an object lesson as to the existence of hardpan when digging the sewer upon their lot in east Sacramento.

[8] The question presented by the foregoing is whether finding No. 3 of the trial court is supported by the testimony. That finding reads, so far as material here: "That plaintiff did not discover, and could not with reasonable diligence have discovered the falsity of any of said representations prior to February, 1927. * * *" While it is true that John R. Layton followed the vocation of a carpenter in California, he had had a number of years' experience upon a farm in Iowa, and, if possessed of ordinary intelligence, gained some knowledge of agriculture, even though it might not have acquainted him with the different quality of soils and their productive powers. However, the plaintiffs had knowledge, in the year 1922, of the existence of hardpan. That they may not have had knowledge of its unproductive qualities or deterrent qualities may also be true, but having been advised that it would be necessary to blast the hardpan before setting out trees, and having disregarded such advice and set out trees without blasting, and the trees only living for a few months thereafter, certainly constituted a discovery of facts sufficient to put a reasonable person upon inquiry as to the character and quality of the soil, and sufficient to induce any reasonable person to make inquiries as to what should be done in order to profitably cultivate trees, and whether trees could be successfully grown and profitably cultivated upon the five-acre tract. Notwithstanding this, the plaintiffs moved away from the premises and remained away nearly three years, living in Sacramento, only nine miles, or thereabouts, distant, where there were any number of real estate dealers of whom inquiries might be made, and yet no questions were asked.

As stated in the case of French v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 579, 217 P. 515, 518, the fact that the plaintiff visited the premises might properly, in this case, be held immaterial on the theory that the plaintiffs, at the time of the visit, were unable to judge of the quality and character of the soil. In the opinion of the case just referred to, we find the following: "If the defrauded party is not competent to judge the quality of the land, we do not see that it can make any difference whether or not he actually visits the premises. Assuming that if plaintiff had not visited the land he would be entitled to rely upon the representations, it would be unreasonable to say that he would not likewise be entitled to rely upon the representations, even though he visited the land, if as a matter of fact, by reason of his inexperience and ignorance, he was incompetent to judge the quality of the soil." In the instant case, however, admitting that the plaintiffs were ignorant, for the purposes of the argument, it is apparent that they were advised of what they complain as the "inherent defect" in the land, to wit, the presence of hardpan, and yet, according to their statements, made no inquiries until some time during the year 1926. There is nothing in the record which shows that the plaintiffs were lulled into inactivity by any act of the defendant, from the time they left the Rio Linda district until the alleged awakening of their suspicions in the summer of 1926. The complaint alleges that lands were sold to others in the same district for the same price, but there is nothing in the testimony or in the pleadings showing that the defendant practiced any concealment in this case relative to the existence of hardpan, the defect alleged to render the tract valueless. Nor is the statement of the agent of the company, Brennan, that all they needed to do before setting out the trees was to blast the hardpan, proven to be false.

The case of Nichols v. Moore, 181 Cal. 131, 183 P. 531, an instance of where a number of years intervened between the perpetration of the fraud and the discovery thereof, is readily distinguishable from the facts involved herein. There the plaintiff was living in the state of Ohio; the lands involved were situate in Washington in a timber district; were represented by the defendant to be covered with a valuable growth of timber available to navigation, etc. The plaintiff knew of the surrounding territory being covered with timber, but did not know that the particular tract involved had been completely denuded by fires. These were facts which were concealed and could not be readily ascertained by the plaintiff, and were not ascertained until an agent was sent by her to examine the premises. Even in that case the opinion holds that it is necessary for the parties seeking to avoid the statute of limitations to affirmatively plead facts excusing the failure to make an earlier discovery of the fraud relied upon. This, in the event of a lapse of more than three years. It is likewise held that ignorance of the fact which a party might, with reasonable diligence, have discovered, is not sufficient to postpone the running of the statute.

In Phelps v. Grady, 168 Cal. 73, 141 P. 926, 928, it is held that: "A party seeking to avoid the bar of a statute on account of fraud must aver and show that he used due diligence to detect it. * * * Concealment * * * which will avoid the statute must go beyond mere silence. It must be something done to prevent discovery. * * * Concealment * * * must be the result of positive acts. * * * Concealment by mere silence is not enough. There must be some trick or contrivance intended to exclude suspicion and prevent inquiry. * * * The circumstances of the discovery must be fully stated and proved, and the delay which has occurred must be shown to be consistent with the requisite diligence." As the record shows, nearly three years elapsed without the plaintiffs taking any act whatever, or making any inquiry. In other words, the record shows no diligence and no effort to ascertain what they alleged to be the truth concerning the lands involved, and likewise exhibits no act on the part of the defendant, as shown by the case of Phelps v. Grady, supra, necessary to exist in order to constitute an excuse for inactivity on the part of the plaintiffs.

The instant case is, in its essential particulars, similar to the circumstances involved in Sacramento Suburban Fruit Lands Co. v. MacNair (C. C. A.) 36 F. (2d) 950, where it was held that the testimony showed a case which was barred by the statute as a matter of law. In that case the plaintiff testified as to the discovery of hardpan, but he did not know what it was; that he finally moved off the premises for the lack of money; that he never talked with any one about fruit growing, and made no inquiries concerning the land, just as characterizes the actions of the Laytons in the case at bar.

From the foregoing we can find no escape from the conclusion that there is no testimony showing due diligence on the part of the Laytons, nor any excuse therefor, and that the finding of the trial court to such effect is without support.

[9-15] Is the defense of the statute of limitations available to the defendant in this action? The complaint alleges, and the answer admits, that the defendant is a Minnesota corporation, and therefore must comply with the act of the Legislature requiring the filing with the secretary of state of the designation of some person upon whom service of summons may be made. While the answer of the defendant did not plead the filing of such a designation, as required by the statute, it appears that the defendant did introduce, and there was admitted in testimony, an instrument showing such designation filed with the secretary of state on the 12th day of August, 1912. While the admission of this writing was objected to as being incompetent and immaterial, it was not objected to as not being within the issues tendered by the pleadings, and must therefore be considered as though properly pleaded. Following this a stipulation was made in the following words: "It is hereby stipulated that the A. M. Jones referred to in the designation filed with the secretary of state resigned from defendant's employ in the year 1914, and since such time has not been connected with the defendant in any capacity. Dated, the 18th day of June, 1929." Counsel for the respective parties stated to the court that it was not intended by the stipulation to include anything further than that A. M. Jones had resigned from his employment, and that the stipulation did not include anything relative to his designation as a person upon whom service of summons might be made. The designation filed with the secretary of state gave the residence at the time of the resignation of A. M. Jones as Sacramento, Cal. At the date of the trial, and at the time of the stipulation, and for some years prior thereto A. M. Jones had been residing in the city of Fresno, Fresno county. It is the contention of the respondent that, when A. M. Jones, the designated agent upon whom service might be made, resigned from his employment and left the city of Sacramento, going first to one of the northern cities in the state and finally locating in Fresno, he had in legal effect severed his designation as the company agent, and had worked an abandonment thereof so that the further running of the statute of limitations in behalf of the company had ceased. In support of this contention the respondent cites the cases of Gerrick & Gerrick Co. v. Llewellyn Iron Works, 105 Wash. 98, 177 P. 692, and Brown-Ketcham Iron Works v. George B. Swift Co., 53 Ind. App. 630, 100 N. E. 584, 860. In both of these cases there was involved the abandonment of the agency and the removal of the corporation from the state. Service of summons was had upon the designated agent after the abandonment and after the withdrawal of the corporation from the state where the designation had been filed. The service of summons in both cases was held invalid and insufficient to give the trial court jurisdiction. Here we have the corporation still doing business in the state.

The statute relative to designation of an agent upon whom service may be made, at the time the designation was filed, did not require that the residence of the designated agent should be in any particular place, or even should be stated in the designation, other than that he should be a resident of the state of California, and, in the event that the designated agent died or departed from the state, the corporation making the designation should, within forty days thereafter, file another designation; otherwise, the statute would cease to run. The statutes as now amended, requiring residence, etc., to be given, have no application. The statute specifies only one condition for stopping the running of the statute, to wit, the failure to file a new designation within forty days after the departure or death or removal from the state of the person theretofore designated. Under no other circumstances does the statute cease to run. The mere fact that the designated agent moves from one place to another within the state has no effect upon the operation of the statute. The statute of limitations is a creature of the Legislature, and the Legislature alone has power to fix the conditions under which it may operate, and also the circumstances necessary to suspend the running of the statute. Where the corporation has abandoned its business within the state and retired therefrom, the court might very well be justified in holding that, during the absence of the corporation from the state, the statute ceases to run, just as in the case of individuals who absent themselves from the state the time of such absence is no part of the statutory period constituting a bar. When the corporation has an office within the state and a managing agent or any officer therein, as named in subdivision 2 of section 411 of the Code of Civil Procedure, summons may be readily served. In fact, such appears to have been the procedure followed in the cases presented upon this appeal. Again, the cases cited by the respondent by reason of the fact that the corporation had retired from the state where the questions arose are inapplicable. Further, it is not necessary that the designated agent be an employee or officer of the company. When such designation is made, and the designation appears on file in the office of the secretary of state, service of summons may be made upon such designated agent, even though in fact such person had no connection with the corporation, and had considered himself no longer such agent. This is the substance of the holding in the case of Eureka L. & Y. Co. v. Superior Court, 66 Cal. 311, 5 P. 490, 492. The facts in that case show that one David Cahn, while an officer of the company, had been designated as the person upon whom service might be made. The following quotation shows the facts and the ruling of the court: "In the action in which the injunction was issued, the summons was served by the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco on the ninth of November, 1882, by delivering a copy of the same, together with a certified copy of the complaint, to the said David Cahn. On the motion of petitioner to set aside the return of service of summons, affidavits were read in support of the motion, to the effect that, at the time of the service, one A. S. Bigelow, of the county of Nevada, was its managing agent, and said Cahn was not, and had not been for more than a year prior thereto, the agent, cashier, secretary, or other officer of the petitioner. In regard to this point, it is sufficient to say that the petitioner had, under the statute of April 1, 1872, designated Cahn as the person upon whom process might be served, and such designation had not been revoked at the time of service. This designation was made after the amendment of 1874 to section 411 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the petitioner could not be heard to say, in the suit for injunction, that Cahn was not the proper person, as designated in subdivision 2 of said section 411. * * * To hold otherwise would be to permit a foreign corporation to set at defiance all processes." If, under such circumstances, a corporation is estopped from denying the validity of the service of summons upon a designated agent, so long as no change had been made by filing the necessary papers with the secretary of state, it follows as a matter of course that the corporation is not estopped to plead the statute. The weight of authority is that, the statute having provided a method of notifying the public of a change of agency, the designation continues until the specified procedure is followed.

In S. B. Reese Lumber Company v. Licking Coal & Lumber Co., 156 Ky. 723, 161 S. W. 1124, the Supreme Court of Kentucky, in dealing with a like question, held as follows: "Under Ky. St. § 571, providing that all foreign corporations shall have a known place of business and an authorized agent on whom process may be served, and that it shall not be lawful for any corporation to carry on business until it shall have filed in the office of the Secretary of State a statement giving the location of its office and the name of its agent, and, if the agent shall be changed, notice shall at once be given, service of process on one who appeared as agent in the statement filed with the Secretary of State is a good service on a foreign corporation, even though the agency had been terminated."

In Germantown Dairy Co. v. McCallum, 223 Pa. 554, 72 A. 885, 886, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania held that the statute "does not require that the registered agent of a foreign corporation should stand in any other relation to it than its agent upon whom process may be served, and, notwithstanding such an agent had parted with his interest in the corporation or had resigned his office as secretary and treasurer, he remained its agent, upon whom process might be served." In De La Vergne Refrigerating Machine v. Kolischer, 214 Pa. 400, 63 A. 971, it was held th his appointment was canceled in the man-that the designated agent remained such un-ner provided by the statutes.

In the case of Gibson v. Manufacturers' Fire & Marine Insurance Co., 144 Mass. 81, 10 N. E. 729, the Supreme Court, in considering a like question, held that the appointment of an agent was irrevocable, unless the revocation be made by the appointment, duly notified upon the public records, of a new agent, who should be competent to receive service of process.

We see no escape from the conclusion that, so long as the defendant in this case was doing business in this state, and under the authorities which we have cited, estopped from denying the authority of its designated agent to accept service, if such an issue were presented, it is likewise entitled to the benefit of the statute. In other words, the estoppel to deny is equivalent to holding that the statute of limitations never ceased to run. It may be further observed that there is nothing in the record indicating an intent or purpose, on the part of the defendant, to revoke or abandon the designated agency.

In view of what we have said, the order of the court must be and is as follows:

The judgment in the case of J. S. Stevens and Esther Stevens against the defendant is affirmed. The judgment of N. E. Isenberger against the defendant is likewise affirmed. And the judgment of John R. Layton and Louise S. Layton against the defendant is reversed.

PHILLIPS et al. v. LYON et al.

Civ. 4038.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Oct. 30, 1930.

1. New trial ⇨157.

In passing on motion for new trial for inadequate damages, court could consider testimony regarding admission of contributory negligence.

2. New trial ⇨75(1), 76(1).

New trial may be granted when it appears that verdict is not justified by evidence either because it is excessive or inadequate (Code Civ. Proc. § 657).

3. New trial ⇨74.

Court may not set aside verdict and grant new trial merely because judge does not agree with amount of damages.

4. New trial ⇨77(2, 4).

Where damages awarded are so inadequate or excessive as to leave no reasonable doubt that verdict is result of passion or prejudice or that it is contrary to evidence, new trial should be granted.

5. New trial ⇨74.

Jury's province to determine amount of damages for personal injuries should not be interfered with unless their discretion has been abused.

6. New trial ⇨75(4).

$3,000 damages for broken forearm and fractured vertebra, contusion on head, and nervous shock held not so inadequate as to require new trial.

7. Partnership ⇨174.

Members of copartnership held jointly, but not individually, liable for tort of agent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Jack Phillips, a minor, by E. E. Phillips, his guardian ad litem, and another, against Lloyd D. Lyon and J. H. Darwin, individually and as copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Lyon & Darwin Hardware Company, and others. From an unsatisfactory judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Lasher B. Gallagher and Walter E. Drobesch, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Downey & Chester, Butler, Van Dyke, Desmond & Harris, Downey, Brand & Seymour, and Hatfield & Hatfield, all of Sacramento, for respondents.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff Jack Phillips by his guardian has appealed from that portion of a judgment which was rendered in his favor in compensation of personal injuries sustained by him in an automobile collision accident. It is contended this portion of the judgment, which is for $3,000, is grossly inadequate to compensate him for the injuries sustained.

At 8 o'clock on the morning of June 1, 1928, the plaintiff's minor son Jack, aged fifteen years, was riding as a passenger with the defendant Clifford Woodard, Jr., in his father's Studebaker machine. They were traveling westerly on Ninth avenue in the city of Sacramento. At the same time, Alden C. King, a young man who was employed by the firm of Lyon & Darwin, hardware merchants of the same city, was driving their Ford truck in the course of his employment northerly along Thirty-Third street. Both machines were traveling along the proper side of their respective streets. Some shade trees and dwelling houses deprived both drivers of a clear view of the intersecting streets which they were approaching. Alden King testified he was traveling only 15 miles an hour, and that he actually entered upon the intersection of these streets before he saw the Woodard car approaching. Jack Phillips and Clifford Woodard, Jr., each testified they were traveling at a rate of speed not to exceed 20 or 25 miles an hour, and that he did not see the Ford truck until they reached a point 50 or 60 feet from the intersection. A collision occurred. There is a conflict of evidence as to the cause and manner of the contact of the machines. The driver of each car insists his automobile was struck on the side by the other machine. The Ford truck appears to have been shunted across the street, landing on an adjoining lawn against a dwelling house. The Ford, however, maintained an upright position upon its wheels. King, the driver, was dazed but uninjured. The Studebaker machine shot diagonally across the street and overturned at the curbing. Jack Phillips was found beneath the wreck of the machine, unconscious and seriously injured. He was taken to the county hospital where he remained under the care of a physician for several months. He sustained a fracture of the twelfth vertebra of the spinal column. Both bones of the right forearm were shattered near the wrist. It is insisted that he is permanently injured. A suit for damages was commenced against the driver of the Ford truck and his parents. The hardware firm was made a party defendant, as were also the individual members of the copartnership. The defendants answered separately, denying the allegations of negligence with which they were charged and affirmatively asserting that the driver of the Studebaker machine was guilty of contributory negligence. The cause was tried before a jury. A verdict was rendered against each of the defendants, except L. D. Lyon and J. H. Darwin, as individuals, for damages for the injuries sustained by Jack Phillips in the sum of $3,000 and for an additional sum of $1,786 for expenses incurred as a result of the injuries. A judgment was entered accordingly. The plaintiff was dissatisfied with the award of damages for personal injuries and moved for a new trial, which was denied. This appeal was then perfected. The defendants have not appealed. They do not complain of the judgment.

The plaintiff contends that the award of damages is grossly inadequate to compensate his ward for the injuries sustained, and that the judgment is erroneous for the reason that it was not rendered against the individual members of the copartnership which employed the driver of the Ford machine.

[1] A serious controversy existed regarding the alleged contributory negligence of Clifford Woodard, Jr., who was driving the Studebaker car at the time of the accident. A judgment for the defendants would have found ample support in the evidence. Both boys who were riding in the Studebaker machine saw the approaching Ford truck when they were 50 or 60 feet away. A prompt application of the brakes on their part might have avoided the accident. If the nurse, who had charge of Jack Phillips while he was confined to the hospital, speaks the truth, he admitted they were running at a grossly excessive rate of speed which prevented them from avoiding the collision. She testified that he said regarding the accident: "We were going like hell * * * We must have been going between 65 and 75 miles an hour. * * * We were seeing how fast we could go. * * * How could the other car get out of the way? We were going too fast." The fact that the Ford truck was shunted across the street, over the lawn and up against a dwelling house, gives credence to this admission of Jack Phillips. The defendants, however, are not complaining of the judgment against them. They have not appealed. From the implied finding of the jury which necessarily follows the judgment in favor of the plaintiff, this court must assume he is entitled to a substantial award of damages. However, in determining whether the judgment is grossly inadequate and whether the award is supported by the evidence, the foregoing facts may be considered by a trial court in passing on a motion for a new trial which is based upon the ground of the alleged inadequacy of the verdict. In determining the adequacy of a judgment, an appellate court is confined to a more stringent rule.

[2] A new trial may be granted under the provisions of section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure when it appears that the verdict is not justified by the evidence either because it is excessive or grossly inadequate.

Formerly, the rule at common law did not authorize the granting of new trials in actions for personal injuries or torts on the ground of inadequacy of damages. It was argued that, since the amount of damages is largely within the discretion of the jury in such cases where there is no standard of computation, there is then no accurate rule by which to measure the damages. The discretion of the jury may therefore not be interfered with.

In England and in the United States that rule has been greatly relaxed. The principle is now uniformly recognized that there is no greater reason for granting a new trial on the ground that a verdict is excessive than that it is inadequate. In either event it is erroneous because it does not represent just compensation for the injuries sustained.

[3-5] While a court may not set aside a verdict and grant a new trial merely because the judge does not agree with the amount of the award of damages, where it is so grossly inadequate or excessive as to leave no reasonable doubt that the verdict is the result of passion or prejudice or that it is contrary to the evidence and constitutes a clear abuse of the discretion of the jury, a new trial should be granted for the reason that the award of damages is not justified by the evidence and does not reasonably compensate for the injuries sustained. Taylor v. Northern Elec. Ry. Co., 26 Cal. App. 765, 148 P. 543; Donnatin v. Union H. & M. Co., 38 Cal. App. 8, 175 P. 26, 177 P. 845; 20 Cal. Jur. 104, § 67; 20 R. C. L. 288, § 67; 46 C. J. 207, § 152; 1 Hayne on New Trial, 455, § 95. The province of the jury to determine the amount of damages to be awarded as compensation for personal injuries should, however, not be interfered with unless it clearly appears their discretion has been abused. It is difficult to determine just what state of facts will warrant a trial court in setting aside the verdict of a jury on the ground that the award is inadequate or what record will justify an appellate court in reversing a judgment on that ground. Where property values are involved it is not difficult to ascertain the approximate measure of damage. But who can accurately estimate the pecuniary damage resulting from the loss of a member of the body or an injury to some vital organ? In the Taylor Case, supra, where it appears the plaintiff sustained a serious injury to the spine and paralysis resulted therefrom, the trial court set aside a verdict of $500 as inadequate. On appeal the order granting the new trial was affirmed. We are cited to no authority, however, wherein a verdict for $3,000 as damages for injuries similar to those which were sustained in the present case, was set aside as inadequate.

[6] There is evidence in this case to indicate that Jack Phillips was seriously and possibly permanently injured. Both bones of the right forearm near the wrist were broken. The twelfth vertebra of the spinal column was fractured. This caused a lateral curvature of the spine. The periphery process of the vertebra was also injured. He received a severe contusion on the back of his head. He suffered great pain and shock to the nervous system. He was delirious for several days. He was confined to the hospital several months and was kept in a plastercast jacket for five months. There is evidence from which the jury may have assumed the injuries to his arm and spine may leave permanent damaging results, and that a future operation may become necessary to adjust the curvature of the spine and relieve the patient of pain. The doctor testified regarding the broken arm: "The bone on the outside of the arm * * * shows a deformity of this ulna, an angulation * * * (of) about two centimeters. * * * Although he has got pretty good motion in the wrist—very good function— * * * he has not as much as he had before."

Regarding the fracture of the vertebra which left a slight curvature of the spine and a nervous condition, he said:

"He has certainly suffered nervous shock, just how permanent it will be, I do not know. * * *

"Q. If the pain does not leave, doctor, is it customary to perform an operation in that region? A. Yes. If after the brace is removed and he still has pain in his spine, it will be necessary * * * to take a graft from the leg and put into the spine in order to keep that portion of the vertebra in that region from moving. * * *

"Q. Have you any approximate idea of the reasonable cost of what such an operation would be? * * * A. Oh, I imagine a thousand dollars would be a fair fee." This is the only evidence regarding the cost of a possible necessary future operation. The necessity of such an operation is conditional and uncertain.

Where the undisputed pecuniary value of property is damaged by the ascertained tort of an individual, it is easy to determine whether a judgment is adequate or not. Where a plaintiff has been awarded a judgment which clearly entitles him to a substantial amount of damages, and the jury renders a verdict for a mere nominal sum, the inadequacy is apparent. Many authorities uphold a remedy under such circumstances. The judgment in the present case is not for a mere nominal sum. It greatly exceeds an award which might be so termed. From the very necessity and uncertainties of the situation a jury is accorded a wide latitude and an elastic discretion in assessing damages as compensation for personal injuries. We know of no equitable or accurate means of measuring the damages under such circumstances except to rely upon the sound judgment of the jurors. Under the facts of this case we are unable to say as a matter of law that the judgment is inadequate or that the award is so grossly insufficient as to lack support of the evidence and require a reversal on that account.

[7] There was no error in failing to render or enter the judgment against the individual members of the defendant copartnership. It is a partnership liability for the tort of an agent and employee within the scope of his employment which binds the partnership and the members thereof jointly. 20 Cal. Jur. 740, § 55; 20 R. C. L. 914, § 126; 47 C. J. 884, § 364. Each of the partners is individually liable for the payment of the debt. 20 Cal. Jur. 849, § 140. In 1 Rowley's Modern Law of Partnership, 639, § 504, it is said: "Partnerships and partners are bound and liable for the tortious acts of their agents or servants acting within the scope of their agency or employment as well as for the acts of each partner acting within the scope of the firm's business."

The judgment is affirmed.

ROBERT MARSH & CO., Inc., v. TREMPER et ux.*L. A. 10531.

Supreme Court of California.

Oct. 28, 1930.

1. Contracts ⇨155.

Unexplained uncertainties in instrument providing for commissions, prepared by broker, must be interpreted most strongly against him (Civ. Code, § 1654).

2. Damages ⇨150.

Complaint for broker's commissions, claiming "$1000 as liquidated damages for time, trouble and expense," held insufficient; statute allowing liquidated damages only where ascertaining actual damage is impracticable (Civ. Code, §§ 1670, 1671).

Civ. Code, § 1670, provides that every contract by which amount of damage for breach is determined in anticipation is to that extent void, except as provided in section 1671, which allows parties to agree on amount of damage when, from nature of case, it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix actual damage.

3. Damages ⇨85.

Contract provision for liquidated damages is void, unless it is shown that case comes within statutory exception (Civ. Code, §§ 1670, 1671).

4. Damages ⇨163(3).

Person relying on statutory exception, allowing liquidated damages in contract only where ascertaining actual damage is impracticable, has burden of proof (Civ. Code, §§ 1670, 1671).

5. Damages ⇨79(2).

"Damages for time, trouble and expense incurred" by broker, being commonplace items readily computable, are not recoverable as liquidated damages (Civ. Code, §§ 1670, 1671).

6. Damages ⇨157(3).

Person claiming liquidated damages under contract must plead and prove facts from which court can say as matter of law that contract is valid (Civ. Code, §§ 1670, 1671).

7. Pleading ⇨208.

Special demurrer pointing out uncertainty and ambiguity caused by contract providing for liquidated damages held sufficient, although not specifically stating that contract was void under statute (Civ. Code, §§ 1670, 1671).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas L. Ambrose, Judge.

Action by Robert Marsh & Company, Incorporated, against Theodore P. Tremper and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Modified and affirmed.

Clark J. Milliron, George H. P. Shaw, Leo M. Daly, George L. Reimbold, and L. B. Cramer, all of Los Angeles (H. B. Daniel, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants.

Clyde C. Shoemaker, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J.

Appeal from a judgment awarding liquidated damages arising upon a real estate broker's contract for compensation on account of an exchange of real property. Judgment went for plaintiff in the sum of $2,200—$1,000 of which was assessed as actual and $1,000 as liquidated damages and $200 as attorneys' fees.

Robert Marsh & Co., Inc., plaintiff and respondent, was a real estate broker doing business in the city of Los Angeles, this state.

Appellants, Theodore P. Tremper and May C. Tremper, his wife, were the owners of certain described real property situate in the state of Washington. Charles E. Smith was the owner of certain lots situate in said city of Los Angeles.

[1] By and through the efforts of said real estate broker or agent, said Tremper and said Smith executed certain agreements prepared by said broker for the exchange of real properties, which agreements provided for the payment by the Trempers of stated sums to said broker for its services, as will hereafter more particularly appear. The agreements providing for the exchange and the broker's compensation or commission are somewhat unusual and, it may here be added, uncertain in their provisions. Said instruments having been prepared by said broker, such uncertainties as they may contain, in the absence of testimony removing or explaining said uncertainties, must be interpreted most strongly against the party who caused them to exist. Section 1654, Civ. Code; 6 Cal. Jur. 307.

Such portions of the agreements between respondent real estate broker and the Trempers and between said broker and Smith, which constitute the basis of respondent's claim for damages, provide that said broker, Robert Marsh & Co., Inc., is to act as principal or agent of said Trempers and Smith, respectively, in said transaction. As to the Trempers, the agreement provides:

"That when he [real estate agent] has accepted or procured an acceptance of this proposition to exchange the above properties on the above terms, they will then pay the sum of One Thousand Dollars, regardless of the amount of property or money it receives in, or through the acceptance and consummation of the above exchange and have no objection to it receiving other compensation from the owner of the second piece of property [Smith] or others.

"And they hereby agree that if they fail in any way to carry out their part of the above agreement, then and in that event—agree to pay on demand of Robert Marsh & Co., Inc., the sum of $1,000 as liquidated damages for time, trouble and expense incurred in the within deal, together with reasonable attorney's fees for the collection thereof."

The forms of agreement are doubtless stock forms used by said agent, and the concluding portion of the Smith agreement is identical with the Tremper agreement, except it contains the provision that "no commissions as liquidated damages for his time, trouble and expense incurred in the within deal, together with reasonable attorney's fees," shall be chargeable against Smith in the event he fails to carry out his agreement.

Both parties to the contract of exchange having become dissatisfied with their bargain, the deal was abandoned by them by mutual consent. The agent thereupon brought suit to recover damages and recovered judgment for the full amount prayed for, from which this appeal is taken.

Sections 1670 and 1671, Civil Code, provide:

"1670. Every contract by which the amount of damage to be paid, or other compensation to be made, for a breach of an obligation, is determined in anticipation thereof, is to that extent void, except as expressly provided in the next section.

"1671. The parties to a contract may agree therein upon an amount which shall be presumed to be the amount of damage sustained by a breach thereof, when, from the nature of the case, it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage."

[2-4] The complaint alleges the licensing of respondent as a real estate broker and sets forth in usual form a cause of action for the recovery of the amount fixed by the agreement, to wit, $1,000 "to be paid to respondent upon procuring an acceptance of the proposition," and, in addition thereto, and without alleging or stating any facts from which an inference tending to bring the case within the provisions of said section 1671, supra, might arise, simply alleges that the appellants further agreed to pay respondent "the sum of $1,000 as liquidated damages for time, trouble and expense incurred in the within deal, * * *" It has many times been held by the decisions of appellate courts of this state wherein cases involving the identical subject-matter were under consideration that such an allegation as is contained in respondent's complaint does not bring the case within the exception of said code section. Neither was any sufficient proof offered to supply the defect. The law is that the "liquidated damage" clause is void unless it is made to appear that the case comes within the exception provided by section 1671, supra. The burden rests upon the person who seeks to bring himself within the exception. Upon the face of the complaint and agreement itself the provision which provides for the payment of liquidated damages is void.

[5] The items which respondent specifically names as constituting the basis of its damages, to wit, "time, trouble and expenses incurred" in bringing about the exchange, are commonplace items which enter into every contract for service and they have never been held to be impracticable or extremely difficult of determination, but, on the contrary, have been held by numerous decisions to be readily computable. McInerney v. Mack, 34 Cal. App. 153, 166 P. 867, 868.

[6] In actions such as this the person claiming liquidated damages "must show to the court by proper pleadings and competent proof that the contract falls 'within' the law permitting liquidated damages. This does not depend entirely upon the contract itself. Facts must be pleaded and proven from which the court can say as a matter of law that the contract for liquidated damages is valid because 'from the nature of the case it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage. The mere stipulations of the contract are insufficient for that purpose.'" McInerney v. Mack, supra, citing a long list of authorities. This principle has been reannounced in Knight v. Marks, 183 Cal. 354, 191 P. 531, and in many more recent decisions of this court and the District Courts of Appeal. Hanlon Drydock & Shipbuilding Co. v. McNear, 70 Cal. App. 204, 232 P. 1002.

[7] The respondent objects to appellants' presenting the point as to the deficiency of the complaint on appeal on the ground that they did not demur to the complaint upon the specific ground that the contract was void for the reasons which have been pointed out. The demurrer was both general and special. The general grounds went to the sufficiency of the complaint, which contained but one count, to state a cause of action.

Several special grounds of demurrer were set forth, and while none of them in direct terms made objection to that portion of the complaint which contained the liquidated damage clause on the ground that it was void, nevertheless the attention of the pleader was called to the infirmities of the liquidated damage clause and the significance of section 1671, supra, by a number of grounds of special demurrer as to uncertainty and ambiguity by reason of said liquidated damages clause. We entertain no doubt but that the infirmities of the complaint were fully brought to the respondent's attention by the demurrer and the attitude of opposing counsel. The allegation of the complaint as to that item of damage did not state a cause of action.

Appellants make the further point that the contract should not be interpreted to hold that the parties thereto intended that two payments of $1,000 each were to be paid by them for services which were completed when the consent of the parties to the exchange had been obtained. In other words, it would seem that compensation for the "time, trouble and expense" specifically mentioned as constituting compensatory service in the liquidated damage clause of the agreement were necessarily included in and were in fact performed and ended when the parties to the exchange consented thereto, and therefore those items were not intended to constitute a basis for a second charge against appellants. It is appellants' claim that the contract is open to, and in view of the fact that it was prepared by respondent should be given, the construction that respondent was to receive a fee of $1,000 if and when it obtained the consent of Smith to the exchange, irrespective of the question of its consummation. The contract is somewhat ambiguous in this respect, but, whatever may have been the intention of said parties, it is very clear that the contract taken at its best fails in its attempt to fasten upon appellants a liability for payment of liquidated damages. Damages for loss of "time, trouble, and expenses" are easily determinable under all the authorities, and if said items of service were not included in the clause for stipulated or actual damages, which it would seem must be the case, they are not recoverable in an action for liquidated damages. Sections 1670, 1671, Civ. Code.

The judgment is modified by striking therefrom said $1,000 for and on account of liquidated damages, and as so modified the judgment will stand affirmed.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; RICHARDS, J.; SHENK, J.; LANGDON, J.; PRESTON, J.; CURTIS, J.

211 Cal. 1

PRESTON et al. v. HERMINGHAUS et al.

S. F. 13354.

Supreme Court of California.

Nov. 1, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 28, 1930.

1. Attorney and client ⇨144.

Any ambiguity in contract between attorney and client must be construed in favor of client.

2. Attorney and client ⇨144.

Contract between attorney and client, if unambiguous, will be enforced like other contracts.

3. Attorney and client ⇨148(3).

Where contract provided graduated scale of attorneys' fees depending on whether clients sold riparian property to power company, or whether damages were collected after prosecution of condemnation suits, attorneys, on sale by clients after commencement of condemnation suits, were entitled to fees under condemnation clause (Civ. Code, § 1643).

At the time the contract was entered into, attorneys were engaged in prosecuting a suit to restrain the power company from diverting water. The contract provided the attorneys should receive $85,000 in case of sale of property prior to decision of Supreme Court, and $100,000 in case of sale thereafter. "However, in case any condemnation suit or suits are prosecuted * * * and damages are collected * * * by compromise or by judgment," payment was to be on the percentage basis in ratio increasing with the amount recovered. The reasonable construction of the contract was to allow fees under the clause relating to condemnation in view of additional work done by the attorneys in the condemnation suits, and applying test of reasonableness under Civ. Code, § 1643. The parties themselves construed the contract in this way in fixing payment to attorneys, from amount received from power company for permission to violate injunction.

4. Contracts ⇨170(1).

Practical construction placed on contract by parties is admissible to explain ambiguity.

5. Attorney and client ⇨148(3).

Sale of entire riparian property to power company after commencement of condemnation suits amounted to "compromise" of all condemnation proceedings, within contract allowing attorneys percentage of damages collected.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Compromise," see Words and Phrases.]

6. Attorney and client ⇨148(3).

Where power company purchased riparian lands in settlement of condemnation proceedings to secure water rights, amount received for entire property must be considered in determining vendor's attorneys' fees contracted for on percentage basis.

The contract for payment of the attorneys did not limit their compensation to amount received for the water rights alone, but provided that, in case condemnation suits were prosecuted and damages collected by compromise or judgment, the compensation of the attorneys should be a certain percent of "all sums realized."

7. Attorney and client ⇨148(3).

Where attorneys, who had defended suits to condemn water rights, sued clients on contract for percentage of amount received on sale of riparian lands, evidence of value of water rights was inadmissible.

The contract provided for percentages on what was actually received, and not what should have been received, and neither the seller nor the purchaser valued the land separately from the water rights.

8. Attorney and client $\Rightarrow$ 148(3).

Loss resulting from failure of clients in selling riparian land to power company to allocate value of water rights should be borne by clients themselves, and not by attorneys who contracted for percentage of amount received.

PER CURIAM.

This action was brought for the purpose of collecting attorneys' fees alleged to be due plaintiffs from the defendants for legal services rendered by plaintiffs as attorneys at law in protecting defendants' water rights. It appears that defendants, in the year 1924, were the owners of a tract of land containing about eighteen thousand acres in Fresno and Madera counties and adjacent to the San Joaquin river; all but one thousand acres being riparian thereto. These valuable water rights were in danger by reason of threatened and actual diversions and appropriations by the Southern California Edison Company, the San Joaquin water storage district, the Madera irrigation district, the San Joaquin Light & Power Corporation, Miller & Lux, Inc., and by other corporations and individuals. The defendants found it advisable to retain attorneys in order to properly protect themselves against the threatened invasion of their rights, and in 1924 they retained plaintiffs for that purpose and for the purpose of recovering damages for any unlawful interference with their interests. The terms of this original contract of employment are not important on this appeal, for reasons that will presently appear. The plaintiffs, as attorneys for the defendants, started proceedings against the chief diverter and appropriator, the Southern California Edison Company, to enjoin that company from diverting and appropriating any water to the injury of defendants' riparian rights. This action will hereafter be referred to as the injunction suit. After a long and arduous trial the plaintiffs secured an injunction in defendants' favor. From this judgment the Southern California Edison Company appealed to this court. While the appeal was pending, the plaintiffs and defendants herein entered into a written contract on October 8, 1925, purporting to fix the fee of plaintiffs for the legal services rendered and to be rendered in protecting defendants' riparian rights. It is the interpretation of this contract that is involved in this action.

Under the terms of this contract the plaintiffs defended the judgment on appeal in the injunction suit and secured in this court an affirmance of the judgment of the trial court. Herminghaus v. Southern California Edison Co., 200 Cal. 81, 252 P. 607. The Edison Company then appealed to the United States Supreme Court, but the plaintiffs succeeded in securing a dismissal of the appeal on the ground of lack of jurisdiction.

Immediately after the affirmance by this court of the judgment in the injunction suit on December 24, 1926, the Southern California Edison Company filed two actions, one in Madera county and one in Fresno county, for the purpose of condemning a portion of defendants' water rights. These actions will hereafter be referred to as the condemnation suits. The first of these actions was set for trial in October, 1927. Under the terms of their contract of employment, plaintiffs took the necessary steps for the proper defense of these actions, and handled all matters incident thereto until the same were dismissed under circumstances to be discussed later. In the meantime, and during and after the pendency of the appeal in the injunction suit, the Southern California Edison Company, by an arrangement with the defendants consummated by plaintiffs as attorneys, made payments to the defendants herein of sums of money totaling $260,000, the consideration for which was the temporary waiver by defendants of their right to complain of the use of the water by the Southern California Edison Company, contrary to the provisions of the injunction. From this $260,000 defendants paid plaintiffs the sum of $35,000 on account of attorneys' fees, upon which point there is no dispute on this appeal.

As previously stated, the first of the condemnation suits was set for trial in October, 1927. On or about October 17th, P. H. Bottoms, the official representative and agent of the Herminghaus people, without the attendance of any of their counsel, and without consulting them as to his purpose, sold to the Southern California Edison Company the en-ture holdings of the Herminghaus people on the San Joaquin river. During the conference with the representatives of the Edison Company, Bottoms made no attempt to consult with plaintiffs, and in no way informed them of the proposed sale until after it was consummated. By the terms of this sale defendants received the sum of $873,200 in cash for the property on the basis of $50 an acre for the acreage involved. If this sum be added to the sum already received, the total is $1,133,200. As a part of this deal the defendants gave a full release to the Southern California Edison Company and conveyed the property to its subsidiary, the Edison Securities Company, and then instructed plaintiffs to participate in the dismissal of the condemnation suits. It should here be noted that it is agreed between the parties to this appeal that, in consummating the above deal with the Southern California Edison Company, neither the defendants nor the Edison people made any attempt to allocate any part of the purchase price to water or water rights alone; the entire sum having been paid for the land and water rights together, or, more correctly, for the riparian land. The sale of the entire property, of course, terminated plaintiffs' employment; there no longer being any water rights of the defendants to protect. Furthermore, it is conceded by defendants that this termination of the contract of employment amounted to complete performance on the part of plaintiffs.

The contract of employment herein involved was, as before stated, entered into on October 8, 1925, after the employment of plaintiffs had begun and while the relationship of attorney and client existed. The final draft of the contract was prepared by plaintiffs, and there can be but little doubt that both parties thereto were attempting to provide, and intended to provide, for all contingencies that might thereafter arise. The contract first provides that the water rights of the defendants are in danger by diversions and appropriations, both threatened and actual, by certain enumerated corporations and individuals, and that it has therefore become necessary for defendants to employ attorneys to represent them in protecting and preserving their water rights; that the plaintiffs have already instituted and successfully prosecuted the injunction suit in the trial court, which case is now on appeal, and then continues as follows:

"Now, therefore, it is agreed as follows:

"(1) That the parties of the first part [defendants herein] do hereby retain and employ the parties of the second part [plaintiffs herein] as their attorneys in the matter aforesaid for the period of five years from the date hereof unless said matters are sooner accomplished or otherwise terminated by mutual consent and also so long after said date as may be necessary to complete any unfinished litigation which is in good faith being prosecuted at said expiration date, whether for parties of the first part as plaintiffs or defendants.

"(2) Parties of the second part agree to commence and prosecute any further action or actions that may be necessary or advisable to fully protect the interests of said first parties, and, if so advised, will at the request of said first parties appear in and prosecute a suit now pending in the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the county of Fresno wherein parties of the first part are plaintiffs and Madera Irrigation District is defendant.

"(3) Said second parties also agree to defend for first parties any and all condemnation suits or other proceedings that may be entered against them or either of them respecting the said water rights of said river. In other words, the second parties agree to fully represent said first parties as attorneys during the life of this contract in any and all matters affecting the legal status of the water rights that belong to or appertain to the said above mentioned and described lands.

"(4) The said second parties in this behalf agree to give their personal attention to said work; to exercise their best skill and ability in the pursuance thereof and to in every way and in good faith protect to their utmost the rights of the first parties in and to said San Joaquin river and its tributaries.

"(5) It is expressly understood and agreed that this contract be and is unassignable.

"(6) For the services of parties of the second part hereunder, both past and future, it is agreed that the same shall be as follows and not otherwise, to-wit:

"That in case of sale of said property by parties of the first part prior to a decision by the Supreme Court of the State of California upon the appeal now pending therein, the compensation of said second parties shall be the sum of eighty-five thousand ($85,000) dollars and no more." [It is to be noted that this compensation clause could not possibly apply, because the termination of plaintiffs' employment occurred after, and not prior to, a decision by this court in the injunction suit.]

"If the above referred to judgment now being appealed from is substantially affirmed but not otherwise and thereafter a sale is made of said property by parties of the first part, the parties of the second part shall receive a minimum compensation of one hundred thousand (100,000) dollars, or in lieu of such sum may at their option require for their said services thirty percent of all sums received on such sale in excess of eight hundred thousand ($800,000) dollars and less than two million (2,000,000) dollars." [This clause will hereafter be referred to as the sales clause.]

"However, in case any condemnation suit or suits are prosecuted against said parties of the first part and damages are collected by said parties of the first part by compromise or by judgment, compensation for said parties of the second part for their services shall be as follows, and not otherwise:

"Twenty (20) percent of all sums realized in excess of one hundred thousand (100,000) dollars and less than two hundred thousand (200,000) dollars.

"Twenty-five (25) percent of all sums realized in excess of two hundred thousand (200,000) dollars and less than three hundred thousand (300,000) dollars.

"Thirty (30) percent of all sums in excess of three hundred thousand (300,000) dollars.

"It being, however, understood and agreed that if less than one hundred thousand (100,000) dollars is recovered by and paid to parties of the first part, nothing shall be paid to parties of the second part on account of said services." [This clause will hereafter be referred to as the condemnation clause.]

Defendants strenuously contend that since the property was sold to the Edison people, the plaintiffs' compensation should be measured by the provisions of the sales clause, supra, and not otherwise. It is therefore defendants' contention that the compensation of plaintiffs should be $100,000, and no more, of which $35,000 admittedly has been paid. The defendants at all times have been and are now willing to pay the balance of $65,000 for a full release of all of plaintiffs' claims under the contract. On the other hand, the plaintiffs, with equal vigor, contend that the sale of the property to the Edison Securities Company was, in effect, no more than a compromise and settlement of all condemnation proceedings, and for that reason the condemnation clause, supra, governs the compensation. Under this provision of the contract, if the $260,000 already received by defendants is included as part of the compromise, the compensation of plaintiffs would be $294,900, plus interest, less the $35,000 already received, and less the sum of $500 which appellants paid to an outside attorney. This would fix respondents' fee at $259,460 (erroneously found by the trial court to be $259,400), plus interest; or, using the figures of the trial court, the sum due respondents at the time of judgment was $273,018.50. This was the amount of the verdict of the trial court.

The complaint sets forth three causes of action, only the first being important on this appeal, the plaintiffs electing to rely on this count at the trial. This cause of action sets forth the contract and alleges that the sale of the property was a compromise and settlement of the condemnation suits. During the course of the trial the plaintiffs were permitted to amend this count of the complaint to the effect that the sale was only a disguise for a compromise and settlement of the condemnation suits, thus, in effect, setting forth bad faith. The defendants, in their answer, contend that no compromise was in fact entered into, the transaction being no more than a sale of the property. They deny any bad faith.

The case proceeded to trial before the court and jury. During the course of the trial, the court, with the approval of both parties, stated to the jury that there were but two issues of fact involved, to-wit: (1) The proper application in determining the amount of fee due the plaintiffs of the $260,000 paid the defendants by the Southern California Edison Company for permission to violate the injunction; (2) whether the termination of the condemnation suits in the manner already set forth was a compromise within the meaning of the contract. After both parties had closed their evidence, the plaintiffs made a motion for a directed verdict for the full amount prayed for in the complaint, plus interest, and less the sum of $500, which amount defendants had paid to an outside attorney. The trial judge granted plaintiffs' motion, and instructed the jury to return a verdict for plaintiffs in the amount specified, together with interest. The jury thereupon returned a verdict in favor of plaintiffs in the sum of $273,018.50. From this judgment defendants prosecute this appeal.

Appellants' principal contentions can be summarized as follows: (1) That, since the entire property of appellants was "sold," the fee of respondents should be measured by the sales clause of the contract, which fixes the fee at $100,000; that since respondents have already admittedly received the sum of $35,000, the balance due is $65,000. (2) That even if the condemnation clause applies, the judgment must be reversed because that clause provides that the fee shall be a percentage based on the "damages" received by way of compromise or judgment in the condemnation suits, while the verdict of the jury is based on the selling price of the entire property, including the value of the land as distinguished from the value of the water rights, and including the value of one thousand acres of nonriparian land. In this connection appellants contend that the trial court was in error in excluding evidence offered by them of the value of the water rights involved in the condemnation suits. (3) That in the event that neither of the above theories is correct, then a situation not provided for in the contract has arisen, and the respondents must recover, if at all, upon a quantum meruit.

[1, 2] It is admitted that the contract here involved was entered into after the relationship of attorney and client had come into existence. In such cases the law is well settled that any ambiguity in the contract must be construed in favor of the client and against the attorney. Reynolds v. Sorosis Fruit Co., 133 Cal. 625, 630, 66 P. 21; Bennett v. Potter, 180 Cal. 736, 740, 183 P. 156; Boardman v. Christin, 65 Cal. App. 413, 418, 224 P. 97. However, there is no rule of law which makes such contracts void, and, if certain, clear, and unambiguous, they will be enforced as any other contract. The rule of interpretation above noted cannot be used to frustrate the obvious intent of the parties. See Pinto v. Seely, 22 Cal. App. 318, 326, 135 P. 43.

[3] The first question to be considered is whether, under the facts as herein stated, the sales clause or the condemnation clause applies. Upon reading the contract, we agree with the trial court that the contract clearly and unambiguously provides for the present situation, and that the condemnation clause, and not the sales clause, applies. This is obvious from the very nature of the compensation provisions of the contract. The parties carefully provided for every contingency that might arise, with a corresponding provision for compensation. The provisions are clearly progressive and exclusive. Thus, if the property was sold before affirmation of the injunction suit, respondents were to receive a fee of $85,000. Upon affirmation, however, that clause no longer applied, and the sales clause, providing for a fee of $100,000 in the case of a sale after affirmation, applied. When the defense of the condemnation suits was undertaken by respondents, the condemnation provision of the contract applied, to the exclusion of all other clauses of the contract. That this is the proper interpretation of the contract clearly appears from its express terms, from the practical construction placed on it by the parties, and from an application of the test of reasonable construction, which is, inherently, the fundamental test in the interpretation of all contracts.

The contract expressly provides that once the condemnation suits have been "prosecuted," the condemnation clause, and no other, shall be used in fixing respondents' fee. That clause starts with the word "however" and provides that if condemnation suits are prosecuted against the defendants and damages are collected by compromise or judgment, the compensation "shall be as follows, and not otherwise." The word "however" and the phrase "and not otherwise" are clearly terms of exclusion. They are undoubtedly used as a contrast with the previous compensation provisions, and to exclude them if the condemnation clause applied.

In the case of Lewis' Appeal, 18 Pa. (6 Harris) 318, the court was interpreting the meaning of the word "however" as used in a will. The will in question, after devising property to five children of the niece of the testatrix, provided (page 319 of 18 Pa.): "If one or more of the said children should happen to die before their mother, without leaving any children, the share of such child or children so dying shall be equally distributed among the survivors of the said brothers and sisters; if, however [italics added], such child or children so dying shall leave a child or children, such child or children shall be entitled to their parent's share." Concerning the meaning of the term "however," the court had the following to say (page 325 of 18 Pa.): "'However' is most emphatic here, if we keep up the connection of the thought. It indicates an alternative intention, a contrast with the previous clause, and a modification of it under other circumstances. It is thus—I do not however so dispose of the survivorship in the case of those who die leaving children, but such children shall take the share which their parent, if surviving, would have taken." The meaning of the phrase "and not otherwise" in a statute was under consideration in the case of County of Plumas v. Wheeler, 149 Cal. 758, 87 P. 909. Concerning its meaning this court said (page 761 of 149 Cal., 87 P. 909, 910): "Section 3366 of the Political Code, enacted in 1901, provides that 'boards of supervisors of the counties of the state * * * shall, in the exercise of their police powers, and for the purpose of regulation, as herein provided, and not otherwise, have power to license all and every kind of business not prohibited by law, and transacted and carried on within the limits of their respective jurisdictions. * * *' The effect of this statutory provision was to cut off the power, theretofore residing in boards of supervisors under the county government act * * * to collect a license tax for revenue. 'The words "not otherwise" curtail and cut off all power boards of supervisors theretofore had to issue licenses and charge therefor as a revenue measure. * * *' Ex parte Pfirrmann, 134 Cal. 143, 66 P. 205." It was in this sense that the terms under discussion were undoubtedly used in the contract herein involved. This view is made even clearer by other considerations.

[4] It is a fundamental rule of interpretation that the practical construction placed upon a contract by the parties is admissible to explain any ambiguity that may exist. Keith v. Electrical Engineering Co., 136 Cal. 178, 181, 68 P. 598. If any ambiguity did exist in the contract under consideration, which fact we do not concede, such ambiguity has been fully explained by the construction of the contract by the parties themselves, who, by their actions, have clearly shown that in their opinion the condemnation clause had attached. As stated above, after the contract was entered into, and both before and after the condemnation suits had been started and while those suits were pending, there were various divisions of money between appellants and respondents. The money so divided was not for the sale of any riparian land or riparian rights, nor was it technically for damages. It was received by appellants as consideration for permission given the Southern California Edison Company to violate the injunction. The amount over a period of years totaled $260,000, of which respondents were paid $25,000. This money was divided under the percentages provided for in the condemnation clause. A simple mathematical calculation will show that if $100,000 is deducted from the total thus received, as provided for in the condemnation clause, and the percentages provided for in that clause applied to the balance, the result will be $35,000. Moreover, Bottoms stated in several letters sent to respondents in which were enclosed checks as part of the payments aggregating $35,000, that the money thus received was being divided under the condemnation clause. The uncontradicted testimony of respondent Preston was to the same effect. This testimony is consistent only with the fact that both appellants and respondents understood that the condemnation provisions had become effective because of the commencement of the condemnation suits, and that the sales clause had been excluded from consideration.

Under another test, there can be no doubt that the condemnation clause of the contract had attached to the exclusion of the sales clause. If we apply the fundamental test of reasonableness (Civ. Code, § 1643; 6 Cal. Jur. 271, § 169), no other result can be reached than to hold that the compensation clauses were progressive and exclusive. A reading of the contract shows that the parties provided for all contingencies that might occur, and provided for them in the order they were likely to occur. Obviously, as each step in the proceedings was reached without a termination of the litigation, the respondents would be called upon to do more work, and, accordingly, as was just, fair, and reasonable, the compensation provided for became increasingly large. It was contemplated, as it eventually transpired, that condemnation suits would be brought after the affirmance of the injunction suit, if that should occur. At the time the contract was entered into, it could not be determined how many of these condemnation suits the respondents might be called upon to defend. Therefore, the contract expressly provided that the damages recovered in all of them should be added together and the percentages designated in the condemnation clause applied to the total. This was fair and reasonable. An interpretation of the contract that would permit appellants to refer back to the sales clause to fix the compensation, after the condemnation clause had attached and respondents had performed the additional work incident to defending the condemnation suits, would be an unjust and unreasonable construction.

From the foregoing analysis we conclude that the condemnation clause had attached, and that once that clause attached, the sales clause was entirely excluded from consideration. We reach this conclusion from the clear and certain language used in the contract, from the fact that the parties themselves have so interpreted the contract, and for the further reason that any other interpretation would be unjust and unreasonable.

[5, 6] Appellants' second contention is that the percentages in the condemnation clause shall be applied only to "damages" received by way of compromise or judgment in the condemnation suits, and that the jury in this case based its verdict upon the selling price of the entire property, including the value of the land as distinguished from the value of the water rights, and including the value of one thousand acres of nonriparian land. In this connection appellants contend that the trial court was in error in excluding evidence offered by them of the value of the water rights involved in the condemnation suits. We cannot follow the logic of these contentions. It seems clear to us that the practical result is the same whether the $873,200 is called "price," or whether it is called "damages." Whatever view is adopted, the sale of the entire property to the Edison Securities Company, from a practical standpoint, amounted to a compromise and settlement, not only of the two condemnation proceedings then pending, but of all condemnation proceedings that might later have been brought. This was the view of the trial court.

Furthermore, it clearly appears that it was the water rights that were primarily involved in the sale. From our familiarity with the record on appeal in the injunction case, and from an examination of the findings in that case introduced in evidence in this case, we know that the property, with the exception of the one thousand acres of nonriparian land, gains its principal value from the water rights inseparably connected therewith. When the Southern California Edison Company decided to purchase the property it was primarily interested in the water rights, and not in the land. The only object in purchasing the land was that it was, in the opinion of the purchaser, the most feasible way of securing the water rights. Mr. Brackenridge, the representative of the Southern California Edison Company who consummated the deal with Bottoms and who was produced as a witness for defendants, testified as follows on cross-examination:

"Q. What would you have paid, if anything, for the Herminghaus land without the water right? A. I suppose I have got to answer the question. It is self-evident that we would not have taken the ranch if they had given it to us without the water right.

"Q. It is perfectly valueless to you without the water right? A. Yes, we are not in the farming business.

"Q. And you took this land to get the water right? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And for no other reason? A. That is all." (Italics ours.)

Mr. Brackenridge further testified that one of the reasons that the land was purchased was that thereby the Southern California Edison Company would be substituted for the Herminghaus people so far as other diverters and appropriators were concerned. In fact, before Brackenridge closed the deal with Botoms he had secured a contract from the San Joaquin water storage district to sell them part of the water right for $265,000. Appellants constantly refer to "water rights" as if such rights existed separate and distinct from the land. It must be remembered that whatever water rights the appellants possessed were wholly riparian in nature. Therefore there was no such thing as a water right separate and distinct from the land itself. Duckworth v. Watsonville, 150 Cal. 520, 526, 89 P. 338; Id., 158 Cal. 206, 216, 110 P. 927. The purchase price received was for riparian land, in which land and water were inseparably connected.

[7, 8] Even if the value of the water right could, for the purpose of the contract, be separated from the value of the land, it must be remembered that appellants, by their own acts, have forever rendered it impossible to distinguish in that particular sale what portion, if any, of the moneys received should be credited to the lands. Obviously, evidence of the value of the water rights involved in the condemnation suits was not admissible, nor, in fact, would evidence of the value of the entire water right have been admissible, for the reason that the contract provided for percentages upon what was received, not what should have been received. To have admitted such evidence would have been for the court to make a new and different contract for the parties. Neither the seller nor the purchaser valued the land separately. Whatever confusion exists, therefore, was due to the acts of the appellants in making such a sale without allocating a value to the rights upon which respondents' compensation was to be based. In such a situation the law is well settled that the party causing the intermixture must stand the loss. The Idaho, 93 U. S. 575, 23 L. Ed. 978. See, also, Huff v. Hardwick, 19 Colo. App. 416, 75 P. 593, where the situation was quite similar to the one involved here. In this case the appellants have, by their own act, converted the land and water into money, and the proportions received for each cannot be ascertained.

Another analogy exists in the law which appears to be applicable to the situation here involved. In actions for damages for infringement of a patent and an accounting of the profits, where the profit attributable to the use of the trademark cannot be segregated from the profit due to the merit of the goods, the law is well settled that the plaintiff is entitled to the entire profit. As was said in the Case of Dickinson v. O. & W. Thum Co. (C. C. A.) 8 F.(2d) 570, at page 573: "The infringer must account for the entire profits derived from the sale of the infringing goods. The recovery will not be limited to such amount as can be shown by direct and positive evidence to have resulted from the use of the infringing mark." In William Wrigley, Jr., Co. v. L. P. Larson, Jr., Co. (D. C.) 5 F.(2d) 731, at page 739, the court quoted with approval the following language from Graham v. Plate, 40 Cal. 593, 598, 6 Am. Rep. 639: "In sales made under a simulated trade-mark it is impossible to decide how much of the profit resulted from the intrinsic value of the commodity in the market, and how much from the credit given to it by the trade-mark. In the very nature of the case it would be impossible to ascertain to what extent he could have effected sales and at what prices, except for the use of the trade-mark. No one will deny that on every principle of reason and justice the owner of the trade-mark is entitled to so much of the profit as resulted from the use of the trade-mark * * * it is more consonant with reason and justice that the owner of the trade-mark should have the whole profit than that he should be deprived of any part of it by the fraudulent act of the defendant. It is the same principle which is applicable to a confusion of goods."

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment appealed from should be and is affirmed.

PRESTON, J., does not participate in the foregoing opinion.

Trial court was entitled to accept plaintiffs' testimony as true, and Supreme Court will likewise accept it as true.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1).

Findings on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed.

3. Contracts ⇨284(4).

Arbitrators' award, even if conclusive, requiring contractors to make changes demanded by owner, held not to preclude contractors' recovery; owner preventing fulfillment of award.

Evidence showed that contractors, when peremptorily notified by owner to stop work, were correcting defects set out in award, and that, contrary to owner's contention, such defects could be corrected by replacing defective materials without tearing down entire framework of house.

4. Contracts ⇨322(4).

That board of public works ordered unfinished house to be demolished did not prove defective workmanship, precluding contractors' recovery; noncompliance with building laws being due to owner's errors.

Evidence showed that, after controversy respecting manner of construction had arisen, building remained in uncompleted condition for almost two years, and that board of public works at that time ordered owner either to comply with building laws and proceed with construction, or cause building to be torn down.

5. Mechanics' liens ⇨231.

Materialmen held entitled to lien on land, notwithstanding house, because of owner's noncompliance with building laws, was completely demolished by order of board of public works.

6. Work and labor ⇨14(1).

Subcontractor furnishing concrete, although prevented from completing contract by owner's notifying principal contractors to stop work, could recover for work actually performed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Separate actions, consolidated for trial, by William McIntosh and another, copartners doing business under the fictitious name and style of McIntosh Brothers, by the Smith Lumber Company of San Francisco, and by Eugenia Massagli and another, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of G. Massagli & Company, against W. W. Funge, Jr., and others, with a cross-complaint by defendant named against plaintiff in the first-named action. From a joint judgment for plaintiffs defendant named appeals.

Affirmed.

Robert L. McWilliams, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Sylvester J. McAtee and Hartley F. Peart, both of San Francisco, for respondents McIntosh.

Carey & Gorfinkel, and Maurice R. Carey, all of San Francisco, for respondent Smith Lumber Co.

Bacigalupi, Elkus & Salinger, of San Francisco, for respondent G. Massagli & Co.

CURTIS, J.

This is an appeal by defendant from a joint judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiffs in three actions, originating in the same controversy, which had been consolidated for trial. These actions grew out of an alleged breach of contract for the construction of a two-story dwelling house in the residential district of San Francisco, known as St. Francis Wood. Due to a disagreement which arose between the defendant owner, W. W. Funge, Jr., and the principal contractors, McIntosh Bros., shortly after the commencement of building operations, the building was never completed. Action 173914 was begun by McIntosh Bros., the principal contractors, for the reasonable value of the services rendered and materials supplied to the defendant owner in the construction of said building and for the profit which would have been realized had the contract been completed. Action 171926 was commenced by Smith Lumber Company of San Francisco against McIntosh Bros., as defendants, for the agreed price of the lumber furnished by said company and used by McIntosh Bros., in the construction of said building, and against the owner, as codefendant, to foreclose a materialman's lien against the property. Action 174168 was instituted by G. Massagli & Co. against McIntosh Bros., as defendants for the agreed value of the services rendered and the materials furnished in the construction of the concrete work upon said building, and against the owner, as codefendant, to foreclose a mechanic's and materialman's lien against said property. A cross-complaint was filed by the defendant owner, W. W. Funge, Jr., against McIntosh Bros., in action 173914, for damages alleged to have resulted to said defendant by reason of the failure of McIntosh Bros. to furnish necessary labor and materials to complete in a workmanlike manner said dwelling house. Upon the consolidated trial of the three actions the court found in favor of the plaintiffs in the above-entitled actions that McIntosh Bros. were entitled to a judgment for $877 against the defendant W. W. Funge, Jr.; that Smith Lumber Company were entitled to a personal judgment of $731.20 against McIntosh Bros. and to have their lien in the sum of $674 foreclosed against the property; and that G. Massagli & Co. were entitled to a personal judgment of $476.80 against McIntosh Bros. and to have their lien in that sum foreclosed against the said property. From said judgment in favor of McIntosh Bros., and from those portions of the judgment which decree that the sums due Smith Lumber Company and G. Massagli & Co. shall be a lien against said property, the defendant owner appeals.

The circumstances which gave rise to this controversy, briefly stated, are as follows:

On February 11, 1926, appellant W. W. Funge, Jr., as owner, entered into a contract with William McIntosh and David McIntosh, doing business under the firm name and style of McIntosh Bros., for the construction of a building on appellant's lot in the city and county of San Francisco. The plans, drawings, and specifications were personally prepared by the owner, who was not, however, a licensed architect. The owner also acted as his own superintendent of construction. On February 24, 1926, McIntosh Bros. commenced work upon the construction of the building. Two subcontracts were entered into by McIntosh Bros., one contract with Smith Lumber Company for lumber to be furnished for the construction of said building, and the other contract with G. Massagli & Co. for the labor and materials used for all of the concrete work specified in the construction of said building. Differences arose between the owner and the principal contractors with reference to the construction of the building, which the owner claimed was not being constructed according to the plans and specifications, and on March 16, 1926, the owner gave notice to the contractors to discontinue work on the house. On March 29, 1926, he wrote to the General Contractors' Association of San Francisco, an organization of building contractors of San Francisco, complaining of faulty work and faulty materials being used in the construction of the building. The board of arbitration of said association, consisting of three members, made a personal inspection of the construction of the structure and of the workmanship and materials used and rendered its report in writing on April 1, 1926. The owner refused to accept this report and on April 12, 1926, filed his dissent with the association. The association thereupon made further inspection and investigation and on April 22, 1926, made a supplemental report and finding. In this supplemental report it was stipulated that a competent superintendent of construction should be employed by the owner. The owner refused to accede to this requirement, repudiated the report of the General Contractors' Association and refused to employ a superintendent of construction. The matter having come to a deadlock, McIntosh Bros., in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 10 of the contract, demanded that the matter be submitted to arbitration. In accordance with the provisions of the contract each of the parties selected one arbitrator and the report and findings of these arbitrators were made on August 13, 1926. On August 19, 1926, McIntosh Bros. notified the owner in writing that they accepted said report and offered to make any changes in the construction required by the report of the arbitrators. The contractors believed that it was possible for them to conform to the award by replacing certain pieces of lumber and strengthening others, and on August 30, 1926, they resumed work. The owner, on the other hand, insisted that in order to conform to the report of the arbitrators it would be necessary for the contractors to take down the frame to the first floor and entirely rebuild it. Upon the refusal of the contractors to tear down the frame, the owner refused to permit them to continue and on August 31, 1926, gave them formal notice to stop work. Thereafter on October 11, 1926, the plaintiff contractors instituted the first of these actions. The consolidated cases went to trial on November 3, 1927. However, the findings were not signed and judgment formally entered until July 30, 1928. During this interim, from the time the plaintiff contractors were notified to stop work on August 31, 1926, until April 14, 1928, the frame of the building stood unfinished, an eyesore to the district and a menace to the children of the neighborhood. On the latter date, the owner, pursuant to a resolution of the board of public works, had said building torn down and the concrete foundation broken up and removed. At the date, therefore, of the formal rendering of the judgment the building had been completely demolished and only the excavation of the basement remained.

The complaint of the plaintiff contractors alleged in substance the making of the contract; that plaintiffs commenced to furnish the necessary labor and materials and to perform the work in accordance with the plans and specifications of said contract; that a dispute arose respecting the true construction of said specifications and the sufficiency of the performance of said work; that two arbitrators were selected to settle said dispute; that the plaintiffs accepted the decision of said arbitrators and so notified the defendant owner in writing; that plaintiffs thereafter commenced to again perform said contract but were notified by the defendant in writing that said contract was terminated.

The answer of the defendant owner denied that the plaintiffs furnished the necessary labor and materials in fulfillment of the contract; denied that plaintiffs accepted or were bound by the award of the arbitrators; and alleged that plaintiffs violated said award, disregarded its terms and provisions, and failed and refused to act in accordance with the provisions of said report. The answer further sets out in detail the various particulars in which the plaintiff contractors failed to comply strictly with the plans and specifications.

At the trial of the consolidated cases the criticisms and complaints of the owner were taken up individually and in detail. The evidence in the record shows that many of the criticisms of the owner were not fair in that the defects were either actually caused by the owner himself, or were due to deficiencies in the plans and specifications prepared by him. In some instances complaint was made by the owner that the contractor failed to perform certain work no mention of which was contained in the plans and specifications. In still other instances, the owner complained of the manner in which certain work had been performed although he had been present at the time of the performance and had made no protest at the time and had apparently acquiesced in the performance. Moreover, it appears that several of the apparently justifiable complaints of the owner were due to the fact that only the skeleton frame had been put up and the contractors had not had an opportunity to complete the work and thus supply the deficiencies complained of when they were notified by the owner to stop work. There is no testimony in the record which directly or by inference would indicate that the contractors willfully and deliberately used poor workmanship and defective materials in the building. On the contrary, there is evidence which indicates that an honest effort was made to construct the building in a satisfactory manner. This is evidenced by the fact that, according to the testimony of several witnesses, a better grade of flooring was furnished by the contractors than was called for by the specifications and further by the expressed willingness of the contractors to comply with the terms of the arbitration award although this award required additional work and material not called for by the specifications.

[1, 2] We deem it unnecessary to incumber the reports with any further statement of the details of the controversy. Findings were made with reference to each of the complaints and criticisms and were to the effect that such complaints and criticisms were unwarranted and unjustified. These findings were supported by evidence in the record. True, in many instances, the supporting evidence was the testimony of the plaintiffs to the actions. The lower court, however, was entitled to accept this testimony as true, and upon appeal this court will likewise accept it as true. There is evidence in the record supporting the criticisms and complaints of the defendant owner, but this evidence at most only created a conflict in the evidence which was resolved by the trial court in favor of the plaintiff contractors. This phase of the case, therefore, resolves itself into a mere question of a conflict in the evidence which must be settled by a reiteration of the well-established rule that where there is conflicting evidence the findings of the trial court will not be disturbed on appeal.

[3] Appellant contends that any testimony adduced at the trial with reference to his specific complaints and criticisms is beside the point for the reason that the parties to the contract were bound by the contract to abide by the terms of the arbitrators' award. He insists that the arbitrators' award is conclusive proof that his complaints were well-founded, and that he was justified in peremptorily notifying the contractors to stop work. Conceding, for the sake of argument, that appellant's contention that the arbitrators' award is conclusive proof that certain of his complaints and criticisms were well founded, we are confronted by the finding of the trial court to the effect that at the time the plaintiff contractors were notified by the owner to stop work they were correcting the defects set out in the award. This finding of the trial court is supported by evidence in the record. Moreover, there is substantial evidence in the record that it was possible to correct such defects by replacement of defective materials and workmanship without the tearing down of the entire framework of the building. This evidence is embodied in the testimony of Mr. Thurston, one of the arbitrators, and Mr. Monk, chairman of the board of arbitration of the General Contractors' Association of San Francisco. The appellant insisted that the frame should be torn down and rebuilt. The question of whether the contractors were carrying out the terms of the award was a question to be determined not by any of the parties to the controversy but by the arbitrators. Inasmuch as the appellant owner gave peremptory notice to the contractors to stop work, thereby depriving them of the opportunity of attempting to rectify the defects by replacing the defective material, the owner eliminated the possibility of arbitration from the controversy and forced the contractors to seek the forum of the courts for a decision of the dispute as to whether they were actually carrying out the terms of the arbitrators' award. In that forum the decision was in favor of the contractors.

It is apparent from the foregoing discussion that if the original controversy between the owner and contractors be inquired into, the findings of the trial court, supported by evidence, are in favor of the contractors, and if the award of the arbitrators be conceded to be binding upon the parties, the findings of the trial court relative thereto, supported by evidence, are in favor of the contractors, and that in either event the judgment on appeal must be affirmed.

[4] Appellant advances the argument that the fact that the building subsequent to the trial was torn down by order of the board of public works is conclusive proof that the work performed by the contractors was of no value to him and that as he received no benefit therefrom the contractors are not entitled to recover judgment. This, of course, does not follow. This argument is valid only if the resolution of the board of public works was due to derelictions of the contractors or defects in the work performed by them. If the order to remove the building was not due to the fault of the contractors, then the fact that the building was subsequently torn down, whether voluntarily by the owner or involuntarily pursuant to an order of the board of public works, has no bearing upon the question of whether or not the contractors are entitled to recover against the owner. It is to be noted that the direction of the board of public works was in the alternative, "to comply with building laws and to proceed with said construction of building in accordance with the plans filed with the Board of Public Works * * * or cause the same to be torn down." The principal obstacle to the carrying out of the alternative order of the board of public works was the fact that the foundation of the house had not been set far enough back on the lot to comply with the building restrictions of the district. It was the finding of the trial court, supported by evidence in the record, that the mislocation of the foundation was due to an error on the part of the owner in measuring the distance from the curb line to the front line of the house. There is testimony in the record of both Mr. McIntosh and of a workman that while Mr. McIntosh held the end of the tape at the curb line, the owner held the other end of the tape and designated the front line of the house. The other obstacle to the finishing of the house was the fact that the walls of the foundation did not extend twelve inches above the ground. There is evidence in the record that the ordinance which it is alleged specified such requirement did not apply to the district in which the house was situated. However that may be, the lower court expressly found that inasmuch as the plans and drawings furnished by the owner specified that the height of the concrete foundation should be twenty inches and provided that the concrete foundation should extend not less than twelve inches into the ground, a strict compliance with the plans and specifications made it impossible to extend the foundation twelve inches in the ground and at the same time twelve inches above the ground. It will thus be seen that the owner's inability to carry out the alternative order of the board of public works was not due to any fault of the contractors, but was due to his own errors.

[5] Appellant also insists that by the complete demolition of the building on April 14, 1928, the liens of the Smith Lumber Company and G. Massagli & Co. were lost and the decree of foreclosure which was formally rendered on July 30, 1928, was improperly rendered. The fact of the demolition of the building was presented to the lower court on the motion for a new trial which was denied. There is a conflict of opinion in the decisions of the various states as to whether a mechanic's lien attaches to land where the improvement giving rise to the lien has been destroyed or removed. California has adopted the so-called Pennsylvania rule which holds that the destruction of the building, without fault of the owner, before a notice of lien is filed, does away with the right to a lien, no lien attaching to the vacant site. Humboldt Lumber Mill Co. v. Crisp, 146 Cal. 686, 81 P. 30, 106 Am. St. Rep. 75, 2 Ann. Cas. 811; Pilstrand v. Greenamyre, 34 Cal. App. 799, 168 P. 1161; Kern v. San Francisco Co., 19 Cal. App. 157, 124 P. 862; Watson v. Alta Investment Co., 12 Cal. App. 560, 108 P. 48. In the instant case, however, another important factor, determinative of the question in our opinion, enters into consideration. In the cases above cited the buildings were accidentally destroyed by fire without any fault on the part of either the owner or the contractor. And in Humboldt Lumber Mill Co. v. Crisp, supra, and Watson v. Alta Investment Co., supra, it was specifically stated as a premise to the conclusion reached that the building had been destroyed without any fault of the owner. The Pennsylvania cases, which are cited with approval by the California authorities, likewise involve situations in which the buildings were destroyed by fire, tornado or flood. As the building here was torn down pursuant to a resolution of the board of public works, perhaps it cannot be correctly said that it was voluntarily destroyed by the act of the owner. However, as before noted, the resolution of the board of public works was in the alternative and the inability of the owner to comply with the alternative order and complete the building was due to his own error in locating the front line of the building and the mistakes in his own plans and specifications. In the final analysis, therefore, the destruction of the building was due to the fault of the owner. In Johnson v. Smith, 97 Cal. App. 752, 276 P. 146, 147, it was held that the fact that hardwood flooring sold by plaintiff to a contractor was torn out by order of the architect employed by the defendant owners because of the defective manner in which the flooring was laid did not defeat plaintiff's right to a mechanic's lien. The court said, "The fact that by the act of the owner of the building the 'materials furnished' may have been rendered useless should not defeat the rights of an innocent materialman." The reasoning therein enunciated is of compelling force and is applicable to the present case. The liens, therefore, were in existence at the date of the judgment of foreclosure herein, and that judgment was proper.

There is no merit in the contention that the judgment in favor of the Smith Lumber Company for $674.70 is too large by reason of the fact that some of the material delivered on the job was not actually used in the construction of the building. The record clearly shows that the lower court was cognizant of this fact and that a proper reduction was made of the value of the lumber not incorporated in the building from the total price of the lumber delivered.

[6] Although it is true that under the contract G. Massagli & Co. was obligated to construct the foundation, basement floors and walks, garage floor, and cement steps in addition to rat-proofing the building, and that the only work performed by the company was the putting in of the foundation and the rat-proofing, nevertheless the failure of the company to complete the contract was caused by the action of the owner in notifying the principal contractors to stop work. Under such circumstances the company is entitled to recover for the work actually performed. It should be noted that the testimony of Albert Massagli as to the value of the work was limited to the value of the work actually performed.

It should also perhaps be noted that the contention of appellant that the lien of G. Massagli & Co. had been filed too late was subsequently abandoned.

Judgment is affirmed.

RICHARDS, J.

Petitioner applied for a writ of certiorari in order to test the jurisdiction of the superior court of the state of California, in and for the County of Kern, to appoint a special administrator in the matter of the estate of Louis V. Olcese, deceased, without notice of hearing upon the application for such order and after an appeal had been perfected from a prior order appointing a general administrator in the matter of said estate. The facts of this family controversy, in so far as they relate to the appointment of the general administrator and the appeal therefrom, are fully set forth in our opinion reversing the order made therein, filed on August 30, 1930, and in which matter our decision has become final through the issuance of a remittitur therein. Estate of Olcese, 291 P. 193.

[1-3] We are satisfied that the order of the superior court herein sought to be reviewed was void as beyond the jurisdiction of the court to make such order. Prior to the year 1921, under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to the appointment and powers of a special administrator, there was no requirement for an order for the giving of notice on application for the appointment of a special administrator, or for any notice to be given prior to such appointment. By an amendment however, to sections 1412 to 1415, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure, made in the latter year, such notice of the application for such appointment "as the court may deem reasonable" was required to be given. Section 1412 as thus amended (St. 1921, p. 536, § 1), reads as follows: "The appointment may be made at any time upon such notice to such of the persons interested in the estate as the court may deem reasonable. After the person appointed has given bond, the clerk must issue special letters of administration to such person." Under the amendment to section 1415 of said Code (St. 1921, p. 536, § 3), the powers of a special administrator were, under certain conditions, greatly enlarged, the provisions of said amendment reading, in part, as follows: "When a special administrator is appointed pending determination of a contest of a will instituted prior to the probate thereof, or pending an appeal from an order appointing, suspending or removing an executor or administrator, such special administrator shall have the same powers, duties and obligations as a general administrator, and the letters of administration issued to him shall recite that such special administrator is appointed with the powers of a general administrator."

It is plain to perceive why, in view of the thus enlarged powers of special administrators under the foregoing conditions, some reasonable notice to the persons interested in the estate prior to the making of the appointment of such special administrator with such enlarged powers should be required. The requirement of section 1412 of said Code that such reasonable notice must be given cannot, by any stretch of construction, be held to mean that no notice whatever of the application for such appointment or of the hearing thereon shall be required. The appointment of a special administrator is a special proceeding, and the jurisdiction of the probate court to entertain an application for such appointment must be strictly construed in order to give to such court jurisdiction to make the same. In the instant case not only was the giving of such notice not provided for, but in the order of the court appointing such administrator it was expressly provided that no such notice was to be required or given; the order of the court in that respect reading as follows: "Whereas, in the judgment and opinion of the court no notice of the application for this order is necessary, and such notice is now hereby dispensed with. Now, therefore, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that * * * on application of said Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association, said Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association is hereby appointed special administrator of the estate of L. V. Olcese, deceased, and by reason of the pendency of such appeal, shall have as such special administrator the same powers, duties and obligations as a general administrator." The authorities cited by the respondents herein in support of the making and entry of the foregoing order have no application to the situation herein presented, and the specious argument of the respondents in attempted support of such order is, in our opinion, unfounded in reason and of no avail.

It is ordered upon the hearing on the alternative writ of review issued herein that the proceedings of the probate court in the matter of the appointment of said special administrator and the order appointing the same shall be, and they are hereby, annulled.

PEOPLE v. PAINETTI et al.
Cr. 3317.

Supreme Court of California.
Oct. 16, 1930.

Criminal law ⇨200(4).

Prosecution for violation of "Still Act" held not barred by prior convictions of "unlawful possession" and "unlawful manufacture" of liquor under "Wright Act"; offenses being separate and distinct (St. 1927, p. 497, § 1; St. 1921, p. 79).

St. 1927, p. 497, § 1, makes the ownership or possession of a still or stilling device, intended for use in the manufacture and production of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes, a felony. St. 1921, p. 79, punishes unlawful possession or unlawful manufacture of intoxicating liquor as misdemeanors.

Jesse R. Shafer, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie and Lionel B. Browne, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM.

The defendants herein were charged with and convicted of a felony, consisting in the violation of an act of the Legislature adopted in 1927 (Stats. 1927, c. 277, p. 497), which provides that "any person whether acting in his own behalf or as the agent, servant, officer or employee of any person, firm, association or corporation, who shall be the owner of or have any interest in or who shall operate or cause to be operated or knowingly have in his possession or control, any still, still worm, still cap, still condenser or stilling device of any kind, designed, used or intended for use in the manufacture or production of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes, shall be guilty of a felony. Section 1.

When the cause was called for trial, the defendants entered, among other pleas, a plea of "once in jeopardy." In attempted support of this plea, it was shown upon the trial that these two defendants had previously been charged with and convicted of one or more misdemeanors, consisting of (1) the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, and (2) the unlawful manufacture of intoxicating liquor. It further appeared upon the trial of the felony charge that the acts of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor and unlawful manufacture of intoxicating liquor were committed at the same time and place as that designated in the information and shown upon the trial of the felony charge as being the time and place when said felony, consisting in the ownership and illegal operation of a still, was charged with having been committed. The trial court upon such trial directed the jury to find against the defendants upon their pleas of prior conviction and former jeopardy.

It is now contended by defendants that the trial court was in error in so doing. We are of the opinion that the trial court was entirely correct in so doing, since the alleged misdemeanors of which the defendants had theretofore been convicted, consisting as they did merely in the "unlawful possession" of intoxicating liquor and in the "unlawful manufacture" of intoxicating liquor, were separate and distinct offenses from that greater offense provided for in the "Still Act" of 1927, which makes the ownership or possession of a still intended for use in the manufacture and production of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes a felony.

The cases of People v. Brannon, 70 Cal. App. 225, 233 P. 88, and People v. Clemett, 208 Cal. 142, 280 P. 681, relied upon by defendants, have no application to the instant situation. In the latter case particularly, both trials were conducted under the provisions of the "Still Act," and this court properly held that the possession and control of a still and the operation of the same still upon the same date constituted but a single offense. This case is not parallel to the case at bar, wherein the defendants were charged in the municipal court with a mere misdemeanor, consisting of the unlawful possession and manufacture of intoxicating liquor, which are offenses under the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), having no necessary connection with the ownership, possession, or operation of a still as distinguished from the felony or felonies provided for in the "Still Act," which makes the ownership, possession, and operation of a still a felony.

The judgment and order appealed from herein should be and are affirmed.

PRESTON, J.

Plaintiff seeks by this action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him as the result of a collision between an automobile in which he was riding as a guest and defendant company's autotruck, operated by its employee, the defendant Vogel.

It is not necessary to detail the facts surrounding the actual happening of the accident, as the evidence, beyond any shadow of a doubt, establishes the undeniable negligence of said truck driver and the fact that plaintiff suffered severe and permanent injuries. Defendant company interposed the defense that said driver was not acting within the scope of his employment at said time, but was returning from an errand of his own. The jury found for plaintiff, assessing damages against defendant Vogel in the sum of $11,000, but further found in favor of defendant company. Judgment was entered upon this verdict. Plaintiff now appeals in an endeavor to have liability imposed against defendant company as well as against defendant employee. The contentions upon appeal relate solely to the question of whether the said driver was at the time of the accident acting within the scope of his employment by defendant company. The facts bearing upon this issue, as shown by the evidence, will now be set forth:

Defendant Vogel as truck driver, was employed by defendant company generally to make deliveries from its store to the residences of purchasers; his usual working hours were from 7:30 a. m. to 5:30 p. m., during the six days of the week from Monday to Saturday, inclusive. The truck belonged to the company, but he was permitted to garage it at his home and to use it in traveling to and from his work. He did not always keep within his regular hours of employment; prior to the accident, on many occasions when deliveries were heavy, he had worked overtime and at night, and once or twice he had even made deliveries on Sunday. On the Thursday preceding the accident, he left the battery of the car at McCarty's garage to be recharged, had a rented battery installed therein, and found that the generator was in need of repair. The garage man told him to return Sunday, at which time the charged battery would be ready to replace and he would also have a special man on hand to repair the generator. It was the driver's custom to have minor repairs made on the car himself, but to have his employer authorize the expenditure of any items over 50 cents or a dollar. On Thursday afternoon, therefore, he reported the condition of the battery and generator at the store and secured authority to proceed under his arrangement with the garage man. Defendant company, of course, was to pay for the rental of the battery, and, if he failed to call at the garage on Sunday it would mean that the company would be charged with an extra day's battery rental.

On Sunday morning however, he did not proceed directly to the garage. He was not supposed to use the truck for his own purposes, but nevertheless he and his brother-in-law drove in it from his home to the Athenian Nile Club, a distance of 2.5 miles, where they secured a cabinet belonging to the brother-in-law; from the club they proceeded to the brother-in-law's home, passing the said garage en route, a distance of 4.1 miles from the club to the garage and 1.1 miles from the garage to the brother-in-law's home, where they left the cabinet. Defendant driver then started in the truck for the garage, with the intention of leaving it there for said repair work; the brother-in-law was to follow in his own machine, pick up said defendant at the garage, and drive him home. However, when the truck was an even mile from the house of the brother-in-law and one-tenth of a mile from the garage, the accident occurred.

Had the driver gone straight from his own home to the garage that morning, he might have proceeded over any of several routes, but by the most direct one he would have traveled a distance of only 1.7 miles, and would not have crossed the intersection where the accident took place, but in traveling any of the other routes he might have passed the place of the accident without unreasonable deviation. Had he, however, gone first to the home of his brother-in-law to make arrangements for the latter to follow him in his own machine to the garage in order to pick defendant up there and drive him home after leaving the truck for repairs then said defendant would have traveled approximately 3.9 miles, and would have crossed the intersection where the accident occurred while acting presumably in the interests of his employer in having said repair work done.

It is, of course, the contention of defendant company in denying liability that the accident happened while said driver was acting purely in the pursuit of his own personal business; that it occurred at a point on the driver's route of deviation, a point where he would not have been had he attended to his business in the manner authorized by the employer; that the case may not be brought within the rule governing that class of case where a slight or immaterial deviation from his path of duty will not affect the relation of a servant to his master; that here the deviation was so substantial as to amount in fact to an entire departure from the employer's business, and was sufficient to bring the cause within the rule announced in those cases wherein the employee is held to have abandoned his master's business. Further, defendant company urges that the jury had before it a map of the city of Oakland, upon which the routes traversed were delineated, and that evidence bearing upon this issue was submitted by both sides; that therefore the most that can be said here is that the question was properly submitted to the jury under appropriate instructions, and their finding in favor of defendant company is conclusive.

[1] Appellant, on the other hand, contends that it clearly appears as a matter of law from the undisputed evidence that said driver was engaged in discharging his employer's business; that at the time the accident occurred he was proceeding directly to and was within two or three blocks of, the garage for the express purpose of returning the rented battery, having the employer's battery reinstalled, and leaving the truck for repairs to the generator; that his personal mission with respect to the cabinet had absolutely terminated, for he had completed the delivery of it to his brother-in-law's home, and he was thereafter acting solely in the interests of his employer. What the driver did on the morning in question before he started to attend to his employer's business, appellant contends, would be no more material than to consider what he did thereafter.

The cases relied upon by the parties to throw light upon this issue (Kish v. California S. Auto. Ass'n, 190 Cal. 246, 212 P. 27; Brimberry v. Dudfield Lumber Co., 183 Cal. 454, 191 P. 894; Kruse v. White Bros., 81 Cal. App. 86, 253 P. 178; Dennis v. Miller Auto. Co., 73 Cal. App. 293, 238 P. 739; Aubel v. Sosso, 72 Cal. App. 57, 236 P. 319; and Gousse v. Lowe, 41 Cal. App. 715, 183 P. 295) are to some extent similar in fact, and are helpful, but they do not solve the question before us, because in the last analysis each case of this character must be determined upon its own peculiar facts and circumstances. In other words, after a careful consideration of these authorities, we are but led to agree with defendant company, that the issue was properly one for determination, under proper instructions, by the jury. As said in the case of Kruse v. White Bros., supra at page 93 of 81 Cal. App., 253 P. 178, 181: "Whether there has been a deviation so material or substantial as to constitute a complete departure is usually a question of fact. In some cases the deviation may be so marked, and in others so slight relatively, that the court can say that no conclusion other than that the act was or was not a departure could reasonably be supported; while in still others the deviation may be so uncertain in extent and degree in view of the facts and circumstances as to make the question of what inferences should be drawn from the evidence properly one for the jury. Healey v. Corkrill, 133 Ark. 327, L. R. A. 1918D, 115, 202 S. W. 229; Ritchie v. Waller, 63 Conn. 155, 38 Am. St. Rep. 361, 27 L. R. A. 161, 28 A. 29; Gousse v. Lowe, supra; Dennis v. Miller Auto. Co., 73 Cal. App. 293, 238 P. 739."

[2] It is, of course, true that as a matter of law a servant who deviates so far as to go some five miles on an errand for his relative is acting without the scope of his employment, and any tort committed by him prior to the resumption of his master's business is one for which the master is not liable. The question seems to be reduced then to this proposition: In this case, when did a question of fact arise as to the time and place when the servant re-entered the service of the master? If the servant had gone first to the brother-in-law's residence for the purpose of having the brother-in-law assist him in reaching home after depositing the truck at the garage, would not a question of fact arise as to whether he had abandoned his master's service, and would not this be true even though in so doing he passed en route the garage? If so, does not a similar question arise as to whether or not, on reaching his brother-in-law's home, he there resumed his master's business? Again, it is not disputed that the servant might have logically traveled either of three routes in going to the garage which might have taken him by the place of the accident. If, therefore, the servant might have passed the place of the accident while en route from his home to the garage, even though in so doing he might have deviated slightly from the most direct route, would not a question of fact have arisen as to whether or not he had abandoned his master's service? If this be so, does not an issue of fact arise as to whether or not at this point again the servant re-entered the employment of his master?

[3] If the foregoing propositions are sound, it seems to clearly follow that the trial judge, by certain of his instructions, encroached upon the province of the jury. In this connection, he gave the following instructions:

"If you believe from the evidence in this case that the defendant Vogel was authorized by his employer to operate the Dodge automobile in question only from his residence to the High Street Garage on the day of the accident, for the purpose of having the same repaired, and you further believe that for some purpose of his own, not connected with his employer's business, Vogel delivered a certain cabinet to a point beyond and past said garage and further distant from his home than he would have been required to travel in performing the duties authorized by his employer; and if you further find from the evidence that after delivering said cabinet and while returning from the place where said cabinet was delivered to the garage where the repairs were to be made to the automobile, but while still at a place where he would not have been except for the delivery of the cabinet, the accident occurred, I instruct you that your verdict must be in favor of the defendant Maxwell Hardware Company, for if an employee goes on an independent mission of his own at a point beyond and past the point where he was authorized to go by his employer, this mission does not terminate until he has returned to the point of departure or to a place where he would have been in the service of his employer. * * *

"* * * If in this case you believe from the evidence that the defendant Vogel in operating the Dodge automobile * * * drove the same for some purposes solely of his own to a point beyond and past that authorized by his employer, and at the time of the accident was still beyond and past a point authorized to be traveled by his employer although on his return journey to the point of deviation, then I instruct you that your verdict must be in favor of the defendant Maxwell Hardware Company."

"The Maxwell Hardware Company is not responsible for any act of the defendant Vogel in operating the Dodge automobile, which act took place at a locality to which Mr. Vogel had traveled in either going to or returning from a private mission of his own, provided you find that such locality was not one where his duties for the Maxwell Hardware Company would reasonably have required him to be."

The elements above referred to seem to be entirely excluded from said instructions. It is nowhere stated therein that the servant might not have been authorized to go with the truck to a point where he could procure a conveyance in which to return home. The instructions make a pivotal question of the fact that the servant passed the garage. They likewise exclude all reference to deviation. They presuppose that the servant had specific and definite instructions as to the route he must travel. They contain references to a point where "he would not have been," and thus make a geographical test of the matter determinative, as they exclude the possibility of a slight deviation and presuppose an inflexible route of travel. They exclude the possibility of authorized travel by any other than the most direct route. The last-quoted instruction seems to exclude the idea of authority on the part of the servant to go to the brother-in-law's home for assistance. The word "required" in said last-mentioned instruction seems to be inappropriate, as the word "permitted" would have been much better. On the whole we are convinced that, if the court had confined his instructions to the general principles of law and had not made a portion of the facts only the basis of certain instructions to the exclusion of the other facts and inferences in the case, the jury might have reached another result. This is manifested by the fact that the record shows that the jury were in fact confused as to their duty under the instructions as given by the court, for, after hearing the charge of the court, the jurors retired for deliberation at 4:30 p. m. At 5:35 p. m. they returned into court, and the following proceedings were had, after which, with the exception of a short time out for dinner, they deliberated until 9:45 p. m. before reaching a verdict:

"The Court: * * * I understand you have not agreed upon a verdict. * * * And that you desire some further information concerning instructions? * * * On what issue was it you desired further information on the instructions?"

"The Jurors: The fifty per cent. responsibility. There was two papers that you read about that, as near as we could explain it."

"The Court: You mean having to do with the scope of employment and whether or not the other defendant was or was not liable, the law relating to that point?"

"The Jurors: Yes, sir. We think you were about half through when you read it, the last paper, there were two papers. * * *

"The Court: * * * If the matter in which you are in doubt involves the instructions on the question of scope of employment, I feel it my duty at this time to repeat those instructions to you on that point. Is that the point on which you are at sea and are having difficulty. That is the point, is it?"

"A Juror: There was one paper that you read, perhaps there was about that much (indicating). * * *

"The Court: Well, did it have to do with that phase of the case?"

"The Juror: Yes."

"The Court: If that was to be re-read, I would think it only right to re-read all instructions on that point, although there were several of them. * * *

The court thereupon re-read to the jury the instructions numbered 23 to 40 inclusive, bearing upon the issue in question, and including the alleged erroneous instructions above quoted.

To our mind the above colloquy clearly indicates that said erroneous instructions may have constituted the very stumbling block which confronted the jurors in their endeavor to reach a fair verdict under the charge of the court.

Lastly, in support of the conclusion here announced, the case of Weber v. Wiley B. Allen Co., 64 Cal. App. 274, 221 P. 663, may be cited as directly in point. There, to an instruction requested by the employer to the effect that, if at the time of the accident the employee was on a trip for his own pleasure, the employer would not be liable, the trial court added language to the effect that, if the jury should find that the employee went on the trip to see a prospective purchaser on business of the employer, then the return trip at the time of the accident was a part of the business trip for the employer, the court held that the added language had the effect of charging the jury on a question of fact and reversed the judgment.

The judgment is reversed.

JOHNSTONE v. MORRIS.
S. F. 13374.

Supreme Court of California.
Oct. 28, 1930.

1. Partnership §104.

Law action cannot be maintained between partners with respect to partnership transactions, in absence of statute.

2. Partnership §104.

Mere fact of dissolution of partnership before bringing action does not remove bar against law actions between partners in absence of statute.

3. Partnership §104.

Where partner's interest is purchased under give or take proposition without complete accounting, and subsequently purchasing partner discovers misappropriation by other during partnership's existence, he may rescind and sue for accounting, or affirm and sue at law in deceit.

4. Partnership §104.

Where partner purchasing copartner's interest under give or take proposition subsequently discovers misappropriation by others and sues for damages, action is at law.

5. Jury §13(18).

Partnership §104.

That defendant, sued by former partner on note, in cross-claiming for damages for misappropriations by plaintiff during partnership's existence, asked incidentally for accounting to determine misappropriated amount, held not to make cross-action of equitable cognizance or deprive defendant of right to jury trial.

The essential nature of defendant's cross-action was for fraud and deceit in the alleged misappropriation, by plaintiff, of funds during the existence of the partnership. Defendant asked that court order accounting to determine exact amount misappropriated and for damages for alleged fraud.

6. Trial §11(2).

That many items are involved in determining damages does not deprive law courts of jurisdiction.

7. Accord and satisfaction §23.

Dissolution under give or take proposition held not accord and satisfaction of claim for partner's misappropriations, where injured partner was ignorant of misappropriations.

8. Set-off and counterclaim §34(2).

In action on note given for partnership interest, held defendant's claim for plaintiff's alleged misappropriations during partnership could be set up as counterclaim or cross-complaint (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 438, 442).

9. Evidence §177.

Where issue was misappropriations by partner, accountant's summary of partnership books held admissible (Code Civ. Proc. § 1855, subd. 5).

Accountant, a certified public accountant, testified that he had made examination of available books of concern, but that some of detail work was delegated to assistants, who worked under his supervision and control. Code Civ. Proc. § 1855, subd. 5, provides that evidence of the contents of a writing other than the writing itself is admissible when the original consists of numerous accounts or other documents, which cannot be examined in court without great loss of time, and the evidence sought therefrom is only the general result of the whole.

10. Trial ⇨139(1), 140(1).

Weight of evidence and credibility of witnesses is for jury.

11. Appeal and error ⇨1001(1).

Jury's determination, finding support in evidence, is conclusive on appeal.

12. Conspiracy ⇨47.

Conspiracy to defraud may be inferred from circumstances.

13. Conspiracy ⇨48.

Jury held entitled to determine, from circumstances, whether evidence that plaintiff and wife had not conspired to defraud defendant, though not directly contradicted, was inherently improbable.

14. Fraud ⇨58(1).

Evidence held to sustain inference of joint fraud by plaintiff and wife upon defendant by misappropriating partnership funds.

15. Appeal and error ⇨928(1).

Where appeal record does not include all given instructions, it will be assumed that entire charge showed no error and that imperfections in instructions were harmonized.

16. Trial ⇨260(5).

Where misappropriations were alleged and items and errors in partnership bookkeeping system were clearly presented, refusing instruction that faulty bookkeeping does not necessarily cause loss held proper.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by John Johnstone against M. E. Morris. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Hugh K. McKevitt, of San Francisco, for appellant.

James M. Hanley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is an action on a promissory note. The complaint alleges the execution and delivery of a promissory note by defendant to plaintiff in the sum of $16,800; that $4,250 has been paid thereon; that $12,550, together with interest and attorney's fees, are due, owing, and unpaid. The defendant's answer admits the execution and delivery of the note, admits that but $4,250 has been paid thereon, and by way of defense alleges that plaintiff has in his possession approximately $15,000 belonging to this defendant, and sets up the same by way of counterclaim. The defendant also filed a cross-complaint, in which it is substantially set forth that the above note was given by defendant to plaintiff upon the dissolution of a partnership theretofore existing between the parties; that on September 30, 1923, said partnership was dissolved by the defendant purchasing the plaintiff's interest for the sum of $26,800, $10,000 of which was paid in cash, the balance being represented by the promissory note above mentioned; that no extensive accounting was had at the time of dissolution; that during 1922 and 1923 the wife of plaintiff, Corrine Johnstone, acted as the bookkeeper of the partnership; that during that period plaintiff and his wife entered into a conspiracy to defraud the defendant by means of false entries in the account books and misappropriations of funds belonging to the partnership; that $30,000 is the approximate sum so misappropriated, of which one-half, or $15,000, belongs to this defendant by virtue of the partnership relationship. Defendant and cross-complainant prays that plaintiff take nothing by his action; that the court order an accounting to determine the exact amount misappropriated; that the defendant have as damages for the alleged fraud the difference between the amount misappropriated and the amount due on the note.

Plaintiff, in answering the cross-complaint, denied the existence of the conspiracy and fraud; alleged that during the entire existence of the partnership from 1917 to 1923, defendant was a silent partner in the business, that neither the public nor Corrine Johnstone knew that in fact defendant was a partner, that Corrine Johnstone, in the honest belief that her husband was the sole owner of the business, had invested $1,825 of her own money in the business and $1,200 belonging to her mother, admitted that in 1922 Corrine Johnstone withdrew $500 from the business, and admitted that she withdrew $3,500 in 1923, but alleged that the same was done without her husband's knowledge and consent, and in the honest belief that plaintiff, her husband, was the sole owner of the business.

Over the protest of plaintiff and at the request of the defendant the court granted a jury trial on all the issues. The jury rendered a verdict "in favor of the defendant M. E. Morris and against the plaintiff John Johnstone," thus in effect finding that plaintiff had misappropriated $12,550 of defendant's money, since that was the amount due on the note, and the verdict determines that plaintiff is entitled to nothing. From the judgment duly entered in accordance with the above verdict, plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

Appellant contended in the trial court, and, having been overruled there, contends on this appeal, that the cross-complaint of respondent, both by the issues raised and the relief demanded, appeals to the equity side of the court, and that on those issues a right to trial by jury does not exist. Furthermore, appellant contends that these equitable issues should first have been determined by the court without a jury. The basis of appellant's contentions in this respect is that the cross-complaint is fundamentally based on the partnership relation, and the action is essentially no more than an action for an accounting between partners.

[1-4] It is an almost, if not universally, accepted rule, that, in the absence of statutory permission, an action at law as distinguished from an action in equity cannot be maintained between partners with respect to partnership transactions. It is also well settled that the mere fact a dissolution of the partnership has taken place before the action is brought does not change the rule that no action at law can be maintained between partners. See exhaustive annotation, "Actions at Law between Partners and Partnerships," 21 A. L. R. 21, particularly at pages 34 and 84. But to this rule that no action at law will lie between partners, even after dissolution, there is one well-recognized exception. Where a partnership has been dissolved by one partner purchasing the other partner's interest under a give or take proposition without a full and complete accounting, and later the purchasing partner discovers that the selling partner was guilty of fraudulently hiding assets or misappropriating partnership funds during the existence of the partnership, the purchasing partner may elect to rescind the purchase and sue for an accounting in equity, or he may affirm the purchase and sue at law for damages suffered by virtue of the fraud and deceit. If this last alternative be selected, it seems to be well settled that equity has no jurisdiction; the action being one at law. The courts of this state seem never to have directly passed on this question, but there is ample authority to be found in decisions from other jurisdictions. In the case of French v. Mulholland, 218 Mich. 248, 187 N. W. 254, 21 A. L. R. 1, the following factual situation existed: French and Mulholland, after having been engaged in a partnership, dissolved the same by a give or take proposition; French buying out Mulholland. Later French discovered that Mulholland, while acting as manager of the partnership before its dissolution, had failed to account for certain profits. French affirmed the sale and then brought an action in equity for an accounting. The court held that under these circumstances an action at law for the fraud and deceit was the proper remedy, and that an action in equity would not lie. The Supreme Court of Michigan, at page 255 of 187 N. W., summed up the situation as follows:

"Plaintiff, by affirming the sale to him, has affirmed the dissolution of the copartnership and the settlement, except as he may, if he has been defrauded, have a remedy for the fraud and deceit practiced upon him.

"If plaintiff has suffered loss in adjusting the partnership relation with defendant, through fraud or deceit of defendant, his remedy does not lie in a partnership accounting, but in an action planted upon such fraud and deceit. * * *

"Plaintiff in this case had a right to impeach the settlement with his copartner, for the fraud and deceit alleged, if practiced upon him, but such is not the remedy he seeks. The allegations in the bill state an action for fraud and deceit in making a settlement of the partnership affairs, and plaintiff elected to have such settlement stand."

After considering several authorities, the court concludes (at page 256 of 187 N. W.): "Plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law, and the learned circuit judge was right in holding that the equity court had no jurisdiction."

The case was therefore transferred to the law side of the court. See 240 Mich. 156, 215 N. W. 350, for the same case on appeal after decision by the law side of the court.

Another case laying down the same rule is Crockett v. Burleson, 60 W. Va. 252, 54 S. E. 341, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 263, where, after dissolution caused by one partner purchasing the other partner's interest, the purchasing partner discovered that the seller had fraudulently represented the status of the account between them, and brought an action at law for the fraud. The sole question on appeal was whether such action could be maintained. The Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia held that it could, stating, among other things (page 342 of 54 S. E.): "The gravamen of the action in this case is the alleged tort—the alleged personal wrong done to one partner by another, as to which there can be no partnership relation. The late partnership is in no way concerned. It cannot be conceived that there is anything in the former partnership relation which prevents the maintenance of this action, brought for damages for the alleged deceit."

In the fairly recent case (1929) of Wright v. Lake, 178 Ark. 1184, 13 S.W.(2d) 826, at page 827, it is said, in reference to this type of case: "The contract of dissolution stands, and the partnership relation no longer exists. The ground of action is in no way connected with the state of the partnership business, except that the defendant is alleged to have withheld from the plaintiff a part of the profits for three different years and to have converted the same to his own use. A certain specified and definite amount is alleged to have been withheld by the defendant for three different years and to have been fraudulently converted to his own use. The alleged fraud and deceit is not asked to be a ground for setting aside the settlement between the partners or for reforming the accounts. The right of the action in this case is the alleged tort of Lake in fraudulently withholding from the plaintiff in each case a certain part of the profits of the partnership for three different years and converting the same to his own use. The former partnership between the parties is in no way concerned, and there is nothing in the former partnership relation which prevents the maintenance of this action, for the alleged deceit."

See, also, Farnsworth v. Whitney, 74 Me. 370; McAuley v. Cooley, 45 Neb. 582, 63 N. W. 871; Binney v. Delmar (Com. Pl.) 17 N. Y. S. 524; Kelly v. Delaney, 136 App. Div. 604, 121 N. Y. S. 241, affirmed in 205 N. Y. 618, 98 N. E. 1105; Wicks v. Lippman, 13 Nev. 499; annotation, 21 A. L. R. 21, at page 97.

[5, 6] The reasoning of the above cases appeals to us as stating the proper rule. It is true that respondent herein has, among other remedies, asked for an accounting, but that relief is merely incidental as part of the proof of the fraud. The essential nature of the action was for fraud and deceit in the misappropriation of funds. The action was not one for an accounting. The mere fact that in determining the damages many items were involved would in no way change the nature of the action, nor would it deprive the law courts of jurisdiction. As stated in Otsego Sanitary Milk Products Co. v. Allegan Circuit Judge, 234 Mich. 277, 207 N. W. 890, at page 890: "The only relief sought by either party in the original case is a money judgment or decree. It is said by one of the parties that the number of items involved approximates 3,000, and by the other that the number does not exceed 50 * * * but the fact that the items are numerous does not deprive a court of law of jurisdiction."

From the above reasoning it follows that, the action being one at law, the defendant was entitled to a jury trial.

[7] Just as appellant has misconceived the nature of respondent's pleading, so has he misconceived the nature of the dissolution agreement. The evidence shows that the parties arrived at the value of the business by roughly estimating the actual value of the stock on hand. Respondent then agreed to pay one-half of this sum as and for the appellant's interest. Appellant therefore contends that respondent got full value for the note; that the note only represented the actual tangible value of the property. After reasoning thus, appellant concludes that the "agreement (of dissolution) operated as a complete and final settlement between the parties." This conclusion does not follow. Respondent is not seeking relief for fraud in representing the value of the business at the time of dissolution, but is seeking relief for the fraud and deceit of appellant in misappropriating past profits of the partnership, already earned, and to which respondent was entitled to a share at the time of the dissolution. In other words, on the date of dissolution appellant, according to the allegations of respondent's pleadings, was indebted to respondent in the sum of $15,000 by reason of his fraud and deceit. Respondent was ignorant of the fact, believing that at that time appellant owed him nothing. Obviously, if respondent had known of the indebtedness arising out of appellant's fraud, he would have deducted the same from the amount of the note. Under such circumstances, the agreement of dissolution could, under no theory, amount to an accord and satisfaction of this indebtedness; respondent being in ignorance of its very existence. To reach such a result would be to place a premium on successful fraud, and this the law does not permit.

[8] A somewhat analogous and equally fallacious contention is made by appellant in his contention that the alleged fraud is not a defense to an action on the note, and could not be set forth as the proper subject of a cross-complaint. Under the above facts there can be no doubt that the alleged indebtedness caused by appellant's fraud could properly be set forth as a counterclaim under section 438 of the Code of Civil Procedure or as a cross-complaint under section 442 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[9] Appellant's next assignment of error deals with the question as to the admissibility into evidence of an accountant's summary of the books of account of the partnership. Mr. Dolge, a certified public accountant, was called as a witness by respondent. He testified that he had examined the available books of the concern dealing with the period from January 1, 1923, to September 30, 1923, and had made a summary thereof. This summary or report, he testified, "is for the most part in my own handwriting. I examined the books." Some of the detail work was delegated to assistants who worked under the supervision and control of Dolge. The trial court correctly admitted the report in evidence. Section 1855 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides in part: "There can be no evidence of the contents of a writing, other than the writing itself, except in the following cases: * * *

5. When the original consists of numerous accounts or other documents, which cannot be examined in court without great loss of time, and the evidence sought from them is only the general result of the whole."

Although it is true that Mr. Dolge did not do all of the actual checking required, we do not deem that essential to permit the summary to be introduced. He testified very clearly that his report was made from the original tags, checks, and books of account, and that he had personal knowledge of the same. The tags, checks, and books were all made available to appellant, and could all have been introduced into evidence, but it was to prevent such a time wasting and lengthy procedure that section 1855, subdivision 5, of the Code of Civil Procedure, was passed. See Wilson v. Alcatraz Asphalt Co., 142 Cal. 182, 189, 75 P. 787; Shields v. Rancho Buena Ventura, 187 Cal. 569, 573, 203 P. 114; Globe Manufacturing Co. v. Harvey, 185 Cal. 255, 261, 196 P. 261; Kinney v. Maryland Casualty Co., 15 Cal. App. 571, 574, 115 P. 456; McPherson v. Great Western Milling Company, 44 Cal. App. 491, 495, 186 P. 803.

[10, 11] Appellant next contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict in the following respects: The Dolge report covers the period from January 1, 1923, to September 30, 1923, and for that period concludes that the sum of $19,581.06 was unaccounted for. Appellant admits, in addition, that $500 was appropriated by Mrs. Johnstone in 1922. The total appropriations amount, therefore, to $20,081.06, of which one-half, or $10,040.53, belonged to each partner. Appellant contends that this is the only evidence of misappropriations to be found in the record, and that, assuming the jury believed that the entire sum had been misappropriated and was chargeable to appellant, still there would be a balance due on the note for which judgment should have been rendered in favor of appellant. Respondent admitted that $12,550 was still unpaid on the note, and, if respondent's share of the misappropriated money be deducted from the amount due on the note, there would still be a balance in appellant's favor of $2,509.47. Appellant therefore contends, the verdict being unsupported by the evidence, a new trial should be granted. This entire argument is predicated on the fact that the Dolge report and the admissions in the pleadings provided the only evidence from which the jury could determine the amount misappropriated, but such was not the fact. Considerable evidence is to be found in the record in reference to transactions not reflected in the Dolge report, nor in the pleadings. For example, both parties produced considerable evidence in reference to a transaction referred to as the "Mack Truck Transaction," from which respondent claimed appellant made a large profit which he should have but did not credit to the partnership. During this discussion a conditional sales contract was introduced in evidence indicating that $5,750 had been received for the truck. The Dolge report was never intended as the sole evidence of misappropriations, nor was it ever contended that it was absolutely correct. It was merely offered as an approximation based on the available books. The jury evidently did not believe appellant's explanation, either of the items in the Dolge report or in reference to the Mack truck transaction. It was for the jury to weigh the evidence and judge of the credibility of the witnesses, and this they have done. Under elementary principles, the jury's determination, under such a state of facts, cannot be interfered with on appeal. The rule, amply supported by authority, is thus stated in 24 California Jurisprudence, 886, § 135: "Conclusive proof, however, is never necessary to justify a verdict, and a general verdict will be upheld if it finds support in the evidence, adduced upon the whole case. Obviously, under the system prevailing in California, the jury are the exclusive judges of the weight of the evidence and the credibility of witnesses, and it is, as has often been observed, peculiarly within their province, when considering the evidence, to give to it whatever weight it may, in their deliberate judgment, be entitled to, and to draw all reasonable inferences therefrom or, if it be their judgment that the evidence is entitled to no weight in the determination of the ultimate issue, to disregard it altogether."

[12-14] Appellant next contends that the evidence was insufficient to show a conspiracy to defraud respondent by appellant. Appellant correctly states that there is no direct evidence in the record showing that appellant and his wife acted in concert; all the direct evidence showing that Mrs. Johnstone was in ignorance of the partnership relationship, and was laboring under the impression that her husband owned the business, and took the money under that assumption. Moreover, both Mr. and Mrs. Johnstone testified that Mr. Johnstone had no knowledge of the misappropriations by his wife. But we do not deem it necessary in such an action to show the conspiracy to defraud by direct evidence. The jury was not bound by the direct evidence of the Johnstones. The inherent probability or improbability of that testimony was a matter for them to determine from all the facts and circumstances. The evidence shows that at all times herein involved Mr. and Mrs. Johnstone were husband and wife, living together as such. They both testified that Mrs. Johnstone handled all of the finances of the family. Mr. Johnstone testified that "Mrs. Johnstone and I took charge of the financial end of the business: * * * My wife had a bank account. I never saw it. I never wanted to see it"; and also testified that "Mrs. Johnstone handled all the money including our salaries." The evidence also showed that during this period Mrs. Johnstone purchased a $1,000 diamond ring, a $2,800 Packard, and started payments on a $9,500 home; that she usually carried large sums on her person, many times over $1,000 in cash. It is hard to believe that under these circumstances Mr. Johnstone was or could be in ignorance of the fact that his wife was appropriating large sums of the partnership money. In cases of conspiracy to defraud it is not to be expected that direct evidence of the conspiracy can be secured, because such evidence could usually only be secured in the event one of the conspirators confessed. The jury may infer the conspiracy from all the circumstances, and, if the inference is a reasonable one, it will not be disturbed on appeal. These principles have repeatedly been recognized by this court. In Revert v. Hesse, 184 Cal. 295, at page 301, 193 P. 943, 946, this court, quoting from a Georgia case (Woodruff v. Hughes, 2 Ga. App. 361, 58 S. E. 551), said: "The law recognizes the intrinsic difficulty of proving a conspiracy. The allegations with reference to conspiracy are treated as matters of inducement leading up to a more particular description of the acts from which conspiracy may be inferred. * * * The conspiracy may sometimes be inferred from the nature of the acts done, the relation of the parties, the interest of the alleged conspirators, and other circumstances." * * *

On the same page (301 of 184 Cal., 193 P. 943, 946) the court continued as follows: "In the present action, while plaintiff was unable to prove any formal agreement between defendants Arthur Hesse and Sidney Beach, nevertheless, there was before the court the entire transaction resulting in the consummation of a flagrant fraud upon the plaintiff, in which transaction defendant Sidney Beach participated as an intermediary. * * * These circumstances, coupled with the further fact that defendants Sidney Beach and Arthur Hesse were not strangers, but were on more or less intimate terms, occupying the same office, were sufficient to warrant the inference drawn by the trial court that defendant Sidney Beach was a party to a conspiracy which had for its object the fraudulent conversion complained of by plaintiff."

In Beeman v. Richardson, 185 Cal. 280, at page 282, 196 P. 774, 775, the rule is stated as follows: "The point in connection with the finding as to a conspiracy is that the representations were made by the defendant Richardson alone, and that there is no direct evidence that the other defendants agreed that they should be made, or knew at the time that they were being made. But direct evidence of that character could hardly be had in the very nature of things, unless one of the defendants should confess, and the fact must be determined by the inference naturally and properly to be drawn from those matters which can be and are directly proven."

Under the evidence partially summarized, supra, the inference of joint fraud was not unreasonable, and will not be disturbed on appeal.

[15, 16] The next assignment of error deals with the failure of the trial court to give an instruction to the effect that a person does not necessarily lose money by faulty bookkeeping. Sufficient it is to say that the record before us does not contain all of the instructions of the trial court. It is well settled that, when all the instructions given by the trial court are not included in the record on appeal, it will be assumed that, were the entire charge of the trial court before us, it would not show error, and that any imperfection in the instructions was harmonized and a correct statement of the law made. Goldman v. Dahlberg, 79 Cal. App. 380, 382, 249 P. 536; Barrington v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 83 Cal. App. 100, 103, 256 P. 567; Heffner v. Gross, 179 Cal. 738, 178 P. 860. Moreover, the question of the validity of the various items of the Dolge report and the errors in the bookkeeping system were squarely and clearly presented to the jury.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment appealed from must be, and hereby is, affirmed Bradford Webster, of Oakland, for respondents.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from an order terminating proceedings in the preparation of a transcript on appeal undertaken to be prepared under the provisions of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. The record shows the following: That the notice of entry of judgment appealed from and the proceedings on which said appeal were terminated was filed on the 24th day of May, 1929. Notice of motion for a new trial was filed on the 29th day of July, 1929. On the 10th day of July, 1929, an order was made denying the motion for a new trial. Notice of appeal from the judgment was filed on the 13th day of July, 1929. Notice to prepare transcript was filed on the same day. The order directing the reporter to prepare the transcript on appeal was also filed on the same day. Here the matter rested until a notice was given by the respondents that on the 31st day of January, 1930, respondents would move to terminate proceedings with reference to the preparation of the transcript on appeal, in accordance with the provisions of section 954, Code of Civil Procedure. Upon the hearing of this motion two affidavits were filed by the appellant, one by Duncan McLellan, the reporter, to the effect that on or about the 13th day of July, 1929, A. H. Hewitt, now deceased, had made satisfactory arrangements with him personally to prepare a reporter's transcript, to be used on appeal in this cause; that, due to the press of business in his office, affiant forgot to prepare said transcript, and that the same has since been prepared and was filed in the office of the clerk of the above-entitled court on the 4th day of February, 1930. The second affidavit referred to was made by Lloyd E. Hewitt, one of the attorneys for the appellant. In this affidavit it is set forth that A. H. Hewitt, one of the attorneys of record in said cause, died on or about the 3d day of September, 1929, and that the said A. H. Hewitt was handling said cause, and prepared the papers and pleadings therein. That said cause came on for trial on the 18th day of April, 1929, and judgment was entered therein on the 20th day of May, 1929; that thereafter, on the 29th day of May, 1929, the plaintiff prepared and filed a motion for new trial, which was thereafter denied on the 13th day of July, 1929; that arrangements were made with the reporter to prepare a reporter's transcript; that the first that appellant knew that the reporter's transcript was not prepared was in the latter part of November, 1929, and that at said time the reporter informed affiant that he would have the same prepared as quickly as possible and would file it with the clerk of the court, and at the same time informed affiant that satisfactory arrangements had been made for his compensation.

Upon this showing the trial court entered its order terminating proceedings relating to the preparation of transcript upon appeal.

It will be seen by an examination of the affidavits that no facts are stated really excusing the long delay, or setting forth any reasons why the preparation of the transcript was not completed many months before the date it was actually filed. The cause was one tried before the court, and as stated in the briefs, and not disputed by counsel, required less than two hours for its trial. The affidavit of the attorney for the plaintiff shows that more than two months elapsed after his discovery that no transcript had been prepared by the reporter before same actually was prepared and filed. No stipulations were asked for extending time and no order of the court was made extending time. Under such circumstances we cannot very well hold that the trial court abused its discretion in making the order appealed from, and, as stated in Galbraith v. Lowe, 142 Cal. 295, 75 P. 831, the order of the trial court "will not be disturbed upon appeal where no abuse of discretion appears, and where the proposed engrossed bill failed to show any ground for a new trial." That was a case where the trial court had refused to sign the engrossed bill on account of the negligence of the appellant in having the same prepared. The fact that, under the case of Smith v. Jaccard, 20 Cal. App. 280, 128 P. 1023, 1024, the time within which the reporter must prepare a transcript is held to be directory and not mandatory, does not alter the rule relative to diligence. As it is said in that case: "It is doubtless the duty of the appellant, as the moving party, to take the necessary steps to secure the filing of such transcript, and for want of diligence in such matter on his part it is within the power of the trial court to terminate his proceedings for procuring such transcript." It is also there held that, whether due diligence has been exercised is a matter largely within the discretion of the trial court, and will not be disturbed unless such discretion has been abused.

The proceedings now before us appear to have been taken in strict accordance with the decision of this court in the case of Crocker v. Crocker, 76 Cal. App. 606, 245 P. 438, in which case it is also held that the termination of proceedings to prepare a transcript for want of diligence is largely within the discretion of the trial court, and will not be reversed unless an abuse thereof is shown.

As stated herein, we find nothing in the record showing such abuse of discretion, and, therefore, the order of the trial court is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter S. Gates, Judge.

Action by Joseph F. Clark against J. Le Roy Patterson and another. From a judgment of the superior court, reversing a judgment of the municipal court in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant New York Indemnity Company, plaintiff appeals.

Judgment of the superior court affirmed.

Paul C. Hill, of Los Angeles, for appellant

Culver & Nourse, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SCHMIDT, Justice pro tem.

The appeal in this case is from the judgment and order of the superior court reversing the judgment of the municipal court in favor of appellant as to the respondent New York Indemnity Company, a corporation.

The case was tried upon a stipulated statement of facts, which in so far as material, are that the respondent New York Indemnity Company issued to one J. Le Roy Patterson its broker's bond in the sum of $2,000, pursuant to the provisions of the Real Estate Brokers' Act (Stats. 1919, p. 1252, and acts amendatory thereof); that while said bond was in force, to wit, on the 3d day of February, 1926, said Patterson, acting as a real estate broker, through his agent E. F. Gleason, undertook to sell to appellant a certain parcel of land whereby the said Patterson undertook to endeavor to secure from the Pacific Development Company a contract for the sale and conveyance of said real estate; the said Patterson made and delivered to appellant a purchaser's preliminary sales contract covering the property, at which time appellant paid to Gleason the sum of $855, which was in turn paid to and received by Patterson, excepting the amount due Gleason on account of his commission; that Patterson deposited the amount received by him in his own account, which was thereafter levied upon under attachment in another action brought against Patterson; Patterson never at any time paid the $855 or any part thereof to the Pacific Development Company or any one else; that Patterson appropriated the same to his own use and purpose. Appellant, being unable to obtain the repayment of his money, consulted an attorney, which attorney obtained from Patterson a promissory note dated August 10, 1926, without the knowledge of the surety, New York Indemnity Company, which note provided for the repayment of the sum to appellant with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, in monthly installments of $100 each, the first payment to be made on the date of the note, the said note also providing in the event of default the whole amount of principal and interest should become immediately due and payable and for the payment of attorney's fees in the event suit or other proceedings were taken to enforce the payment of the note. The note also contained the following provision:

"This note shall not be, and is not a waiver by the said Joseph F. Clark of any rights, nor a release of myself, E. F. Gleason, or the Pacific Development Company from any liability upon or arising out of that certain preliminary sales contract, executed by the said Joseph F. Clark under date of February 3, 1926, until this note has been fully paid and satisfied. J. L. Patterson."

Upon the execution of the note Patterson paid the sum of $100 and thereafter an additional sum of $100. This action was commenced for the purpose of collecting the unpaid balance. Subsequent to the filing of the action in the municipal court the further sum of $100 was paid, leaving at time of trial a balance of principal unpaid to plaintiff in the sum of $550.

[1] The first question presented is: Assuming that the note of Patterson was in the performance of a duty by him as a real estate broker, has the surety been released by the acceptance by appellant of the note from Patterson?

It must be borne in mind that by the acceptance of the promissory note appellant extended the due date of the indebtedness and obtained an additional advantage of 8 per cent. interest where the obligation could have carried, under the law, only 7 per cent. Section 2819, Civil Code, provides:

"A guarantor is exonerated, except so far as he may be indemnified by the principal, if by any act of the creditor, without the consent of the guarantor, the original obligation of the principal is altered in any respect, or the remedies or rights of the creditor against the principal, in respect thereto, in any way impaired or suspended."

This section has received frequent interpretation from the Supreme Court. We need only refer to Daneri v. Gazzola, 139 Cal. 416, 73 P. 179; Bridge v. Conn. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 167 Cal. 774, 141 P. 375; Braun v. Crew, 183 Cal. 728, 192 P. 531, which cases hold under facts similar to the case at bar, that by the acceptance of the note, if there is an extension of time for payment, the surety is released, and also that the acceptance of an additional rate of interest is sufficient consideration for the new obligation so as to release the surety.

[2] Appellant contends, however, that the surety in this case has not been injured, but benefited. As was said in Braun v. Crew, 183 Cal. 728, 733, 192 P. 531, 534:

"The rule in this state is that where there is an extension of time by the creditor to the principal, without the consent of the surety, the question of the extent of the injury which the surety sustains therefrom cannot be inquired into."

By reason of the conclusions reached, it is not necessary to discuss any other points raised.

Judgment of the superior court reversing the judgment of the municipal court is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by John K. Milonas against George I. Sarantitis, Gus Sarantitis, and others, partners doing business as Sarantitis Bros. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants other than George Sarantitis, appeal.

Affirmed.

Hugo D. Newhouse and Russell P. Tyler, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

L. L. James and James, Brann & Rowe, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff recovered judgment for $1,040 unpaid rent for premises occupied by defendants under a written lease signed by George Sarantitis alone. The defendants other than George Sarantitis appeal on typewritten transcripts.

[1] The trial court found that all the defendants were engaged in business as copartners, and that "by consent and agreement of all parties, said George I. Sarantitis subscribed and executed" the lease in his individual name "for and on behalf of himself and his said brothers and copartners." The appellants attack this finding as not supported by the evidence, but say that it would be too difficult to print the evidence to establish their point. Respondent has printed sufficient evidence to sustain the finding. The liability of the appellants thus rests upon the well-settled rule that, where a person is known to be acting as the agent of a disclosed principal the latter is bound upon the principle that the contract of the agent, within the scope of his authority, is, in legal effect, the contract of the principal. Geary St., etc., R. R. Co. v. Rolph, 189 Cal. 59, 65, 66, 207 P. 539; Marshall v. Bernheim, 64 Cal. App. 283, 285, 286, 221 P. 401; Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., v. Seeber, 205 Cal. 690, 697, 272 P. 579; Rubin v. Platt Music Co., 92 Cal. App. 203, 210, 268 P. 396.

[2] The further point is made that the trial court erred in receiving parol evidence to show that the contract was in fact a partnership transaction. Recent decisions support the general rule that, when it does not appear that the contracting party, at the time the contract was executed, elected to hold the agent instead of the principal, parol evidence is admissible to show the intention of the parties. 21 R. C. L. pp. 891, 893. In the early case of Byington v. Simpson, 134 Mass. 169, the court, speaking through Holmes J., said: "Whatever the original merits of the rule, that a party not mentioned in a simple contract in writing may be charged as a principal upon oral evidence, even where the writing gives no indication of an intent to bind any other person than the signer, we cannot reopen it, for it is as well settled as any part of the law of agency." The rule was recognized in Marshall v. Bernheim, supra; Rubin v. Platt Music Co., supra, and in Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc. v. Seeber, supra, where, at page 697, of 205 Cal., 272 P. 579, 582, the court said that "no good reason appears why it [the rule holding a disclosed principal liable] should not apply as well when the contract is written." The court did not pass directly on the question here presented, but it did hold the disclosed principal liable, and to do so it had to rest its decision on the parol evidence which showed that the contract signed by the agent was in truth and fact signed for and on behalf of the principal whose identity was disclosed at the time the contract was made.

Thus, if a principal, in making the contract, assumes a fictitious or artificial name, parol evidence is admissible to identify the real party in interest, and the situation is nowise changed if the principal should make use of the name of another known person. Pease v. Pease, 35 Conn. 131, 95 Am. Dec. 225; Pleins v. Wachenheimer, 108 Minn. 342, 122 N. W. 166, 133 Am. St. Rep. 451. The principle is well stated in Ford v. Williams, 21 How. 289, 16 L. Ed. 36, as follows: "The contract of the agent is the contract of the principal, and he may sue or be sued thereon, though not named therein; and notwithstanding the rule of law that an agreement reduced to writing may not be contradicted or varied by parol, it is well settled that the principal may show that the agent who made the contract in his own name was acting for him. This proof does not contradict the writing; it only explains the transaction."

The judgment is affirmed.

Sinclair M. Dobbins, of Vacaville, and Huston, Huston & Huston, of Woodland, for appellant.

Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls, of San Francisco, Joseph M. Raines, of Fairfield, and Robert M. Tapscott, of San Francisco, for respondents.

Mr. Justice pro tem. TUTTLE delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action to recover damages alleged to have been suffered by plaintiff on account of personal injuries received in an automobile collision. The jury returned a verdict against defendant Collins in the sum of $15,000. Upon motion of defendant corporation, the court directed a verdict in its favor, and from the verdict so rendered plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

On the evening of July 11, 1928, defendant Collins, while in the general employment of defendant corporation, was driving his own automobile along the state highway, near the city of Fairfield, when a collision occurred between his car and the car driven by plaintiff. The injuries complained of arose out of this collision.

The motion for directed verdict was granted upon the sole ground that there was no proof that Collins was acting within the scope of his employment at the time of the collision, and this is the only question presented upon this appeal.

[1-5] In reviewing an order directing a verdict, the appellate court will apply rules analogous to those which govern in reviewing an order granting a nonsuit. 24 Cal. Jur., p. 913. Accordingly, it is the duty of the court here to view the evidence adduced in support of plaintiff's case, and every presumption and inference that may be fairly deduced therefrom, in the light most favorable to plaintiff. McKay v. McKay, 184 Cal. 742, 195 P. 385. Furthermore, evidence, whether admitted erroneously or not, if relevant to the issues joined, must be given by the court the benefit of full probative strength, and any question arising from the fact of variation between the evidence of the witnesses cannot be raised or considered. Kleist v. Priem, 51 Cal. App. 32, 196 P. 72. "The question of the liability of the master for the acts of his servant depends altogether upon the fact of whether or not the servant was acting within the scope of his employment. The terms 'course of employment' and 'scope of the authority' are not susceptible of accurate definition. What acts are within the scope of the employment can be determined by no fixed rule; the authority from the master being gatherable from the surrounding circumstances." Robards v. Bannon Sewer Pipe Co., 130 Ky. 380, 113 S. W. 429, 431, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 923, 132 Am. St. Rep. 394. Whether the act of the servant complained of is within the scope of his duty, while acting in the furtherance of his master's business, is a matter of fact to be determined by the jury, and not by the court as a matter of law.

The record presents the following evidence upon the question of whether or not Collins was acting within the scope of his duty when the accident occurred: During the trial it was admitted by counsel for Collins "that at the time of his (Collins') vacation and of this accident he was an employee of the Company on vacation with pay." Collins, called as an adverse witness by plaintiff, testified that at the time of the collision he was on his way from San Francisco to Sacramento, for the sole purpose of calling upon a man named Chambers; that at that time he was regularly employed as a salesman and installment man for defendant corporation, and had been so employed for a number of years; that he sold and installed linotyping machines for the company; that Chambers used machines similar to those sold by defendant corporation, and that he had called upon Chambers a number of times pursuant to his duties and prior to the date of the accident for the purpose of selling a machine for his employer; that some time prior to the accident one of the men (presumably an employee of defendant corporation) had sold a machine to Bird Linotyping Company of Los Angeles; that he had learned from the reports that the Bird Company was dissatisfied with the machine sold them, and that they wanted to dispose of it; that he was on his way to Sacramento to attempt to sell this machine to Chambers, when the collision occurred.

We are only here concerned with evidence favorable to plaintiff. It is true that Collins testified that at the time of the collision he was on his vacation. His testimony upon the matter of the exact time when his vacation commenced is vague and uncertain, and might well have been entirely left out of consideration by the jury. He testified that his wife and child were at Seattle, and that his vacation had started, and he was on his way to meet them. If this is true, the jury might well have inquired why he did not go directly to Seattle, instead of proceeding out of his route to Sacramento. They might reasonably have inferred that he did not intend to start on his vacation until after he had consummated his business call with Chambers. Furthermore, during the trial, no attempt was made by the corporation to show by their records or by the testimony of executive officials that Collins was actually on his vacation or the exact date when it began. At the trial there was testimony to the effect that Collins had admitted to the witness in San Francisco that his vacation did not commence until July 15th, three days after the accident.

[6] It is earnestly contended by respondent that the evidence with reference to the sale of the machine to Chambers is susceptible of one construction only, to wit, that the matter was the private business of Collins, and that the respondent company was in no way interested therein. We believe that this view of the testimony cannot be sustained. According to the evidence, this machine had been sold by respondent company to a customer in Los Angeles, who became dissatisfied. From the "records" Collins found it was to be resold, and he was proceeding to sell it again. Asked where he got the information, Collins answered in a manner which did not carry conviction, and the jury might well have inferred that the "records" referred to were the records of the corporation. Again, Chambers was an old "prospect" of his company, and the jury could reasonably have found that the business he had with Chambers at Sacramento was respondent's business. The following question and answer put to and made by Collins are indicative of his manner of testifying: "Q. You had planned to stop at Sacramento to see someone there about some business selling typograph machine you told me? A. It was really not business, it was more of a personal call." Conceding that the proposed visit to Chambers was a personal call, it is a matter of common knowledge that salesmen accomplish and carry out their employment through "personal calls." This is particularly true of the instant case, as Collins had made a number of prior calls upon Chambers in an attempt to sell him the machine which his employers had for sale, and which he was employed to dispose of. The jury might well have found that Collins' contemplated visit to Sacramento had two objectives—personal business of his own, and business of the company. Under such facts respondent would still be liable. "The mere mingling by the servant of some purpose of his own with that of the master will not relieve the master of liability." Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, vol. 1, § 147a.

[7] We think the jury might have found, not unreasonably, if they believed all the testimony adduced by plaintiff and adopted the inferences properly to be drawn therefrom, that at the time of the collision Collins was engaged in the course of his employment with defendant corporation. We cannot say that a conclusion favorable to a recovery by plaintiff could not have been reached reasonably.

The trial court erred in granting the motion complained of, and, accordingly, it is ordered that that judgment be reversed.

109 Cal. App. 238

RIVERSIDE COUNTY v. LESLIE.
Civ. 253.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Oct. 27, 1930.

1. Highways ⇨19.

County through board of supervisors not having substantially complied with statutory provisions in laying out road held not to have established road (Pol. Code, §§ 2681-2690).

Owner of land over which road was established was a nonresident, was given no notice of any kind, nor was his consent ever obtained. Record was silent on matter of compliance with Pol. Code, §§ 2688, 2689, and 2690, prescribing jurisdictional steps to be taken before owner of land may be deprived of his property however great the public necessity therefor.

2. Highways ⇨8.

County not having condemned right of way nor paid for it, no right to highway could be acquired by use and maintenance under color of right (Pol. Code, §§ 2681-2690).

3. Dedication ⇨16(1).

Building of fences held not implied dedication of thoroughfare, where substantial part of alleged road had no fence on either side and landowner strenuously objected.

Fences were placed along highway 50 feet from center of road without owner's consent by hired man of lessee. The fences were not parallel and remained intact from time of construction. Owner continued to farm strip outside fences, and substantial part of road in center of land had no fence on either side, thereby forming no lane.

4. Highways ⇨14.

Landowner, not having acquiesced in thoroughfare 100 feet wide, held not estopped by laches to assert highway was only 20 feet wide.

5. Highways ⇨14.

County's mere assumption of width of roadway will not control, unless proper legal action be taken to acquire land (Pol. Code, §§ 2681-2690; St. 1907, p. 806).

6. Eminent domain ⇨273.

Landowner is entitled to injunction to restrain planting of trees on land claimed as part of public highway, where proceedings to establish highway were absolute nullity (Pol. Code, §§ 2681-2690).

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; F. A. Leonard, Judge.

Action by the County of Riverside against Charles C. L. Leslie, wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint. From the judgment rendered, defendant and cross-complainant appeal.

Reversed.

A. B. Edler, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Albert Ford, Dist. Atty., of Riverside, for respondent.

OWEN, Justice pro tem.

The county of Riverside instituted this action to recover the sum of $40,000 from the defendant under the provisions of section 2742 of the Political Code, alleging that the defendant had maliciously destroyed 400 young trees growing upon the highway known as Beaumont avenue; the Code section providing for a forfeiture of $100 for each tree destroyed. The complaint sets forth that the said highway is 100 feet wide and properly describes its location. It is also alleged that there is a duly organized and existing county board of forestry in Riverside county. The defendant appeared by answer and cross-complaint.

It appears that on September 12, 1888, there was presented to the board of supervisors of the county of San Bernardino a petition from certain freeholders of the county praying that a highway be laid out for a width of 100 feet running through the land of the defendant and cross-complainant; that pursuant to the petition the supervisors took certain steps toward the acquisition of the right of way. The legality of the procedure is attacked by the defendant in his cross-complaint as well as all other actions by the county which seek to establish an actual or implied dedication of the road. Claiming the ownership of the whole strip except a road 20 feet wide, the defendant seeks an injunction against the county of Riverside, its board of supervisors, board of forestry, and other persons, enjoining the placing of fences, the planting of trees, and the opening of the highway beyond the width of 20 feet.

To understand the situation properly, a detailed statement of all actions on the part of the county must be made. In the year 1893 the county of Riverside was created, the premises herein involved were thus transferred from San Bernardino county to the new county, the records of both counties being used in evidence in the trial. The minutes of the board of supervisors of San Bernardino county dated April 2, 1888, read as follows: "Petition for the opening of three new public roads in Beaumont were granted, the accompanying bonds approved and James Kennedy, C. F. Jost and Z. B. Stuart were appointed Road Viewers." Under date of May 7, 1888, were the following minutes: "Report of Road Reviewers on three proposed roads in Beaumont was accepted and two of the roads declared public highways, action on the third road being postponed. For a full description reference is made to the road book of this Board." The record of road surveys of San Bernardino county contains the following:

"At a regular meeting of the Board of Supervisors held on the 2nd day of April, 1888, the following action was taken by unanimous vote of all members present:

"In the matter of a petition of freeholders and residents of the 4th Road District praying for a county road in Beaumont and to establish some of the streets of Beaumont, a county road, the Road Viewers appointed to consider the same, viz., James Kennedy, C. F. Jost and Z. B. Stuart, having filed a report favorable to the desired action, the report was accepted and the petition granted. The following are the field notes of the proposed new road. Field Notes: Var. 14°30' E.

"Commencing at the intersection of 8th street and Beaumont avenue in Beaumont, thence north on center line of Beaumont avenue one mile to the Twp. line between Twps 2 and 3 south, range 1 west, and extending 50 feet on each side of the center line of said avenue; thence north 1313 feet to R. L. Jenkins north line in section 34 T2N, R1W, and 20 feet on each side; thence north 1.75 miles to the north end of Beaumont avenue and extending 50 feet on each side;" (then follows a page of technical description which has nothing to do with describing the property in question).

"[Signed] Z. B. Stuart, "County Surveyor."

The foregoing three references constitute the only action taken by the county of San Bernardino to constitute Beaumont avenue a 100-foot county road, so far as the record before us shows. It appears that for a long period before this action was taken, a road zigzagged along the general course of the highway in question, serving Beaumont and other communities to the north. Subsequently, the county of Riverside plowed and graded the road at various times to a width of from 20 to 30 feet. About the year 1916 the county placed stakes and plowed a furrow on each side of the road, 50 feet from the center. The lessee of the defendant informed the road overseer doing the work that the county only had a width of 30 feet; however, the workmen used whatever dirt was needed for fills within the 100 feet. At about this period the lessee of the defendant, or workmen under his direction, placed two fences along the lines of the plowed furrows 50 feet from the center of the road, the fences, however, were not parallel, but the one on the west side of the road began about where the one on the east side stopped, the opposite end of each fence extending to the outer limit of defendant's land. These fences have remained intact from the time of their construction. The fence posts on one side of the road are railroad ties, about 15 or 16 feet apart; the other fence is constructed of willow posts, there being two and three barbed-wire strands.

Pursuant to a resolution of intention dated March 21, 1923, after due posting and publication and the approval of plans, profiles, and specifications, road improvement district No. 11 constructed an 18-foot pavement, 5 inches thick, along the center line of the right of way in question. The work called for 3-foot shoulders to the pavement and the grading of the road to a width of 24 feet. In the month of April, 1927, the Rotary Club of Beaumont purchased about 400 blue and red gum trees (eucalyptus rostrata), which trees were planted with the assistance of the Boy Scouts about 50 feet apart, on each side of the road, and within the 100-foot limits thereof, through defendant's property. Plaintiff's witnesses testified that in July of that year most of the trees were living. Defendant testified that nearly all of them were dead. Dead or alive, it is admitted that defendant pulled them up.

The defendant testified that he never knew that the board of supervisors claimed a road through his property until the year 1927; that no notice of such claim was ever served on him, either by the board of supervisors of Riverside or of San Bernardino counties; that he inherited his interest in the land, and the administration of the estate had been pending since 1889, and he was still the administrator; that the taxes on the estate were paid from a trust in Chicago, and he did not know if the taxes were ever paid; that he knew the pavement was being placed on the road about the time it was being finished; that the fences were put up with his knowledge, but not 50 feet from the center of the highway, with his consent; that several years ago he sought legal advice as to the width of the road; and that he visited the premises about once each year and, at times, longer intervals.

Leslie Roberts, lessee of the defendant, testified that the land on both sides of the road had been cultivated outside of the fences, to the graded portion of the road; that the fence on the east side had been standing for 30 years, and that the west fence was placed by a workman at his direction; that he had a controversy with the workman for placing it 50 feet from the center; that he remarked, "We will move it some of these days"; that it had never been removed, but that he had farmed both inside and outside of it; that in 1916 he had ordered the servant of the county off the land when a furrow was being plowed; and that he ordered the workmen off when they were plowing a furrow to plant the trees, but that they did not go. He further stated on cross-examination that he had protested to the workmen at the time of the paving, because of the use of dirt for fills within the 100-foot limit of the claimed highway, but had not protested to the board of supervisors or instituted any action.

It was testified to by witnesses for both parties that it was the general custom in Riverside county for farmers to cultivate to the used portion of highways for the purpose of planting and keeping down weeds.

The trial court found that Riverside county and the board of forestry are legal entities within the law; that Beaumont avenue is 100 feet wide, and that the trees were growing in and along the highway; that the defendant destroyed the trees, but did not do so maliciously; that the land over which a 100-foot road is claimed is owned jointly by the defendant and the estate of George Leslie; that on April 2, 1888, a petition in due and legal form was received and filed by the board of supervisors of San Bernardino county, asking that a strip of land, which is now Beaumont avenue, be declared and laid out as a public highway; that viewers were appointed, and that on May 7, 1888, the said board declared the strip to be a public highway of the width of 100 feet through defendant's land; that said order was duly entered in the minutes of the board and in the road register, and that thereafter, in the year 1888, the said avenue was laid out and worked by the county and used by the public as a highway, until the creation of Riverside county; that upon the organization of the latter county the said highway was entered in the road register as a highway 100 feet wide through defendant's land, and was mapped and platted in the road book as 100 feet wide by order of the board of supervisors of said county; and that at all times since the creation of said county the said road has been used and maintained as a public highway. The court then finds as facts the statements hereinbefore set forth as to plowing furrows, setting of stakes, and building of fences, and that the fences were maintained with the knowledge and consent of the defendant; that on May 21, 1923, road district improvement No. 21 was created; that defendant's property was contained therein, and the road improved in the manner herein described; that defendant's lands were contained in the assessment district, and that payments have been made by the trustees of the estate of George Leslie, deceased; that notice of the creation of the road district was regularly given as required by law, and the defendant made no objection or protest; that the road has been used as a public highway for more than five years, and such use has been open, notorious, continuous, uninterrupted, and adverse to the claims of the abutting landowners under claim and color of right, and that the defendant had knowledge of the use and the claims of the county. The court found generally against the allegations of the cross-complaint. We have set forth enough of the facts alleged by the parties to the action, and the findings of the court, to gain a clear picture of the controversy. Judgment followed the findings. The injunction was denied.

[1, 2] The first question presented is this: Was Beaumont avenue established as a highway 100 feet wide by the action of the board of supervisors of San Bernardino county? The three excerpts heretofore quoted as the record of the board's transactions fall short of proof of a substantial compliance with the provisions of the Political Code of the year

1888, providing the method of laying out a new road. A "petition was presented," bonds were "approved," and "report of road viewers accepted" as outlined in the minutes of the board, may be probative of the steps taken. There were other procedural acts requisite and necessary, apparently never taken. There seems to have been an attempt to comply with sections 2681 to 2687, inclusive, of the Political Code, but the record is silent as to subdivision 4 of section 2686, providing that the report of the viewers must show the names of nonconsenting landowners, and the amount of damage each claims. That subdivision also provides that nonresident landowners shall be considered nonconsenting landowners, unless their written consent shall be obtained. The defendant herein was a nonresident landowner, as was his predecessor in interest. No notice was ever given him. His consent was never obtained. The proceedings here are silent, as are apparently the records of the two counties, on the following requisite and/or jurisdictional steps to be taken before an owner may be deprived of his property, however great the public necessity; these steps being abridged from sections 2688, 2689, and 2690 of the Political Code, as it existed at the time:

The board of supervisors must fix a day for hearing the report of viewers; give notice to nonconsenting landowners of such hearing by publication; ascertain and declare the amount of damage awarded each nonconsenting landowner; order the amount of damages assessed by them set apart in the treasury; deem rejected any award of damage not accepted within ten days; direct proceedings to procure right of way when damage is rejected by suit instituted by the district attorney; declare the road opened when judgment is obtained.

Not one of the foregoing acts being performed, it cannot be said that the county gained even a shadowy right to a 100-foot strip through the land of a man wholly ignorant and unadvised of the initial proceedings had. It must be held, therefore, that Beaumont avenue was not established 100 feet wide by any legal action of the board of supervisors of San Bernardino county. It must also be held that, said county having failed to institute suit for the right of way, or pay for same, as provided by the code, no 100-foot highway has been created by use and maintenance under color of right created by the ineffective action of the board of supervisors. Nor could the subsequent copying of the San Bernardino records into the records of the newly created Riverside county lend any "color of right" that would justify any action by the board of supervisors of the latter county, based upon the original action which failed wholly to meet even a substantial compliance with the law.

[3] The district attorney urges that the highway has been, by implied dedication, made a thoroughfare 100 feet wide. The fact cited to warrant this claim consists of the building of two fences on the lands of defendant Leslie, each 50 feet from the center of the road. The California authority cited is Sherwood v. Ahart, 35 Cal. App. 84, 169 P. 240, 241. Without reviewing that case at length, the two quotations applicable here are as follows:

"Such dedication is implied from the long and continuous use of the said road with full knowledge of the landowners interested, without asking or receiving any permission, and without objection from any one for a period of time beyond that required by law to bar the right of action. * * *

"We may add that in addition to such use of said road there are other circumstances disclosed by the evidence indicating an intention of the owner to so dedicate said land. One of these circumstances is found in the fact that the road was fenced on both sides throughout its entire length on the land of the defendant, forming a lane through his land." (Italics supplied.)

In the present case it is clearly shown by the defense, with no testimony to the contrary that the defendant did not know through a long period of years that the county claimed a 100-foot road. It is undisputed that the defendant and his agents objected on all occasions to any act on the part of the county asserting its claim to a road wider than the 20-foot strip admitted to have been acquired by user. That the plaintiff acquired no greater width by user is apparent from all the proofs adduced. As to the fences, they were not builded opposite each other. One fence was constructed on the west side of Beaumont avenue, beginning at the south line of defendant's land; the other was on the east side of said road, beginning at the north line of defendant's land. A substantial part of the road in the center of defendant's land had no fence on either side. No lane was thus formed. The rule laid down in Sherwood v. Ahart, supra, cannot be held to apply here, where a different state of facts exists. There was no contradiction to defendant's proof that the fences had been constructed without his knowledge as to location, and in the absence of his lessee, by a hired man, who, without authority, lined the fences with other existing fences further along the avenue. That the defendant continued to farm the strip outside of the fences up to the 20-foot road does not further the idea of dedication by implication. If the defendant or his lessee had intended to dedicate the road 100 feet wide by the act of fencing it, such fences would have been placed on "both sides throughout its entire length on the land of the defendant, forming a lane through his land," and he would not have thereafter protested or stopped each encroachment by the county. We cannot hold that there was an implied dedication.

[4, 5] Respondent claims that appellant is estopped and barred by laches from asserting that the highway is but 20 feet wide. The consistent course of opposition and resistance by the defendant throughout the years to the county's claim of more than a road 20 feet in width would hardly bear out a claim that his further resistance is estopped and barred by laches. "The principal factors in determining * * * [the question] of laches are acquiescence and lapse of time." Chapman v. Bank of Cal., 97 Cal. 155, 31 P. 896, 897. Laches not constituting evidence of acquiescence is no bar. Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 4 P. 919, 10 P. 674. At no time has defendant acquiesced in the 100-foot road, and we cannot continue the discussion of laches further, as he was guilty of none. Respondent's attorney makes no claim and cites no authority in his brief that the improving of the road to the narrower width in 1923 under the Road District Improvement Act of 1907 (St. 1907, p. 806) gave the county a right to the wider road, although in those proceedings Beaumont avenue was shown to be 100 feet wide. The mere assumption of the width to be 100 feet will not control, unless proper action be taken to acquire the land in a manner provided by law.

[6] It is urged by respondent that injunction should not issue in behalf of defendant, restraining the further planting of trees on defendant's land. Plaintiff county admitted in its answer to the cross-complaint that it intended to plant trees within the 100-foot right of way. It is claimed by respondent that an injunction will not lie to prevent the establishment of a public highway over which the commissioners have taken jurisdiction, unless the proceedings are void or so defective as to be an absolute nullity, since an injunction would amount to a collateral attack, citing 29 Cor. Jur. 494.

We believe the mere resolutions adopted by the board of supervisors fall so far short of the intendments of the Political Code as to be void, and that the initial steps taken are so defective as to be an absolute nullity. Injunction should issue against the planting of trees on defendant's premises. The state of California has provided laws whereby the county may acquire the land of an individual for public purposes, after a full hearing and the payment to the individual of his just damages. Let the plaintiff herein pursue that method.

The judgment is reversed.

SCHMIDT, Justice pro tem.

The appeal in this case is from a judgment entered in the lower court following the sustaining of a demurrer, without leave to amend, to a petition in certiorari, seeking to review the acts and proceedings of the board of trustees of the city of Southgate in annexing to said city of Southgate certain territory known as the Fifth addition to the city of Southgate.

[1] The facts alleged in the petition show that all of the steps for annexation required by the Annexation Act of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 587, and amendments thereto) have been taken, including the passing of "an ordinance declaring the result of the election and approving the annexation * * * and it is hereby ordered that a certified copy of this ordinance giving the date of its passage under the seal of said City of Southgate be submitted to and filed with the Secretary of State of California from and after the date of which filing the annexation of said territory to the City of Southgate shall be deemed to be complete and thenceforth said annexed territory shall be to all intents and purposes a part of the City of Southgate." The petition is silent as to whether the certified copy of the ordinance had been filed with the secretary of state. We must presume that the city clerk of Southgate performed his official duty, and that therefore same has been filed with the secretary of state.

The petition was filed after the city of Southgate assumed to exercise dominion over the annexed lands. The demurrer filed in the lower court was both general and special and by the demurrer it was urged, among other matters, that the proceedings for annexation involved could not be reviewed on a writ of certiorari, but that it was necessary to test their validity by a writ of quo warranto.

[2, 3] An examination of the authorities shows that after all the steps for annexation have been taken, even though there may be some irregularity therein, that the municipal corporation exercises dominion over the annexed lands in at least a de facto capacity. The authorities hold that, before such de facto character has attached, certiorari will lie at the instance of a citizen or taxpayer to secure the annulment of irregular proceedings. On the other hand, the decisions likewise hold that after a de facto character has attached certiorari is not the proper remedy; that the proceedings must then be tested by quo warranto.

Section 803, Code of Civil Procedure, provides: "An action may be brought by the attorney-general, in the name of the people of this state, (1) upon his own information, or (2) upon a complaint of a private party, against * * * (b) any corporation, either de jure or de facto, which usurps, intrudes into, or unlawfully holds or exercises any franchise, within this state. And the attorney-general must bring the action, (1) whenever he has reason to believe that any such * * * franchise has been usurped, intruded into, or unlawfully * * * exercised by any person, or (2) when he is directed to do so by the governor."

In Beaumont v. Samson, 5 Cal. App. 491, at page 492, 90 P. 839, 840, quoting from volume 17, Encyclopedia of Pleading and Practice, it is said: "Certiorari to ministerial boards or officers is not the proper remedy to try * * * the right to exercise corporate functions. Quo warranto is the only remedy which affords complete relief." Jaques v. Board of Supervisors, 24 Cal. App. 381, held the same way and at the conclusion of the opinion, at page 386, 141 P. 404, 406, stated: "We must assume, of course, that the Attorney General will do his duty and that appellants will have no difficulty in obtaining redress by the method thus pointed out, if there be merit in their contention." In Keetch v. Joplin, 157 Cal. 1, 14, 106 P. 222, 228, we read: "The evidence abundantly shows that the district has been organized, and that it has been acting as a district. In other words, that it is a de facto district. It is a public corporation of a similar character to irrigation districts and reclamation districts. The law is well settled that the validity of the organization of such a district cannot be questioned by private individuals, but only in a proceeding in quo warranto at the suit of the state. Quint v. Hoffman, 103 Cal. 506, 37 P. 514, 777; Reclamation District v. Turner, 104 Cal. 335, 37 P. 1038."

In Tulare Irrigation District v. Shepard, 185 U. S. 1, 14, 22 S. Ct. 531, 536, 46 L. Ed. 773, the Supreme Court of the United States says: "Being a de facto corporation, the general rule is that none but the state can call its existence in question. The courts of California agree that such is the rule," citing cases. See, also, Van Wagener v. McFarland, 58 Cal. App. 115, 208 P. 345.

We do not feel that anything in the decision in Miller & Lux v. Board of Supervisors, 189 Cal. 254, 208 P. 304, cited by appellant, affects the conclusion reached herein. That case arose prior to the completion of all the steps required for the formation of an irrigation district.

In view of the foregoing conclusions, it is not necessary to discuss any of the other points raised by appellant.

Judgment affirmed.

Mr. Justice pro tem. TUTTLE delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action brought to recover upon a policy of accident insurance issued by appellant. Judgment for the full amount of the policy, $1,000, was entered for plaintiff, and the appeal is taken therefrom.

On August 14, 1928, appellant issued to Toyokichi Maeda a policy of accident insurance wherein plaintiff was designated as beneficiary in the event of loss of life. Thereafter the insured met his death by drowning. He drove his automobile, in the late afternoon, upon a ferryboat which plies between Ryan Island and Grand Island in Sacramento county. This boat was 30 feet long and 12 feet wide. It was moored to the shore, and was reached by an incline upon the Grand Island side which has a 20 per cent grade. It was raining at the time of the accident. The only witness to the whole occurrence was called by plaintiff. He testified that the insured drove his automobile down the incline toward the boat at a speed of 3 or 4 miles per hour, but, when the four wheels of the car were upon the ferry, the automobile speeded up to some 25 miles per hour, and ran off the end of the boat, plunging into the water. The car was recovered the following morning, and the body of the insured, drowned, was found within it. There was evidence that the brakes upon the car were defective and without lining, so that the car could not be stopped quickly going 10 or 20 miles per hour. There was also testimony that when the car was towed from the scene of the accident, the brakes would not hold properly.

The policy limited recovery to accidental death caused "by the wrecking or disablement of a private automobile," and the first point urged by appellant is that the accident does not come within the foregoing provision. It is conceded that there was no "wrecking" of the car; so the inquiry is limited to the meaning of the word "disablement." It is the contention of appellant that this word "necessarily connotes that there must be damage or injury to the structure of the automobile itself," and that impaired or defective brakes do not come within that category. Respondent takes the position that, by virtue of the defective brakes, there was a "disablement" within the terms of the policy.

[1,2] It is at once apparent that, though it be conceded that the language of the policy is susceptible to the construction contended for by appellant, it must also be conceded that it is susceptible to the construction contended for by respondent, and we are thus confronted by an uncertainty which it is our duty to construe in favor of the insured, as against the insurer. Mah See v. North American Acc. Ins. Co., 190 Cal. 421, 213 P. 42, 26 A. L. R. 123. Disablement does not necessarily imply sudden force or catastrophe. It is defined, in Webster's New International Dictionary, as the "act of disabling or state of being disabled; deprivation of ability; incapacity." Adopting, as we are required to do, a liberal construction of the policy, our conclusion is that, at the time of the accident, there was a "disablement" of the automobile due to the defective condition of the brakes, as this term is used in the policy before us.

[3-5] It is next contended by appellant that the evidence shows that the accident was not caused by defective brakes, but by the fact that the insured mistakenly stepped upon the gas throttle instead of the brake pedal. We cannot say, under the evidence adduced, that the trial court was bound to adopt such a theory. Even though it may appear to our minds more probable that the decedent accelerated his speed while upon the boat, by opening the gas throttle, and that the trial court should have found in favor of appellant upon this issue, it was not compelled to so find upon the evidence. Our courts have frequently held that, even though all the facts are admitted or uncontradicted, nevertheless, if it appears that either one of two inferences may be fairly and reasonably deducted from those facts, there still remains a question of fact to be determined by the jury, and that the verdict of the jury cannot be set aside by this court on the ground that it is not sustained by the evidence. In reviewing a question of this kind, all inferences reasonably possible from the evidence, favorable to plaintiff, must be indulged by the court. Mah See v. North American Acc. Ins. Co., supra. While it is true the insured may have come down the incline at a very slow speed, it is possible, and the trial court may have found, that he may have come down in "low gear," and when he reached the boat he may have disengaged his gears and attempted to rely upon his brakes, which failed him at the crucial moment. In any event, we are satisfied that there is sufficient evidence to justify a finding by the court that the insured plunged into the water and met his death by reason of the fact that his defective brakes failed to hold.

We are satisfied that the accident came within the terms of the policy, and that a proper disposition of the case was made in the trial court, and accordingly the judgment is affirmed.

convicted under count 1 of complaint No. 11775 of unlawfully labeling grapefruit in violation of section 9 of the California Fruit, Nut and Vegetable Standardization Act, as amended in 1929 (Stats. 1929, p. 104); under count 2, of unlawfully selling and offering for sale grapefruit containers, subcontainers, and wrappers upon which were alleged false statements in violation of section 10 of the same act, as amended in 1929 (Stats. 1929, p. 105); under count 3, of labeling for sale and offering for sale deceptive pack of fresh grapefruit by mislabeling said grapefruit "Imperial" as "Imperial Valley Grapefruit"; and under another complaint of unlawfully picking, causing to be picked, sold, and offered to be sold and/or transported grapefruit, the juice of which said grapefruit did not at the time same was sold and offered for sale contain soluble solids equal to or in excess of $5\frac{1}{2}$ parts to every part of acid contained in said juice, the said grapefruit not having remained on the trees after June 1st of the season in which it was picked, in violation of section 20 of the aforementioned act as amended in 1929 (Stats. 1929, p. 1585).

From the conviction in the municipal court, petitioners appealed from the judgment of conviction to the appellate division of the superior court, which court affirmed the convictions. Whereupon petitioners obtained a writ of habeas corpus from this court.

Appellants contend that the California Fruit, Nut and Vegetable Standardization Act of 1927 (Stats. 1927, p. 1845), and amendments thereto in 1929 (Stats. 1929, pp. 102, 177 and 1585), in so far as it applies to grapefruit, and each provision thereof, is invalid, illegal, unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, oppressive, in restraint of trade, taking property, destroying the same, confiscating same without due process of law and without compensation therefor, granting privileges to some and not to all, an arbitrary law without a lawful purpose and without legislative police power or right, and therefore unconstitutional.

The single question calling for determination is whether or not the act, in so far as its provisions refer to grapefruit, is constitutional.

A perusal of the preamble of the act shows the intent of the Legislature in enacting the statute to be (1) to promote the development of the California fruit, nut, and vegetable industry in state, interstate, and foreign markets; (2) to protect the state's reputation; (3) to establish standards and standard containers; (4) to prevent deception in packing, marketing, and sale of fruits, etc.

Section 20 of said act, as amended (St. 1929, p. 1585), provides:

"For the purpose of this section of this act the state shall be divided into districts as follows:

"District 1. That part of the state south of the San Geronio pass in Riverside county and east of the Sierra Nevada range, comprising parts of the counties of Riverside and San Diego and all of Imperial county.

"District 2. All of the state excepting the part included in district 1.

"Citrus fruits, when being packed, or after packing, or when delivered for shipment, loaded, shipped, or being transported, offered for sale or sold, in any container or subcontainer, or in bulk, shall conform to the following standard:

"Citrus fruits shall be mature, virtually free from marked evidence of freezing injury, free from decay and from serious damage caused by splits, cuts, bruises, stem or thorn punctures, or by drying at the stem or blossom end; and in the case of packed citrus fruits shall be virtually uniform in size; provided, that, with the exception of freezing injury, not more than ten per cent. by count, of the citrus fruits in any one container, or in any lot in bulk, may be below these requirements, but not to exceed one-half of this tolerance, or five per cent., shall be allowed for any one cause; provided, further, that any packed, wrapped citrus fruit which has been in storage or shipped by rail and which fails to meet the requirements of this standard only by reason of brown rot, blue mold or green mold which has occurred after packing, shall not be held for violation of the provisions of this act on account of such deterioration. * * *

"Grapefruit shall not be deemed mature under the provisions of this act unless the juice contains soluble solids equal to or in excess of six parts to every part of acid contained in the juices, the acidity of the juice to be calculated as citric acid without water of crystallization; provided, that the grapefruit have attained at least twenty-five per cent. of yellow color before picking; provided, further, that grapefruit produced in district two shall be deemed mature under the provisions of this act if the juice contains soluble solids equal to or in excess of five and one-half parts to every part of acid contained in the juice; provided, that the grapefruit have attained at least twenty-five per cent. of yellow color before picking; provided, however, that grapefruit remaining on the trees after June 1 of each season shall be deemed mature irrespective of analysis of the juice."

[1] There can be no question that an act such as the one here under consideration, if it restricts personal liberty of a citizen, is invalid unless such restriction is necessary for the protection of the public safety, public health, or public morals. As was said in Ex parte Dickey, 144 Cal. 234, 236, 77 P. 924, 925, 66 L. R. A. 928, 103 Am. St. Rep. 82, 1 Ann. Cas. 428: "That the due exercise of the police power is limited to the preservation of the public health, safety, and morals, and that legislation which transcends these objects, whatever other justification it may claim for its existence, cannot be upheld as a legitimate police regulation." Nor can such restrictions be upheld unless in their application they actually effect the object sought to be obtained. Nor can the Legislature under the guise of police regulations enact laws which do not pertain to one or the other of these objects and which impose onerous and unnecessary burdens upon business and property. As was said in Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 32 P. 870, 19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152: "But it is not true that when this power is exerted for the purpose of regulating a business or occupation, which in itself is recognized as innocent and useful to the community, the legislature is the exclusive judge as to what is a reasonable and just restraint upon the constitutional right of the citizen to pursue such business or profession. As the right of the citizen to engage in such a business or follow such a profession is protected by the constitution, it is always a judicial question whether any particular regulation of such right is a valid exercise of legislative power."

Respondent contends that the validity of legislation of the character here presented has been determined by our Supreme Court, and cites Ex parte Kohler, 74 Cal. 38, 15 P. 436, and Ex parte Hayden, 147 Cal. 649, 82 P. 315, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 184, 109 Am. St. Rep. 183, to the proposition "that legislation having for its object the protection of the purchasing public by requiring the proper labeling of articles of food for human consumption is indeed constitutional and a proper exercise of the police power of the state." This proposition was enunciated in each of these cases, and yet each case was decided upon other grounds. Ex parte Kohler is of no help on the question involved in this proceeding. Ex parte Hayden, however, in our opinion, is determinative of this case. That case is very similar to the one at bar; it was one in which the statute required that all fruit shipped or offered for shipment in this state shall have stamped on the container "a statement truly and correctly designating the county and immediate locality in which such fruit was grown." Stats. 1903, p. 338, § 1. The defendant in that case was charged with shipping apples in violation of the act. At page 652 of 147 Cal., 82 P. 315, 317, of the Hayden Case it was said: "It requires merely that every shipment of every package of fruit, whether it be from the small farmers with few trees or vines, or whether it be from the large producer, must in every instance bear a label naming the county and immediate locality in which the fruit was grown. It is a matter of common knowledge that this requirement would work the absolute destruction of certain important branches of industry. * * * It seems quite apparent that the true purpose of the act was to obtain for the fruit raisers of some well advertised and favored localities an advantage in the disposition of their own fruit. But this, for reasons well and elaborately set forth in People v. Hawkins, 157 N. Y. 1 [51 N. E. 257, 42 L. R. A. 490, 68 Am. St. Rep. 736] * * * forms no part of the police power, and is wholly beyond the prerogative of the Legislature."

An examination of the aforementioned section 20 of the California Fruit, Nut and Vegetable Standardization Act shows that the state is divided into two districts, and describes grapefruit maturity as follows: "Grapefruit shall not be deemed mature under the provisions of this act unless the juice contains soluble solids equal to or in excess of six parts to every part of acid contained in the juices, the acidity of the juice to be calculated as citric acid without water of crystallization; provided, that the grapefruit have attained at least twenty-five per cent. of yellow color before picking; provided, further, that grapefruit produced in district two shall be deemed mature under the provisions of this act if the juice contains soluble solids equal to or in excess of five and one-half parts to every part of acid contained in the juice; provided, that the grapefruit have attained at least twenty-five per cent. of yellow color before picking; provided, however, that grapefruit remaining on the trees after June 1 of each season shall be deemed mature irrespective of analysis of the juice." The standard of maturity for grapefruit in district one is that the juice shall contain "soluble solids equal to or in excess of six parts to every part of acid contained in the juices," while in district number two the juice shall contain "soluble solids equal to or in excess of five and one-half parts to every part of acid contained in the juice." (Italics ours.) Under this provision, whatever grapefruit may be grown in district No. 2, if properly labeled, may be sold and consumed in district No. 1, and such sale is not unlawful. How can the public welfare or the public health possibly be affected or benefited by having these two standards when it is not unlawful to sell grapefruit of the lesser standard? This brings it clearly within the terms quoted from Ex parte Hayden, supra. Such classification is neither natural nor reasonable.

[2] A portion of section 20 further provides that the grapefruit shall "have attained at least twenty-five per cent. of yellow color before picking." This provision is uncertain and indefinite. Who shall say what constitutes "at least twenty-five per cent. of yellow color"? Does it import that the fruit shall have progressed, all over its surface, 25 per cent. toward a yellow color, or that 25 per cent. of its surface shall be yellow, the remaining 75 per cent. being some other color? No one can tell. Moreover, we take judicial notice of the fact that grapefruit is never yellow. For that reason, especially no standard is fixed by the act.

Section 20 closes with these words: "Provided, however, that grapefruit remaining on the trees after June 1 of each season shall be deemed mature irrespective of analysis of the juice." If it is lawful to sell the grapefruit that has remained on the trees after June 1 of each season irrespective of the analysis of the juice, then why any standard of test of the juice?

Section 13 of the act (St. 1929, p. 102, § 7) provides as follows: "No provision of this act, except as hereinafter provided in section 21, shall be construed to prevent a grower of fruits, nuts or vegetables in the State of California from selling or delivering the same unpacked and unmarked, as a part of his crop in bulk to a packer for grading, packing or storage; or to prevent a grower or packer from manufacturing the same into any by-product, or from selling the same unpacked and unmarked to any person, firm, company, organization or corporation actually engaged in the operation of a commercial by-products factory for the sole and express purpose of being used in the State of California in the manufacture of a by-product for resale."

This section readily shows that it is class legislation, for it excludes the grower on any sales that he may make, but provides penalties for any one making sales other than the grower. The provisions of a similar section under the same act was held unconstitutional in Mattel v. Hecke, 99 Cal. App. 747, 279 P. 470.

[3] It follows, therefore, that those provisions of the California Fruit, Nut and Vegetable Standardization Act which petitioners were charged with violating and convicted in the municipal court, and in so far as such provisions apply to grapefruit, are discriminatory and unreasonable, and therefore violative of section 11, article 1, of the Constitution of this state. It amounts to the taking of property without due process of law.

No other questions raised need be discussed.

Petitioners are, and each of them is, dismissed.

DUNLAP et al. v. DEAN et al.
Civ. 3734.

109 Cal. App. 300

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Nov. 1, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 1, 1930.

1. Principal and agent ⇨23(1).

Evidence held to establish direct agency as respected principal's liability for merchandise purchased by agent for operation of sheep camp (Civ. Code, § 2307).

It appeared that originally a direct obligation had been assumed by principal for merchandise to be purchased by agents for use in operation of sheep camp, in which principal had an interest, and that sellers of merchandise were conversant with agency and knew that during year supplies were sent from store to sheep camp and bills made in name of agent and thereafter paid by principal, the same procedure appearing in following year, the first bill being sent to principal, and being paid without comment, thereby showing a direct precedent, authorization, and a subsequent ratification and authorization of right of agents to purchase goods and direct obligation of principal to pay for supplies so furnished.

2. Principal and agent ⇨169(2).

Payment by principal of bills for merchandise furnished agent without comment and directly in accordance with authority theretofore given constituted ratification of agent's authority (Civ. Code, § 2307).

3. Principal and agent ⇨103(2).

Principal's payment of bills for merchandise purchased by agents rendered signified authority on part of agents to make purchases (Civ. Code, § 2317).

4. Principal and agent ⇨116(1).

Any secret limitation on authority of agents to purchase supplies at particular store would not affect ostensible agency existing to purchase supplies elsewhere.

5. Principal and agent ⇨21.

Testimony of alleged agent was admissible to establish agency.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Action by A. M. Dunlap and another against A. J. Dean and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J.

In this action for the value of goods, wares, and merchandise furnished to F. E. Brown, now deceased, judgment was entered in favor of the respondent, and plaintiffs appeal.

The record shows that during the years 1923, 1924, and 1925, F. E. Brown owned a band of sheep which was kept and cared for at a camp about 12 miles from a place called Glenburn. Prior to 1925 it appears that the sheep were cared for by Dean, upon shares, and that in the latter part of the year 1924, A. J. Dean and Brown Brothers entered into a lease relative to the management and control of the sheep, whereby it was provided that Dean should take care of the sheep, defray the expenses thereof, etc. The lease also provided that all moneys paid out or advanced by Brown Brothers should be repaid out of the moneys realized from sale of the sheep or from sale of wool, etc. The lease also provided for a division of the sheep at the expiration of the term of the lease. The record also shows that during the year 1923 and 1924 a general merchandise store was conducted at Glenburn by one J. H. Creighton. This store was conducted by Creighton until the first of the year 1925, upon which date it was sold to the plaintiffs in this action. The record further shows that A. N. Dunlap, one of the plaintiffs in this action, was, during the years 1923 and 1924, an employee and clerk in the Creighton store, and that early in the year 1924, F. E. Brown called at the Creighton store in Glenburn, and in the presence of A. M. Dunlap, told Creighton to let A. J. Dean and the boys (referring to the sons of A. J. Dean) have stuff, merchandise, and to send the bill to him or to Mr. Martin, and he would settle it. In this conversation, F. E. Brown also stated that if the bills were sent to Dean, he (F. E. Brown) would settle the bills. The record further shows that Brown stated he would pay the bills for the merchandise. In pursuance of this arrangement the Creighton store furnished the goods, wares, and merchandise which went to the Dean sheep camp, the bills for which were sent to F. E. Brown at his residence in Chico, and paid by him from time to time as the bills were received. The record likewise shows that during all of the time the account was carried in the name of A. J. Dean, and it appears from the record that the sheep camp was spoken of as the "Dean Sheep Camp."

After the plaintiffs, on the 1st of January, 1925, had become the owners of the Creighton Merchandise Store, at Glenburn, F. E. Brown ordered a ton of salt to be sent to the Dean Sheep Camp, and thereafter paid for the same.

Following the transactions which we have here stated, it appears that there was ordered by the Deans during the month of July, 1925, merchandise to the value of $77.14. Included in this order were raisins, peaches, flour, coffee, shoes, pineapples, potatoes, butter, macaroni, soap, inner tube for automobile tire, knives and spoons, cheese, eggs, frying pan, etc. This bill, as stated, was sent to F. E. Brown, at his residence in Chico, who thereafter sent his check to the plaintiffs in payment therefor. Following this, the Deans, including the boys, and a man by the name of Brown, who was working at the sheep camp, called at the store and purchased supplies during the months of August, September, and October; the three bills aggregating the total sum of $349.26. No reply was made by Brown to the receipt of the bills for August, September, and October, until some time during the month of November, at which time Brown wrote to the Glenburn Mercantile Company (being the plaintiffs herein), the following letter:

"A few days ago I got up out of a sick bed and my mail was turned over to me and I find some bills charged to A. J. Dean, and on those bills I find $288.94 charged to him that does not belong to him, or to the sheep. Some time early in the summer a bill came to me of $77.14 that showed on its face that it had been purchased by A. J. Dean. I sent you check for same and when I saw Mr. Dean on October 26 I mentioned it to him and he knew nothing about it, said he had not got anything at Glenburn, and had not authorized anyone to get anything. I knew I had not for I had made arrangements with Summers & Company at Fall City to fill sheep camp orders and send me bills the first of the month, the same as I had made in 1924 with Mr. Creighton. I have sent those bills to S. E. Martin at Klamath Falls and told him to get in touch with A. J. Dean and have them straightened out. You can help straighten them out by sending S. E. Martin or A. J. Dean names of the party or parties that got the various bills and dates of same, for I find that one bill of stuff with name attached, and that is Cook and no initial. When I hear from you as to what they are doing about it I will write you. Looks to me like a bunch of crooks are trying to get in their work. Whoever they are they are laying themselves liable for buying goods under false pretenses. I don't see how Martin can do anything about straightening this out until you send them the names of the purchasers.

"Yours truly,

F. E. Brown."

The record shows that the bills referred to herein were made out just exactly in the same form as the bill for $77.14 paid by the respondent F. E. Brown. The bills likewise show that the goods purchased were similar in kind, and were such as would properly be used at a sheep camp in furnishing food to those engaged in looking after the sheep.

Without quoting the bills, it is sufficient to say that an examination of the bills exhibits just what we have stated as to the character and kind of goods purchased. We may further state that so far as the record discloses the destination of the goods purchased, it shows that it went to the Dean sheep camp. The record further shows that the merchandise ordered from the Glenburn Mercantile Store in 1925 was ordered by the same people as ordered and obtained merchandise from the Glenburn store in 1924.

The testimony of the witness Creighton, relative to the directions given him by F. E. Brown to furnish supplies for the sheep camp, was substantially the same as the testimony of the witness A. M. Dunlap. In reply to the question if he had ever had any conversation with Mr. Brown in regard to payment of bills for supplies to the sheep camp, the witness Creighton replied as follows: "Well, I remember in particular the spring of 1924. Brown said for us to supply the sheep camp and let Dean have what supplies he wanted, and at the end of each month send the statement to him at Chico and he would send a check." No testimony was introduced contradicting this authorization on the part of Brown and the assuming of a direct obligation to pay the bills. It will be noticed that Brown did not say if Dean did not pay the bills when the statements were rendered, that he (Brown) would, but the statement was to let Dean have the supplies and he (Brown) would pay the bill.

While the record shows that in 1925 the sheep were leased to Dean, it also shows that prior to that year the sheep were being managed on shares. Just what the shares were or what the arrangement was the testimony does not disclose, but it does show that during all the time involved in this action the respondent was interested in the welfare of the sheep and furnished a basis for his direct obligation to pay for supplies. The defense of the respondent to this action is based upon the statute of fraud, on the theory that the circumstances disclose a promise to become responsible for the debt or obligation of another, and being oral, was therefore not binding. On the part of the appellants it is contended that the agency was established both directly and ostensibly. We think the record shows both. There was a direct agency during the year 1924, and if not a direct agency during 1925, then an ostensible agency so far as the proprietors of the Glenburn store were concerned. It will be observed that the letter written by the respondent Brown on November 6, 1925, admits the agency of Dean for that year. The letter which we have quoted contains, among other things, the following: "I knew that I had not, for I made arrangements with Sumners & Company at Fall City to fill sheep camp orders and send me bills the first of the month, the same as I had made in 1924 with Mr. Creighton." In other words, the agency of Dean had never been revoked, the only contention of the letter being that the writer had made arrangements with some other merchants to supply provisions.

It will also be noticed that the chief complaint of the respondent was that some of the goods did not go to the sheep camp. As we have said, the record sufficiently shows that this contention is untenable.

After the cause had been submitted for decision, the plaintiffs moved the court for an order to reopen the case and permit the introduction of additional testimony of A. J. Dean, whose whereabouts had been discovered after the close of the trial and whose testimony would be to the effect that Dean was acting as the agent of Brown during the year 1925, and as such, purchased supplies from the plaintiffs in this action, which the respondent F. E. Brown was to pay for. The court denied this motion and thereafter entered judgment in favor of the respondent. This was followed by a motion for a new trial, in which an affidavit was made by the plaintiff A. M. Dunlap relative to the testimony of A. J. Dean, showing that his testimony could not have been obtained prior to the trial, by reason of not being able to discover his whereabouts, and also that the testimony would show that the supplies purchased from the plaintiffs in 1925 were purchased for the use of the sheep camp under the agreement that F. E. Brown was to pay for the same. Plaintiffs' motion for a new trial was also denied.

That the trial court, at the conclusion of the taking of testimony, had a correct view of the law which should be applied in the decision of this cause appears from the following excerpt of the court's statement set forth in the transcript: "The Court: I view it this way: Mr. Brown having made that arrangement with Mr. Creighton allowing the credit to be given and then paying the bills afterwards that were charged in the name of Dean, then when the season came after Mr. Dunlap had taken up the property and taken over the mercantile business, then Dean comes there and secures goods and the first of the month the bill sent to them is paid, no objection is made to the bill, and it is paid; it was charged to Dean. Now, the rule of ostensible authority there would hold that he had the right to come and secure the goods as his agent; and then he allowed the next month and the third month bill sent in. I believe that the facts presented to the court in this case are sufficient for the court to hold that there is a direct liability on the part of the defendant Brown for the goods. Although they were charged to Dean, it was an account carried on by his predecessors."

[1] A direct agency had been established during the year 1924. A direct obligation had been assumed by F. E. Brown for merchandise to be purchased by the Deans for the sheep camp. The plaintiffs in this action were entirely conversant with this agency, and knew that during the year 1924, supplies were sent from the Glenburn store to the sheep camp, bills made in the name of A. J. Dean, sent to F. E. Brown, and thereafter paid by F. E. Brown. The same procedure appears in the first bill sent by the plaintiffs to F. E. Brown. In the course of time after the sending of a statement made out in the name of A. J. Dean for supplies, a check in payment of the value of the goods was sent by Brown to the plaintiffs without any comment whatsoever. Thereafter, three statements were sent to him, and no comment was made upon any of them, nor was anything written by Brown to the plaintiffs, or any word or intimation given by Brown to the plaintiffs that the obtaining of the merchandise, or any part thereof, was unauthorized, until the season had ended, when three bills were disputed on the theory that all the goods did not go to the sheep camp, and, as we have shown, the letter containing this statement contains likewise an express statement of Dean being authorized to purchase supplies, though at a different place.

[2] The testimony of the witness Creighton, the former owner of the mercantile establishment at Glenburn, shows that the merchandise purchased for the sheep camp in 1923 and in 1924 was carried on the books in the name of A. J. Dean, and the same method of entering the account was adopted by the plaintiffs in this action. The authorization and direction being to let Dean have the goods and send the bill to the respondent takes away, we think, all the effect of the argument that as the account was carried in the name of A. J. Dean, it cannot be held as a direct obligation of the respondent, and therefore, the cases holding that where credit is given to the one who purchases the goods, or to the one to whom the goods are delivered, a third person promising to pay for the same stands only in the position of a surety and are not controlling. In this case it is not the collateral promise to answer for the debt or default of another; it is an instance of an owner of personal property directing supplies, or authorizing supplies to be furnished to the person in care of that personal property, upon the direct obligation of the owner giving such direction. From this it follows that the cases cited by respondent, where such circumstances were presented, are inapplicable, and need not be reviewed at length herein. Attention need only be given to the principal case of McClenahan v. Keyes, 188 Cal. 574, 206 P. 454, 457. In that case it appears that a mother whose daughter needed medical attention went to the plaintiff, asked him to give the necessary medical attention, stating that he would be well compensated for his services. There does not appear to be any express or direct promise on the part of the mother to pay for the rendering of the services as a direct and individual obligation on her part. The plaintiff in that case testified as follows: "I was assured to go ahead by all concerned, and I was to be adequately remunerated; no definite statement as to who should do that or as to how or what it should be." We have nothing of that kind in the case at bar. In the instant case we have a direct promise to start with, and a continuation of the dealing of the parties in pursuance of that promise, and then when the ownership of the store changed the same method of dealing. In other words, the dealing started upon a direct and not a collateral promise. Section 2307, Civil Code, reads: "An agency may be created, and an authority may be conferred, by a precedent authorization or a subsequent ratification." The record shows here a direct precedent authorization and a subsequent ratification of the authorization of the right of Dean to purchase goods for the sheep camp, and the direct obligation of the owner of the sheep to pay for the supplies so furnished. The July bill of 1925, to which we have referred, being paid without any word of protest or any inquiry of the plaintiffs, but directly in accordance with the authority theretofore given to the merchandise establishment to furnish such supplies, of which the plaintiffs were aware, constituted, as well, a ratification of the authority of Dean to purchase supplies, and also a holding out that Dean was still the agent of the owner of the sheep for such purpose. In fact, the letter to which we have heretofore referred, written by the respondent, shows that such agency still existed, the change being only an unknown change to the plaintiffs, as to the place of making purchase.

[3] Again, the acts of respondent we think come directly under the provisions of section 2317 of the Civil Code, which reads: "Ostensible authority is such as a principal, intentionally or by want of ordinary care, causes or allows a third person to believe the agent to possess." Whether intentionally or otherwise, it is evident that the payment of the July bill, rendered just as previous statements had been rendered, signified to the plaintiffs that the Deans had authority to make purchases during the year 1925, just as they had during the year 1924.

In 1 California Jurisprudence, p. 742, § 42, we find the rule thus stated: "Where the third person relies upon an ostensible agency, he must give evidence of similar transactions in which the act of the agent was authorized or recognized; or, more accurately, since an ostensible authority may be conferred by the recognition of a single act of the agent if sufficiently unequivocal, the third person must show at least one specific instance in which a similar act of the alleged agent was authorized or recognized." The text-writer then goes on to show that different acts do not indicate authority. Here, however, the acts are all similar. Exactly the same kind of supplies, to all intents and purposes, were purchased in 1924 that were purchased in 1925; the account was carried in the same manner; statements were rendered each month to the respondent; checks forwarded by him in payment thereof; and nothing appeared to the contrary, or disputing the agency or questioning the bills in any particular, until after all the supplies had been furnished. When the respondent, upon receipt of the bill for merchandise for the month of July, 1925, forwarded his check in payment thereof, without any intimation that the right of Dean to make further purchases for the sheep camp had been rescinded, he held out to the plaintiffs, in view of the former dealings with the merchandise store, all that the law requires to establish ostensible agency.

[4] Both appellant and respondent refer to 21 Ruling Case Law, p. 222, § 7, where it is said: "An agency, when shown to have existed, will be presumed to have continued in the absence of anything to show its revocation. Necessarily, however, the agency is terminated with the completion of the transaction for the accomplishment of which it was created, the appellant relying upon the first sentence, the respondents upon the last." The establishment of the agency in this case is apparently conceded. In this behalf it is contended by the respondent that the agency ended with the termination of the year 1924. However, the sheep camp remained in the same place. No notice was given of the termination of the agency. In fact, the duration of the agency was not limited in the original authorization to the year 1924. The act of the respondent was in direct line with the original authorization, and his own letter shows that the agency was not limited to the year 1924, as he had only made arrangements for the purchase of supplies elsewhere. Again, the agency was to purchase supplies for the sheep camp. The people in charge of the sheep camp required supplies just as necessarily in 1925 as they did in 1924; the sheep were at the same camp; the supplies were ordered for the same camp; and the first bill for supplies to the same camp was paid by the respondent without question. Any secret limitation of the authority of the Deans to purchase supplies at some other store would not affect the ostensible agency thus shown to exist.

Without quoting from the text of 2 C. J. p. 460, we think the circumstances set forth herein estop the respondent from denying his liability for the merchandise furnished by the plaintiffs to the Dean Sheep Camp.

The respondent in this case, upon receipt of the July statement, was under the necessity of acting promptly. The law as stated in the case of Quinn v. Dresbach, 75 Cal. 159, 16 P. 762, 7 Am. St. Rep. 138, is controlling in this case. We quote from the syllabus: "Where a person is the agent of another in the commencement of a transaction, and such other is chargeable with knowledge that the first is continuing to act in the matter in some way, the inference which he ought to draw is that the person assuming to act as agent is continuing to act in the same capacity in which he commenced, and it is negligence not to repudiate the agency." Here, it was simply a continuation of the former action, and the respondent is estopped by reason of his negligence in not immediately notifying the plaintiffs upon receipt of the July statement that the authorization theretofore given to purchase supplies and render him directly liable had been withdrawn.

The instant case is very similar to the circumstances involved in Ford v. Lou Kum Shu, 26 Cal. App. 203, 146 P. 199, where it was held that quiescence amounted to acquiescence. That was also a case where the principal had made arrangements with a merchandise firm to furnish supplies to another person, upon the direct obligation to pay therefor; not a collateral promise in the event that the person receiving the goods failed to pay for the same.

In Meyers v. McKillop, 37 Cal. App. 144, 173 P. 773, this court again held as follows: "Where services were performed for the benefit of a third party in reliance that defendant would pay therefor, and defendant directly promised to pay, an original contract was thereby constituted with a sufficient consideration for its support."

A case where the same rule is involved is that of Klamath Lumber Co. v. Co-Operative Land & Trust Co., 25 Cal. App. 678, 145 P. 159, where this court held, under circumstances just as we are considering here, that a direct promise was made, from which it would necessarily follow that a continuation of the business, under like circumstances, would establish an ostensible agency and estop the party making the promise to deny its existence.

In the case of Jan Wai v. Smith-Riddell Co., 55 Cal. App. 59, 202 P. 952, this court, in considering a somewhat similar question, held as follows (quoting from the syllabus): "Actual authority of the president of a corporation to make a particular contract may be proven by its silence after knowledge of facts connected therewith."

[5] What we have said renders it unnecessary to consider whether the court abused its discretion in denying the motion of the appellants to reopen the trial before decision, and admit the testimony of A. J. Dean to establish his agency, which testimony, under the case of Raleigh v. Lee, 26 Cal. App. 229, 146 P. 696, was admissible. Likewise, we do not need to consider whether the court erred in denying the appellants' motion for a new trial in order to introduce such testimony.

Without further review of the authorities cited, we think the circumstances of this case clearly establish ostensible agency, if not actual agency, and that the respondent is estopped by reason of his negligence in not notifying the plaintiffs that the agency had been revoked, immediately upon the receipt of the bill for supplies furnished the sheep camp for the month of July, 1925, and permitting the plaintiffs to continue in the same line of action.

Necessarily the judgment of the trial court should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

All concur.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF PETERSBURG, ILL.,
v. SHIPLEY et al.
Civ. 4138.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Oct. 25, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1).

Findings of trial court must be accepted by appellate court, if supported by any substantial evidence.

2. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨300(1).

Evidence held to support finding that assignment of husband's interest in estate to wife was without consideration and fraudulent as to husband's judgment creditors.

Husband assigned interest in estate to wife shortly after plaintiff commenced action on foreign judgment against husband. Husband claimed that consideration for assignment was debt due wife, accruing forty years prior thereto, and that wife executed deed of trust to property in her name as security for husband's debts, thereby becoming husband's creditor. Assignment was not recorded for more than year after its execution and left husband insolvent.

3. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨104(1).

In determining whether assignment by judgment debtor to wife was fraudulent, court must scrutinize entire transaction with view of detecting fraud.

4. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨308(1, 4).

Questions of fraudulent intent and adequacy of consideration for transfer of property by judgment debtor to wife are questions of fact, requiring exercise of judicial discretion.

5. Appeal and error ⇨931(1).

On appeal every reasonable presumption must be indulged in favor of trial court's findings on questions of fraudulent intent and adequacy of consideration.

6. Evidence ⇨589.

Trial court held not required to believe defendant's testimony sustaining assignment claimed to be fraudulent, though uncontradicted.

7. Evidence ⇨591.

Plaintiff calling defendant as witness under statute did not vouch for defendant's credibility (Code Civ. Proc. § 2055).

8. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨241(4).

Judgment creditor held not required to resort to trust deed on foreign property given as security before seeking to set aside assignment of debtor's property to wife in fraud of creditors (Civ. Code, §§ 2899, 3433).

9. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨312(3).

Where assignment by husband to wife of interest in estate was in fraud of creditors, wife was liable for amount of estate actually distributed to her.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas C. Gould, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of Petersburg, Ill., against Clement W. Shipley and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Modified and affirmed.

Laughlin & Laughlin, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Muhleman, Anderson & Palmer and Frank L. Muhleman, all of Los Angeles, for defendant Davis.

Hughes & Miller, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LUTTRELL, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff and respondent, as the name implies, is a national banking corporation engaged in the banking business in the state of Illinois. Defendants and appellants Clement W. Shipley and Evelyn Shipley are husband and wife. Plaintiff, as a judgment creditor of defendant Clement W. Shipley, instituted the present action against defendants to have a certain assignment which said Clement W. Shipley had made to his wife of his interest in the estate of Faithful W. Ebey, deceased, annulled upon the ground that same was made without consideration and with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors, and particularly the plaintiff. By its complaint plaintiff also sought to have the administratrix of said estate enjoined from paying out or distributing any portion of said estate to said Evelyn Shipley. There was also a prayer for general relief. All of the defendants answered plaintiff's complaint, denying any fraudulent intent in making said assignment and affirmatively alleging that same was made for a valuable consideration. A trial was had upon the issues thus joined, resulting in a judgment in plaintiff's favor setting aside and annulling such assignment and enjoining said administratrix from paying or distributing any portion of said Ebey estate to said Evelyn Shipley. The trial court found that said administratrix had already paid to said Evelyn Shipley out of the funds of said estate, under such assignment, the sum of $12,000, and that said sum belonged to said Clement W. Shipley, and decreed that plaintiff have judgment against said Evelyn Shipley for said amount, and that said sum be applied to the satisfaction of the judgment which plaintiff had theretofore recovered against the defendant Clement W. Shipley.

Defendants Shipley appeal from the judgment upon the grounds of insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings and the judgment and also that the court erred in awarding judgment against defendant Evelyn Shipley in any amount.

[1] The trial court found that the assignment in question was made without any consideration and with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud plaintiff as a creditor of said defendant Clement W. Shipley and, as above stated, that Evelyn Shipley had already received $12,000 under such assignment. Findings having thus been made upon the issues presented, it is incumbent upon this court, upon principles of law too well settled to need citation of authority, to accept such findings if they find any substantial support in the evidence.

To determine this fact it will be necessary to briefly review the evidence adduced at the trial. It appears that defendant Clement W. Shipley was indebted to plaintiff to the extent of something like $12,300 as far back as January 25, 1924, and plaintiff desiring some security on the debt, defendants Shipley, on March 5, 1924, executed a certain trust deed to one Edwin S. Waldmire of Petersburg, Ill., covering 976 acres of land situated in the state of Missouri, the record title to which stood in the name of Evelyn Shipley, which land said Clement W. Shipley testified was worth $25 per acre. Waldmire agreed to sell the land and apply the proceeds to the payment of Shipley's debt to plaintiff, paying the surplus, if any, after deducting commission and expenses, to Evelyn Shipley, her heirs or assigns. It was also agreed that in the event Clement W. Shipley paid his debt to plaintiff before such land was sold, the trustee should reconvey the land to said Evelyn Shipley, her heirs or assigns. The evidence shows that this land was acquired by the Shipleys in the year 1923; the husband, Clement W. Shipley, having traded some property which he owned in Mississippi for same, taking the title to the Missouri land in his wife's name. On July 1, 1925, Shipley gave his two promissory notes to plaintiff in renewal of notes covering the debt he owed, the two renewal notes aggregating $12,300, payable six months after date with 6 per cent. interest. On November 4, 1925, plaintiff secured a confessed judgment against Shipley on the two notes in the circuit court of Menard county, Ill., in the sum of $14,018.75 and costs, and on the 21st of the same month filed suit on this judgment against Shipley in the superior court of Los Angeles county, Cal. Six days after the filing of this last-mentioned suit, or on November 27, 1925, the assignment which is the subject of controversy in this action was made by Shipley to his wife. The assignment was accepted by the wife on that same day and by the administratrix of the Ebey estate three days later, but for some unexplained reason was not filed as a record in the estate papers until some thirteen months after its execution, or on December 17, 1926. Plaintiff's action on the Illinois judgment was contested in the Los Angeles court by defendant Shipley, he having filed his answer therein on December 17, 1925, but the plaintiff prevailed in the suit and on September 27, 1927, recovered a judgment for the sum of $15,879.55 and costs. The value of Clement W. Shipley's interest in the Ebey Estate at the time he made the assignment thereof to his wife was about $20,000. At that time he owed, in addition to the judgment which plaintiff had secured against him, about $700 to various other creditors. The assignment of his interest in the Ebey estate left him wholly insolvent, as he had no other funds or property.

In justification of the assignment in question the appellants contend that at the date thereof Evelyn Shipley was a creditor of her husband, and that in making the assignment he simply exercised a right which the law gave him of making a preference among his creditors. The basis of their claim that she was her husband's creditor is twofold: First, that some forty years before she had let him have some money, the amount not being mentioned in the testimony, and that he had promised to pay it back with interest; and, secondly, that in executing the trust deed covering the Missouri property to Waldmire, as security for the husband's debt to plaintiff, she became his creditor. In connection with the making of this trust deed, appellants contend that the property thus conveyed in trust became the wife's separate property, when the title was taken in her name, and that to induce her to sign the trust deed he promised to convey to her his interest in the Ebey estate. It is an admitted fact that at the time of this alleged promise Faithful W. Ebey was still living.

The two appellants were the only witnesses who gave oral testimony at the trial, aside from brief testimony given by the attorney for the Ebey estate as to its value and the portion thereof already distributed. Because of such fact that the appellants gave practically all of the evidence in the case, other than the documentary evidence, they insist that the trial court was bound to take their uncontradicted testimony on the questions of fraudulent intent and lack of consideration for the transfer, as true, and that therefore the findings to the effect that their claims in these respects were false are contrary to and unsupported by the evidence. They further contend that when plaintiff called Clement W. Shipley as a witness, it thereby vouched for his credibility and was bound by his testimony. In support of this latter contention they cite the case of Hopkins v. White, 20 Cal. App. 234, 128 P. 780.

[2] We have carefully considered these contentions of appellants and fail to find therein any reason for overturning the judgment of the court below. There is no question but what, had the wife been a bona fide creditor of her husband, he would have been within his legal rights in preferring her as a creditor and that an honest transfer of property for such purpose would stand. However, in the case before us, as heretofore stated, the trial judge, after hearing all of the evidence adduced, and after observing the witnesses upon the stand, noticing their demeanor while testifying, their manifestations of interest, or lack of interest in the result of the trial, and having before him all of the surrounding circumstances, decided that these appellants were untruthful in giving their testimony. He doubtless considered, as he had a right to do, the confidential relationship of the parties to the transfer; the age of the debt claimed to be owing by the husband to the wife; the fact, as the evidence showed, that no book accounts or other writings had ever existed between the appellants with reference to such forty year old debt; the insolvency of the assignor as a result of the assignment; the short interval of time elapsing between the recovery of the Illinois judgment against appellant Clement W. Shipley and the filing of suit thereon in California and the assignment; the great length of time between the contracting of the claimed debt of the husband to the wife and its attempted payment; the claim that this so-called debt was being paid by this transfer of $20,000 worth of property, in the face of the claim of appellants that about two years before the husband had given the wife property in Missouri worth $24,400 by taking the title thereto in her name; the claim that such Missouri property was her property, although acquired with property of the husband; the delay in making any public record of the assignment for more than a year after its execution; and other suspicious circumstances surrounding the transaction. In the face of such a record, the trial judge could well conclude that the transfer in question was fraudulent and without consideration, and that, as from the findings made, he evidently did conclude, there was no debt owing by the husband to the wife, and that the property in Missouri, though standing in the wife's name, was in fact his property.

[3-5] In cases of this kind the court is called upon to carefully scrutinize the whole transaction with a view of detecting any fraud which may have prompted it. Questions of fraudulent intent and of adequacy of consideration are questions of fact, calling for the exercise of judicial discretion, and upon appeal, every reasonable presumption must be indulged in favor of the action of the trial court. Commercial National Bank, etc., v. Roberts, 49 Cal. App. 764, 194 P. 751.

[6] The trial court was not obligated to believe the testimony of the appellants, even though uncontradicted by other evidence. As was said in the case of Caldwell v. Weiner, 203 Cal. 543, 264 P. 1100, 1101:

"While it is a general rule that the uncontradicted testimony of a witness to a particular fact may not be disregarded, but should be accepted by the court as proof of the fact, this rule has its exceptions, and the most positive testimony may be contradicted by the circumstances in evidence in connection with the matter which satisfy the court of its falsity and the manner of the witness in testifying may impress the court with a doubt as to the accuracy of his statement and influence it to disregard his positive testimony as to a particular fact."

To the same effect are the cases of Michener v. Hutton, 203 Cal. 604, 265 P. 238, 59 A. L. R. 480; Quock Ting v. United States, 140 U. S. 417, 11 S. Ct. 733, 851, 35 L. Ed. 501.

[7] Plaintiff did not vouch for the credibility of the defendant Shipley by calling him as a witness, as the record shows that he was called under the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The case of Hopkins v. White, supra, relied upon by appellants in this regard, is not in point, as same was decided before the enactment of the salutary provisions found in section 2055 of the Code.

[8] Appellants, under their claim that the relationship of debtor and creditor exists between them, as hereinbefore mentioned, further contend that it was incumbent upon respondent to resort to the security given it by the execution of the trust deed herein mentioned before looking to the interest of Clement W. Shipley in the Ebey estate for satisfaction of its judgment. In this connection they rely upon sections 2899 and 3433 of the Civil Code of this state. There is, in our opinion, nothing to this point. The first of the sections of the Code mentioned deals exclusively with liens on property of a debtor, and in no sense of the word can we see that Evelyn Shipley had a lien upon any of her husband's property. The second section mentioned deals with the relative rights of different creditors. The court having found that the purported assignment was null and void, certainly Evelyn Shipley acquired no interest under it in or to any portion of the Ebey estate, and, too, under the claims as made by the appellants, and particularly in view of the findings as made by the trial court, we do not believe that she placed herself in any position to lay any claim to her husband's interest in such estate on any account, or to complain of respondent's efforts to satisfy its judgment therefrom. From the findings made it would seem that the trial judge took little stock in the claim of appellants that forty years ago the wife had let the husband have some money which was to be paid back some time, or in the claim that the Missouri property belonged to the wife and that to induce her to sign the trust deed to Waldmire the husband promised to assign his interest in the Ebey estate to her, or in the claim that the wife was her husband's creditor on any account. We think the facts and circumstances of the case would fully justify this inference.

In 27 C. J. 564 it is stated:

"Where funds of the wife are received and used by the husband with her knowledge and consent, and no evidence of indebtedness is taken by her, or no claim that he is her debtor is made by her during the lapse of many years, a conveyance in consideration of such funds will not be sustained, especially where it is made after the husband has become insolvent or greatly financially embarrassed."

As to the ownership of the Missouri property and the alleged promise of the husband to assign his interest in the Ebey estate to his wife, provided she would execute the trust deed, the evidence is undisputed that, as hereinbefore stated, this Missouri property was acquired by the husband trading his own Mississippi property for same. His title was merely taken in his wife's name.

[9] One other point requires consideration. The evidence shows that a decree of partial distribution was made in the Ebey estate and that by this decree $12,000 was ordered distributed to Evelyn Shipley, as assignee of her husband. Owing to lack of funds in the hands of the administratrix at the time, however, such administratrix only paid to said Evelyn Shipley the sum of $11,000. As heretofore shown, the trial court found that $12,000 had actually been paid to her and awarded judgment against her for said latter sum. This was an apparent oversight on the court's part, as the evidence is clear and explicit upon the matter. We think that the facts warranted a judgment against her in the sum of $11,000 and that the judgment as rendered should be modified to conform to the proof. The contention of appellants that the court erred in awarding any judgment at all against Mrs. Shipley is untenable. The assignment in controversy being void, the title and ownership of the $11,000 paid over to her remained in the fraudulent grantor as fully as though no assignment had been attempted. First National Bank v. Maxwell, 123 Cal. 360, 55 P. 980, 69 Am. St. Rep. 64; Ohio Electric Car Co. v. Duffet, 48 Cal. App. 674, 192 P. 298. In this last-mentioned case it was held that a creditor has the right to follow the trust property, regardless of the form in which it is found. It was also held in such case that under the prayer for general relief, and under the well-known equitable rule, a court of equity will do full justice in the premises and render such relief as will fully settle the controversy between the parties wherever possible. In the case of Jenner v. Murphy, 6 Cal. App. 434, 92 P. 405, 407, a decree of distribution had been made after the fraudulent deed was executed and the court held that the decree only affected the deed and did not affect the right of a judgment creditor to show who was the real owner of the property. Speaking of such decree of distribution, the court said:

"It cannot bind a court of equity, nor prevent it from investigating the facts, and brushing aside all illegal and fraudulent transfers for the purpose of seizing the assets of the debtor, and applying them to the satisfaction of the judgment creditors' claim. In such a case a court of equity will not be turned aside by shadows, but will grasp the substance—the assets of the fraudulent debtor—no matter where they may be found, and apply them to the payment of the honest creditor."

See, also, Martinovich v. Marsicano, 137 Cal. 355, 70 P. 459.

Applying these principles to the instant case, appellant Evelyn Shipley, having legally acquired nothing under the void assignment, but having actually received $11,000 in cash as a result thereof, is not injured in any sense by reason of a judgment against her for the amount received.

The judgment of the trial court is therefore modified, in so far as same affects appellant Evelyn Shipley, by reducing the amount thereof in the sum of $1,000, and as thus modified, such judgment is, as to both appellants, affirmed.

REYNOLDS et al. v. HOOK et al.

Civ. 245.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Oct. 27, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨676.

Record held sufficient to show that court allowed substitution of party plaintiff.

Plaintiff offered in evidence assignment to him of original plaintiff's interest, and after objection thereto, ruling was reversed. Record disclosed no action by court on reserved ruling, but assignment appeared as plaintiff's exhibit, and court gave judgment in favor of defendants and against plaintiffs for costs.

2. Appeal and error ⇨931(1).

All evidence, with reasonable inferences, tending to sustain findings, must be accepted as true on appeal.

3. Mortgages ⇨32(2).

Deed absolute on face, if intended to secure debt, is mortgage (Civ. Code, §§ 2924, 2925).

Civ. Code, § 2924, provides that every transfer of interest in property, other than in trust, made only as security, is to be deemed mortgage, and section 2925 provides that fact that transfer was made subject to defeasance on condition may, for purpose of showing such transfer to be mortgage, be proved, except as against subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer without notice, although such fact does not appear in instrument.

4. Mortgages ⇨38(2).

To justify finding that deed purporting to convey land in fee simple was intended as mortgage, evidence must be clear and convincing (Civ. Code, §§ 2924, 2925).

5. Mortgages ⇨39.

Whether deed, absolute in form, is mortgage, is mixed question of law and fact, to be determined from all evidence, written and oral, and all facts and circumstances (Civ. Code, §§ 2924, 2925).

6. Mortgages ⇨25(3).

Debt, as security for which absolute deed, intended as mortgage, is given, may be antecedent debt, or one created at the time (Civ. Code, §§ 2924, 2925).

7. Mortgages ⇨32(6).

Great inequality between value of property and price allegedly paid is one of circumstances indicating that deed, absolute in form, is mortgage (Civ. Code, §§ 2924, 2925).

8. Mortgages ⇨27.

Facts alleged in complaint held not to show equitable mortgage.

Complaint alleged in part that owner of property, being unable to pay note secured by trust deed, directed trustee, with creditor's consent, to reconvey property, and as part of same transaction, creditor executed grant deed of property to B., owner's son-in-law, and placed it in escrow, to be delivered to B. upon his paying stipulated amount, and also as part of same transaction B. executed grant deed to owner, conveying undivided one-half, which was likewise placed in escrow.

9. Trial ⇨388(3).

Where complaint did not state cause of action for declaration of equitable mortgage, no finding was necessary.

10. Appeal and error ⇨193(1).

In absence of demurrer to complaint, mere defects in manner of stating facts cannot be considered on appeal.

11. Appeal and error ⇨193(6).

If cause of action be stated, although defectively, complaint not attacked by demurrer must be sustained, notwithstanding ambiguity and uncertainty.

12. Pleading ⇨34(6).

In aid of judgment, complaint must receive as favorable interpretation as its general scope warrants.

13. Account ⇨17(1).

Complaint held to state cause of action for accounting, rather than facts constituting equitable mortgage.

Evidence showed that owner of property gave deed, absolute in form, intended as mortgage; that receiver was subsequently appointed and negotiations entered into for payment; that creditor executed deed of grant to receiver and placed it in escrow to be delivered when certain payments were made; that by receiver's direction, crops from premises were delivered to creditor, who became agent of receiver to sell crops and account for proceeds.

14. Mortgages ⇨197.

Beneficiary under trust deed, authorized by receiver to sell hay from premises, being agent, was charged with utmost good faith and with duty of accounting for proceeds.

WARMER, Justice pro tem.

The transaction out of which this action arose might be stated as follows: In the year 1917 A. W. Reynolds was indebted to Hook Brothers in the sum of $27,000, for which he gave them a note secured by a trust deed on the premises described in the complaint. In March, 1922, the principal and interest on the trust deed was due. Reynolds was unable to pay the same. One of the Hook Brothers notified him, Reynolds, that they would have to foreclose the trust deed. Peter Beatty was a son-in-law of A. W. Reynolds. Beatty, Reynolds, and J. F. Hook, one of the Hook Brothers, began negotiations concerning said indebtedness. There was some friction between the Hook Brothers and Reynolds. W. W. Stewart was the trustee named in the Reynolds trust deed. Reynolds informed Stewart, the trustee, that he was to reconvey the real property, stating that they had made a new deal, and asked Stewart to sign a paper that Mr. Hook would bring to him. Mr. Hook, an hour or two later, brought a paper to Mr. Stewart, which Stewart signed; the same being a reconveyance of the property in the trust deed to Reynolds. However, it was the understanding by Hook, Beatty, Stewart, and Reynolds that the conveyance that was to be executed by Stewart was to have transferred the property to the Hook Brothers, and Reynolds agreed, according to the pleading, to execute a grant deed to said property to the Hook Brothers. This was never done. Prior to these negotiations of March, 1922, the Midvale Farms Company had been operating the real property here involved under a lease, Reynolds had instituted an action against the ranch company, and Beatty was appointed receiver in that action and took charge of this particular property under said receivership. The Midvale Farms Company owed Reynolds about $3,000 rent. About, if not at, the same time when the direction was given to Mr. Stewart to reconvey the said real property, and as a part of the same transaction, Hook Brothers executed a grant deed of said real property to Beatty, and placed the same, together with instructions, in escrow with the First National Bank of Riverside. The said instructions provided that the deed was to be delivered to Peter Beatty upon his paying into escrow $30,000, interest and taxes. The price of $30,000 had been arrived at in the negotiations between Hook Brothers, Beatty, and Reynolds, by adding the sum of $27,000 principal indebtedness under the Reynolds' trust deed and the $3,000 indebtedness of the insolvent Midvale Farms Company. At or about the same time, and as a part of the same transaction, Peter Beatty and his wife executed a grant deed to Reynolds to an undivided one-half interest in the real property. This deed, together with instructions, was placed in escrow in the same bank. The instructions provided for a delivery of the deed upon the payment of $12,500, together with interest thereon. Subsequent to the consummation of this deal, Peter Beatty continued in possession of the property. About two years thereafter it was discovered by Hook Brothers that the real property had been conveyed to Reynolds instead of to the Hook Brothers. Beatty and J. H. Hook took the matter up with Reynolds and secured a quitclaim deed from Reynolds to the Hook Brothers. It is not contended that any adverse interests in said premises arose during said two years. At the same time Hook Brothers extended the term of Beatty's payment to October, 1928, and Beatty extended the term of payment for Reynolds to the same time. About the same time it became necessary to do some work on the well on said property, and the Hook Brothers agreed with Beatty to advance him enough money to pay for this pump and the installation thereof, and they agreed then that the interest on the $30,000 and $12,500 to Hook Brothers and Beatty, respectively, would not become due until the pump was installed. The pump was actually installed August 27, 1924.

Peter Beatty assigned his interest in the cause of action in this particular case to one M. L. Mapes, after the commencement of this action.

Beatty transferred all his right, title, and interest in and to an action entitled A. W. Reynolds, sometimes known as Arzeno W. Reynolds, and Peter Beatty, Plaintiffs, v. J. F. Hook and A. W. Hook, etc., et al., Defendants, by assignment to M. L. Mapes.

Peter Beatty and Flora Beatty, his wife, conveyed by quitclaim deed the premises here in question to Maynard L. Mapes. Under the assignment and conveyance Maynard L. Mapes became the owner of all of the interest and title of Beatty that the court might allow him to be substituted in the action. Code Civ. Proc. § 385; Walker v. Felt, 54 Cal. 386; Douglas v. Moncur, 19 Cal. App. 177, 124 P. 1053; Merced Bank v. Price, 9 Cal. App. 177, 98 P. 383; 123 Am. St. Rep. 299; 20 R. C. L. 686.

[1] It does not appear affirmatively that the court allowed the substitution of M. L. Mapes for Peter Beatty as party plaintiff. However, the amended complaint was filed and answered. The condition of the record was called to the attention of the trial court by plaintiff offering in evidence the said assignment and said quitclaim deed. To such offer objection was duly made and ruling was reserved. Counsel have not called to our attention any action of the trial court on the reserved ruling and we have found none. However, both of the said instruments appear in the record as plaintiff's exhibits and the court must have considered the substitution allowed, for in its judgment it ordered judgment in favor of the defendants and against the plaintiffs for costs. While the record is not clear or satisfactory, we think it sufficient to hold that the court allowed the substitution of M. L. Mapes for Peter Beatty as party plaintiff.

[2] Appellants urge a number of claims that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings; that the deed from Reynolds to Hook Brothers was given as security for the payment of the $27,000 theretofore secured by the trust deed to the property which had been reconveyed. Were the premises conveyed to Hook Brothers as security for a debt, and therefore did the deed constitute an equitable mortgage, or was the instrument what it purported to be on its face, a conveyance of title in fee? On appeal all evidence tending to sustain the findings must be accepted as true, together with all the reasonable inferences that may be drawn therefrom. Bancroft-Whitney v. McHugh, 166 Cal. 140, 134 P. 1157; Hind v. Oriental Products Co., 195 Cal. 655, 235 P. 438; Delannoy v. Quetu, 73 Cal. App. 627, 239 P. 71.

The complaint alleges in part that the plaintiff A. W. Reynolds, in consideration of said note being canceled, the title to said land being reconveyed, and other considerations therein mentioned, was to execute and deliver to Hook Brothers a grant deed to said land, in the place and stead of said trust deed, as security for said indebtedness. The answer alleges in part a mistake on the part of the trustee named in said trust deed, in reconveying the property to Reynolds, the trustor in said trust deed, and then alleges as follows: "That in order to rectify said mistake, said A. W. Reynolds agreed to execute and deliver to said J. F. Hook and A. W. Hook a grant deed to the said premises inadvertently reconveyed to said A. W. Reynolds by said Trustee W. W. Stewart as aforesaid."

The court finds that the said A. W. Reynolds agreed to execute and deliver to said J. F. Hook and J. W. Hook a grant deed to said premises inadvertently conveyed to said Reynolds by said trustee W. W. Stewart as aforesaid. There is evidence that Hook Brothers knew nothing of the fact that the reconveyance was made to A. W. Reynolds for approximately two years thereafter, at which time negotiations were begun that resulted in the execution and delivery of a quitclaim deed from Reynolds to Hook Brothers of the said premises. Whether or not Reynolds and Hook Brothers agreed that the trustee, W. W. Stewart, should convey the premises to Hook Brothers, and by proper instrument authorized him so to do, or whether the trustee, W. W. Stewart, was to reconvey the property in usual form to Reynolds, the trustor, and Reynolds was to convey the premises to Hook Brothers, is immaterial, being only the plan or method for accomplishing the result—when no intervening rights are claimed.

If the original contract had been fulfilled by Reynolds, as well as by the others who were parties thereto, would it have created an equitable mortgage instead of a conveyance absolute? If so, then an equitable mortgage was created by the agreement in the manner in which it was carried out as between the parties thereto, and no one gained any right or lost any right by the failure of Reynolds to immediately deliver a deed as agreed.

"Every transfer of an interest in property, other than in trust, made only as a security for the performance of another act, is to be deemed a mortgage," etc. Civ. Code, § 2924.

"The fact that a transfer was made subject to defeasance on a condition, may, for the purpose of showing such transfer to be a mortgage, be proved (except as against a subsequent purchaser or encumbrancer for value and without notice) though the fact does not appear by the terms of the instrument." Civ. Code, § 2925.

[3, 4] That a deed absolute on its face is in fact intended to be a mortgage and is a mortgage, if intended as security for a debt, is a rule recognized in California, and finds support in numerous decisions. 17 Cal. Jur. 737, and cases there cited; Boal v. Gassen, 178 Cal. 132, 172 P. 588; Lamberson v. Bashore, 167 Cal. 387, 139 P. 817; Shirey v. All Night and Day Bank, 166 Cal. 50, 134 P. 1001. The evidence is required to be clear and convincing to justify a court in finding that a deed which purports to convey land in fee simple was intended to be a mortgage. Beckman v. Waters, 161 Cal. 581, 119 P. 922; Lynch, as Executrix, v. Lynch, 22 Cal. App. 653, 135 P. 1101.

In Couts v. Winston, 153 Cal. 686, 96 P. 357, 358, the court uses the following language: "If therefore the evidence offered by plaintiffs, taken by itself, was sufficiently 'clear, satisfactory and convincing' to satisfy the trial court that the deed was in fact a mortgage, the finding made cannot be overthrown merely because numerous witnesses, whose character is not impeached, gave positive testimony to the contrary effect."

In Wadleigh v. Phelps, 149 Cal. 627, 637, 87 P. 93, 98, the court said: "The appellate court * * * will not disturb the finding of the trial court to the effect that the deed is a mortgage, where there is substantial evidence warranting a clear and satisfactory conviction to that effect. All questions as to preponderance and conflict of evidence are for the trial court."

In Keese v. Beardsley, 190 Cal. 465, 213 P. 500, 501, 26 A. L. R. 1538, we find the following: "In dealing with a deed absolute given as security, we are not bound by the rule that writings cannot be contradicted by parol, and it is therefore permissible to establish the agreement of the grantor by his acquiescence in a statement made by or on behalf of the persons for whose security the obligation is given."

In Boal v. Gassen, 178 Cal. 132, 172 P. 588, 589, the court said that "the continued existence of a debt is, no doubt, a circumstance tending to show that a conveyance is a mortgage."

[5-7] Whether a deed, absolute in form, be a mortgage or not, is a mixed question of law and fact, to be determined from all the evidence, written and oral, and in determining it, all the facts and circumstances attending the transaction should be considered. Husheon v. Husheon, 71 Cal. 407, 12 P. 410. The debt to secure which a deed is given, may be an antecedent debt, or one created at the time. One of the circumstances tending to show that a deed, absolute in form, is only a mortgage, is the fact when it appears that there is a great inequality between the value of the property conveyed and the price alleged to have been paid for it. Husheon v. Husheon, supra. In order to hold the conveyance to Hook Brothers to be an equitable mortgage, Beatty must in some way have the right of a redemptioner under the mortgage. Being a stranger to the trust deed and to the transaction, he could not be in the position of a redemptioner. No debt was subsisting as between Beatty and Hook Brothers that was in any way, even remotely, connected with the trust deed or later transaction with Beatty. There was no question of adequacy or inadequacy of the price paid. He (Beatty) was coming into a new obligation as between Beatty and Hook Brothers. He had given no title to Hook Brothers and Hook Brothers got no title, equitable or legal, from him. None of his debts to Hook Brothers, if any, were purported to be paid or affected by this transaction, either as to the past or the future. Reynolds agreed to convey (and later did convey) these premises to Hook Brothers, knowing that they had or were to enter into an agreement with Beatty, and under such agreement with Beatty, if the same was finally completed by Beatty, Hook Brothers would be bound to convey the title to said premises to Beatty. Further, Reynolds entered into an agreement with Beatty, whereby he was to get one-half of the same premises from Beatty, who, in turn, must get his title to be delivered to Reynolds from Hook Brothers. Reynolds agreed to convey to Hook Brothers, knowing that Hook Brothers intended to agree to sell to Beatty, and Reynolds bought from Beatty, knowing that Beatty was depending on the reconveyance from Hook Brothers for the title he agreed to convey to him, Reynolds.

If, under such circumstances, an equitable mortgage was created, as to Beatty, he could, by the payment of the $27,000 for the equitable mortgage thus created, secure the property which he agreed to pay $30,000 for, in the escrow. If an equitable mortgage was created as to Reynolds, he could rightfully demand a satisfaction of the mortgage by the Hook Brothers, by the payment of the $27,000 and interest. Beatty could not get any title from Hook Brothers through his performance of his agreement with them, and hence could not deliver the deed to Reynolds which he had agreed to do. Under such circumstances Reynolds could bring an action against Beatty for the breach of a contract and failure to deliver title to the land that he himself had title to. All of these conditions are made possible because of the act of Reynolds himself in conveying said premises in fee absolute in form, that is, Reynolds conveyed to Hook Brothers by deed absolute in form, knowing Hook Brothers were to agree to sell to Beatty and Beatty relying upon the conveyance from Hook Brothers under the Reynolds deed, was to agree to, and did convey, a one-half interest in said premises to Reynolds himself.

In Chapman v. Hicks, 41 Cal. App. 158, 182 P. 336, 338, the court says: "The test of a mortgage is whether the relation of debtor and creditor continues so that there is a subsisting debt after the conveyance (citing cases); and where a deed, absolute on its face, is given to secure a debt, it will be held to be a mortgage even though the parties stipulate it shall be an absolute conveyance (Hodgkins v. Wright, 127 Cal. 688, 60 P. 431. * * *). The intention of the parties must govern, and it matters not what particular form the transaction may take. If the deed is made for the purpose of securing the payment of a debt, it is a mortgage 'no matter how strong the language of the deed, or any instrument accompanying it may be.'" Citing Woods v. Jensen, 130 Cal. 200, 62 P. 473. See, also, Locke v. Moulton, 96 Cal. 21, 30 P. 957.

[8, 9] The facts above discussed were all alleged in the complaint, and it is claimed they constitute a pleading of an equitable mortgage, but with this contention we cannot agree for the reasons hereinbefore stated. The pleading not stating a cause of action for the declaration of an equitable mortgage, no finding is necessary.

[10-14] We are aware that much criticism has been directed to the use of the demurrer. This cause certainly aptly illustrates the necessity for the use of such a pleading. If such a pleading had been used in this case, undoubtedly the cause could and would have been tried in less time and upon a theory that both parties would have at least known. Where no demurrer has been interposed to a complaint, mere defects in the manner of stating the facts relied on cannot be considered on appeal. The complaint must be sustained if a cause of action be stated, though defectively, notwithstanding the ambiguity and uncertainty that may exist there, and in aid of the judgment the complaint must receive as favorable an interpretation as its general scope will warrant. Fudickar v. East Riverside Irrigation Dist., 109 Cal. 29, 41 P. 1024. Taking the complaint by its four corners, we are of the opinion that it states a cause of action for an accounting. The record discloses that Hook Brothers executed a deed to Beatty and placed it in escrow, with instructions to deliver the same to him when certain payments were made, and in the event said payments were not made the said deed was to be returned to Hook Brothers; that certain crops from the ranch premises described in said deed were delivered to Hook Brothers by Beatty during the time Beatty farmed the premises himself. Also during that time Beatty sold some of the hay grown on the premises and gave Hook Brothers orders on the purchasers for the payment thereof. Further, Beatty leased the said premises with the consent of Hook Brothers. By the terms of said leases Beatty was to receive a portion of the crops and the tenants a portion; that Beatty directed the tenant to deliver his portion of the crops to Hook Brothers. The tenant did deliver the crops to Hook Brothers, as directed. Beatty kept no account of the quantity of hay or number or amount of orders for the payment for hay that he delivered to Hook Brothers, and relied on the Hook Brothers to keep the account. The Hook Brothers admit receipt of some of said hay and of some of said orders, claiming the money received therefor was applied as payment on other indebtedness that Beatty owed them. In such circumstances Hook Brothers were the agents of Beatty for the sale of the hay and collection of the orders. They took the money so received by them and applied it on Beatty's indebtedness, if any, other than the indebtedness of this transaction. As agents for Beatty they were charged with utmost good faith and with the duty of accounting to him for the money received for the hay, and the money received for the orders given them. Allsopp v. Joshua Hendy Machine Works, 5 Cal. App. 228, 90 P. 39; Calmon v. Sarraile, 142 Cal. 638, 76 P. 436.

There is no evidence in the record to show how much Beatty owed Hook Brothers other than the sum arising in this transaction, or what was the value of the hay delivered to Hook Brothers or the value of the orders on the purchasers for the payments for hay that had been delivered to Hook Brothers. Yet Beatty was entitled to know what was received for said hay and on said orders delivered to Hook Brothers. What his other indebtedness consisted of, and whether or not there was any balance that should have been applied on the indebtedness arising out of this transaction, is not shown. Assuming, without deciding, that Hook Brothers had the right to apply the total sum received by them on some other indebtedness, if any, the record being silent on the amount received by them and the condition of Beatty's accounts, except the indebtedness shown in this transaction, there is no way to determine whether or not the payments called for in the escrow instructions had been made and an accounting by the Hook Brothers is necessary to determine that fact. In order to hold that the payment had not been made on the indebtedness arising out of this transaction, we would have to assume that the said hay and said orders that were delivered to Hook Brothers were in an amount less than enough to pay the account and the payments called for in this transaction, without evidence as to how much money Hook Brothers got from the said hay and said orders and without evidence to show how much or what they were to pay. In other words, to balance an account without knowledge of any of the charges or credits is impossible. An accounting was therefore necessary to determine the rights of the parties, and a finding should have been made to that effect. The evidence was insufficient to support the finding: "That by reason of the failure of said Peter Beatty to comply with the terms of said escrow agreement and of the said extension thereof, as aforesaid, said Peter Beatty, his successors and assigns forfeited all right, title and interest in, and under said escrow agreement and said extension agreement and all right, title and interest in and to the premises covered thereby, and that said J. F. Hook and A. W. Hook, or their successor in interest, are now the owners of said premises free and clear of any interest of said plaintiffs, or either of them."

There are numerous other objections raised as to the sufficiency of certain findings, and certain other errors are claimed by the appellants; but inasmuch as we have found that an accounting is necessary and that an accounting must be taken and had to determine the rights of the parties, it is unnecessary to determine any of the other specifications of error.

Judgment reversed.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by plaintiff, M. J. Mertens, from a judgment entered against him in an action for rescission of a real estate contract and the recovery of the money paid by him thereunder.

The facts are briefly these: On January 11, 1929, the plaintiff, M. J. Mertens, agreed in writing to buy from defendant, John C. Berendsen, for the sum of $150,000, a lot at the northeast corner of Kearny and California streets in the city of San Francisco, together with a three-story concrete building situated thereon. Plaintiff paid $1,000 on account of the purchase price when the contract was signed. The contract provided that plaintiff "has only seven days in which to report any defects in either title or survey, after the expiration of which seven days he waives the right to make any claim for return of deposit because of any alleged defects in title or survey."

Within the seven days plaintiff served a written notice of rescission and a demand for the return of the deposit of $1,000, specifying in said notice the fact that both the title and survey were defective by reason of the fact that the building overlapped onto California street. The defendant refused to return the deposit. The overlap of the building on the street was admitted by defendant; the only conflict being as to the extent thereof.

The court found, among other things, as follows:

Finding No 4: "That on said January 11, 1929, the building on said premises encroached on property belonging to the city and county of San Francisco for a length along the California street frontage of at least 35 feet and to the extent of two inches on the westerly end, tapering to an encroachment of seven-eighths of an inch at the easterly end, and that such encroachment still continues. That said encroachment consists only of the marble veneer at base of building and a slight overlap of the concrete behind the marble."

This finding is supported by the evidence.

The sole question presented here is whether or not the admitted encroachment renders the title to the property in question unmarketable.

[1, 2] A marketable title is one that is free from reasonable doubt. Cummings v. Dolan, 52 Wash. 496, 100 P. 989, 132 Am. St. Rep. 986; Todd v. Union Dime Sav. Inst., 128 N. Y. 636, 23 N. E. 504; Walters v. Mitchell, 6 Cal. App. 410, 92 P. 315; Muller v. Palmer, 144 Cal. 313, 77 P. 954, and cases there cited; Vought v. Williams, 120 N. Y. 253-257, 24 N. E. 195, 196, 8 L. R. A. 591, 17 Am. St. Rep. 634, and cases there cited.

In this last case the court said: "A marketable title is one that is free from reasonable doubt. There is reasonable doubt when there is uncertainty as to some fact appearing in the course of its deduction, and the doubt must be such as affects the value of the land, or will interfere with its sale. A purchaser is not to be compelled to take property the possession of which he may be compelled to defend by litigation. He should have a title that will enable him to hold his land in peace, and, if he wishes to sell it, be reasonably sure that no flaw or doubt will arise to disturb its market value."

Again, in Empire Realty Corporation v. Sayre, 107 App. Div. 415, 95 N. Y. S. 371, 373, the court said: "It is undoubtedly the rule of law that a purchaser will not be compelled to take property, the possession of which he may be obliged to defend by litigation. He should have a title that will enable him to hold his land free from probable claim by another, and one that, if he wishes to sell, would be free from any reasonable doubt that would interfere with its market value."

In Walters v. Mitchell, supra, speaking of marketable titles, the court said: "One who contracts to purchase land from a vendor who agrees to give a good title has the right to a title free from reasonable doubt or litigation.

Where the eaves of an adjoining house overhang the property, the purchaser is not required to accept a parol promise to remove the same."

Many other cases from our own and other jurisdictions could be cited to the same effect.

Under the authorities and the findings of the court, we see no escape from the conclusion that the admitted encroachment of the building on California street renders the title to the property in question unmarketable—that is, with this encroachment of the building on the street, the title is not free from reasonable doubt or litigation. The purchaser might be called upon at any time to remove the building from the street, and, in case of a sale, the prospective purchaser would, as a reasonable man, do just as plaintiff is doing here—object to taking the title. The defendant has offered nothing in the way of correcting the encroachment, but merely says it does not amount to anything. We do not believe that plaintiff should be compelled to take all the chances and to expend a large sum of money for property, the title to which might at any time be questioned.

We conclude, therefore, under the findings of the court, that judgment should have been for plaintiff for the return of the deposit of $1,000.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter a judgment in favor of the plaintiff as prayed for in his complaint.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from an order granting a new trial, after a verdict of a jury in favor of the defendant. The action is one for damages for personal injuries resulting from an automobile accident.

The order granting the new trial reads in part as follows: "The motion for a new trial in behalf of plaintiffs in the above-entitled case, coming on regularly to be heard, and said motion having been submitted to the court for decision, and the court having very carefully considered the points urged by counsel, and having a clear recollection of the conduct of the trial, now orders that said motion be, and the same is, hereby granted. On the question of the sufficiency of the evidence, the court finds that the evidence was sufficient to warrant a verdict in favor of either party."

[1] The insufficiency of the evidence cannot be urged in support of the order because it is not specified in the order as one of the grounds therefor. Section 657, Code Civ. Proc.; Murphy v. Zwieg, 100 Cal. App. 266.

279 P. 1062. The sole question is whether the trial court abused its discretion in granting plaintiffs' motion for a new trial.

[2] Plaintiffs predicated their motion for a new trial upon practically all of the grounds enumerated in section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but urged as the main specification of error the alleged prejudicial misconduct upon the part of counsel for defendant.

The plaintiffs were riding in an automobile borrowed from one H. H. Summers, who was not a party to this action, but he had already sued the defendant, Bonslett, in another action for damages to his automobile. A Mr. Boysen, an insurance broker representing Summers, interviewed the defendant, Bonslett, the day after the accident. A Mr. Schmitt assisted the plaintiffs' counsel in preparing this case for trial, but was not called as a witness, but was mentioned by the witness Anderson as the man who obtained his signature to an affidavit. Anderson was asked upon cross-examination as to what Schmitt's business was, and replied, "One of them is insurance and the other is law, I believe."

It is readily apparent, from an examination of the record, that counsel for defendant, throughout the entire trial and during his closing argument attempted to convey to the jury the idea that an insurance company was the real party in interest behind the plaintiffs' case. The record in this case is replete with improper statements and prejudicial remarks on the part of counsel for defendant in his closing argument. The following excerpts from the record will be sufficient to illustrate the nature of the remarks and objections of counsel, and admonitions of the court with reference thereto, to wit:

"Mr. Hoey (Counsel for Defendant): Now if the Glenn Falls Insurance Company was obliged to pay Mr. Summers for damage to his car, why didn't they go and pay it? Why should they have their agent going around and trying to collect their damages from somebody else? But he says he remembered when they had the suit for the property damage. Of course he did. He was an interested party as an agent there. He wanted his insurance company to get the money that they had to pay to Summers as a result of this accident. * * * Now the insurance man from San Francisco (meaning Schmitt), he is the man that is handling the case. He is the man that is going to make old Jake Bonslett pay. He is the man who talks it over with these people and he is the man who talked it over with the family and he is the one who is handling this situation. We have also as part of this case to say that perhaps people were influenced by him. * * * This case was submitted to a jury one time before and the jury brought in a verdict in favor of the defendant.

"Mr. Wallace (Counsel for Plaintiffs): If the Court please, we will object to that statement of counsel.

"The Court: Now, Mr. Hoey, that is misconduct on your part and the jury will disregard any remarks made by counsel as to the former trial of this case.

"Mr. Wallace: We would like, for the sake of the record, to assign it as prejudicial error, Your Honor, and ask Miss Raffetto (the reporter) to note that.

"The Court: The court will admonish the jury to entirely disregard that remark.

"Mr. Hoey: Do I understand that I can't comment on any of the papers in the case?

"The Court: You can't comment upon what the action of the jury did in this case before. If you were to be allowed to do that then the other side would be allowed to say that the Judge granted a new trial.

"Mr. Hoey: Well, I expected to say that and—

"The Court: Well, there should be no reference at all to the disposition of the case at the former trial. * * *

"Mr. Hoey: I always understood that the papers were evidence in the case.

"The Court: Well, what papers?

"Mr. Hoey: Well, the papers were—the affidavits that were filed by the people to have the court grant a new trial.

"The Court: Well, they have nothing to do with the case. They were not introduced in evidence.

"Mr. Hoey: Well, one of them was referred to.

"The Court: All cases should be disposed of on the basis of the evidence before the court and arguments should be confined to that. * * *

"Mr. Hoey (continuing with his argument): There is evidence before the court that in the matter of granting a new trial one of the grounds is newly discovered evidence. * * * It seems to me that Mr. Schmitt, the insurance man from San Francisco, with all his ability and all of his years of experience would have gone up to that garage the first time and had a conversation with this boy, or somebody else. * * * That dent, in my judgment, was put in there with a sledge hammer and not with a bumper of an automobile. * * * Now, ladies and gentlemen of the jury, why was this jury asked—why were you asked, ladies and gentlemen of the jury, if you were a policy holder and a stockholder in some—I don't remember the name of the Company—Zurich Insurance Company? Why were you asked that question if it wasn't intended that that company or some other company was to be injected in this case.

Why were you asked if you were a member of the California Automobile Association? I will tell you why: The California Automobile Association writes insurance. Mr. Sturm, I think, is the only man on this jury that belongs to that organization. They want to leave the impression with you that Jake Bonslett has an insurance company behind him and that if you render a verdict that the insurance company will pay it and not Jake Bonslett. The insurance man behind this case is Mr. Schmitt, the man who is peddling around, and Mr. Boysen, the man who never appeared before you. He is the insurance man, Mr. Schmitt is the insurance man involved in this case. This case occurred on December 21, 1928. There was no damage suit until June 3, 1929, a long time after it occurred and sufficient time elapsed to permit these plaintiffs, with their insurance director there, and not one but two people who were not new at the game, who have been sued themselves, who knew how to collect evidence, who had the evidence concealed in their own brain, so they tell you now—they didn't tell you before. Know just what to do, but they didn't file a complaint until June 23, 1929, and you decide just what is behind this case: Whether or not it is Mr. Bonslett or another insurance company, and you determine in your own mind how much Mrs. Mangino is going to get out of it. Why these people are particularly interested in it. The question was asked you and you make that charge now and if it isn't true. * * * The question was asked you if you were interested in an insurance company. Mr. Bonslett is well able to pay whatever judgment perhaps would be rendered against him in a fair case. He doesn't want to deny any liability. I don't know how about his financial condition and I don't believe the neighbors are bringing in coal and potatoes to keep him in comfort, and I don't believe it is fair for counsel to try to leave an impression with this jury that Jake Bonslett or somebody else is insured and the insurance company will pay the bill. The insurance company on the other side of the case are the ones that are trying to gouge Jake Bonslett in this case. * * * Just how would you feel if you were brought in as a defendant in a personal injury suit and thereafter for reasons that perhaps you will not be informed of the matter was retried and then during the interim when these witnesses—when there was plenty of time, ample time to get them and bring them in here, come in here and testify to things which are material in this case. * * * Mr. Bonslett's automobile did not even touch the automobile of Mr. Mangino and that dent that you hear so much about did not appear in the left fender immediately after the accident, but it appeared perhaps at some later date. * * * Now just what is the damage? She

(one of the plaintiffs) was a county patient for which the county ought to pay the bill if she hasn't the financial situation. * * * Ladies and gentlemen of the jury, I want you to consider that Mr. Schmitt is the representative of the insurance company on the other side of the case and it is your duty to find out just how much Mr. Schmitt is going to get out of this case. * * *

"Mr. Wallace: At this time, if Your Honor please, I would like the record to show that we assign as misconduct Mr. Hoey's statement to the jury referring to the insurance company on the other side of the case. There is no evidence in the record of any insurance company except what Mr. Boysen testified and that referred to Mr. Summers' insurance on Mr. Summers' automobile and we wish the record to show that that is assigned as misconduct.

"Mr. Hoey: Mr. Anderson testified he had a conversation with Mr. Schmitt and I asked him what Mr. Schmitt's business was and he said 'insurance and a lawyer.' * * *

"Mr. Wallace: The fact that he said Mr. Schmitt was in the insurance business would in no way justify a reference to the insurance company on the other side of the case.

"Mr. Hoey: And Mr. Mangino testified that he was handling the case.

"The Court: Well now, gentlemen, that is the misfortune of bringing things into a case that have no business there, and I would like to instruct the jury that you are to disregard this question of insurance and that any question that is asked by counsel when it is not permitted by the court is not evidence. Furthermore, you are to decide this case on the evidence. There is no evidence before the court in this case that Dr. Merrithew and the county are not to be paid that hospital bill. As I understand it, the hospital is open to two classes of people. First, those who are dependent and claim to be indigents and ask for aid. To them it is free. To other citizens of the county who do not claim to be indigent and do not ask for public aid, they pay their bills the same as they would at any other hospital. Now proceed, Mr. Moore.

"Mr. Moore (one of plaintiffs' counsel): I believe there is no question of insurance on either side here.

"The Court: Now you have asked that the court admonish the jury that insurance is not a question in this case. Now after that admonition you have no right to go into that.

"Mr. Moore: I was going to reply to Mr. Hoey.

"The Court: Mr. Hoey threw the field wide open but you didn't care to take advantage of that.

"Mr. Moore: Very well, I will abide by it, if Your Honor please. Now Mr. Schmitt is not a lawyer. He is just a law clerk.

"Mr. Hoey: Just a second, we object to counsel misquoting the testimony. The testimony was he was a lawyer and an insurance man.

"Mr. Moore: Well, that was Mr. Anderson—

"Mr. Hoey: That is the only testimony in this action.

"The Court: Well now gentlemen, it has been a remarkable case; the extraneous matters that have entered into this case surpasses anything I ever heard or heard of. Now there is no evidence that I can recall of before this court that Mr. Schmitt is a lawyer.

"Mr. Hoey: Yes, there is, may it please the court, young Anderson testified—I asked him who Mr. Schmitt was. He said 'a lawyer and an insurance man.'

"Mr. Moore: He said he thought he was. He didn't know.

"The Court: He thought he was wouldn't make him a lawyer.

"Mr. Wallace: Perhaps he thinks I am an insurance man.

"The Court: Well, proceed, but really try and confine ourselves to the evidence.
* * *

These remarks were not warranted by any phase of the testimony and could have had but one purpose; that is, to prejudice the minds of the jury against the plaintiffs' case and in favor of the defendant. There is no evidence in the record that plaintiffs were insured or that an insurance company was the real party in interest behind plaintiffs' case.

[3] Appellant insists that the repeated admonition of the court to the jury to disregard the remarks of counsel cured whatever prejudicial effect the remarks had upon the jury. We cannot agree with this contention. We are satisfied that the remarks were of such a character, and the purpose of their injection into the case so apparent, that they could not have been completely obliterated from the minds of the jury by any admonition the court gave or could have given.

[4] The granting or denial of a new trial on the ground of misconduct is largely in the discretion of the trial court. "The trial judge is in a much better position than an appellate court to determine whether the verdict in a case is probably due wholly or in part to such alleged misconduct as we have here, and his conclusion in the matter should not be disturbed unless, under all the circumstances appearing, it is plainly wrong." Lafargue v. United Railroads, 183 Cal. 720-724, 192 P. 538, 540. "The trial court, having heard and seen the witnesses on the trial, and having knowledge as to those circumstances of a case which cannot be reproduced in the printed record, is in a better position than is the appellate court to determine as to the effect of the shown irregularity upon the result of the trial. It is certainly enough to justify the affirmance of an order granting a new trial upon such ground that the irregularity found, upon sufficient evidence, by the trial court, to have existed, was of such a nature, that it may, under the circumstances of the case, as shown by the record, have affected the substantial rights of the aggrieved party and prevented a fair trial." Piercy v. Piercy, 149 Cal. 163-166, 86 P. 507, 509; Merralls v. Southern Pacific Co., 182 Cal. 19, 186 P. 778; Loggie v. Interstate Transit Co. (Cal. App.) 291 P. 618.

[5, 6] Appellant also contends that the matter of insurance was injected into the case by plaintiffs' attorneys. This contention is based upon these two facts: The witness Boysen was asked by counsel for plaintiffs this question: "Q. Now you are Mr. Summers' insurance broker? A. Yes." This would certainly be no basis for the remarks of counsel for defendant; (2) Each juror was asked on his voir dire examination whether he or she was interested in any insurance company. This question was entirely proper, and furnished no excuse for counsel's remarks. Arnold v. California Portland Cement Co., 41 Cal. App. 420, 421, 183 P. 171; Williamson v. Hardy, 47 Cal. App. 377, 190 P. 646; Baldarachi v. Leach, 44 Cal. App. 603, 186 P. 1060; Potter v. Driver, 97 Cal. App. 311, 275 P. 526; People v. Simon, 80 Cal. App. 675-685, 252 P. 758. The purpose of this question was to obtain a jury that was free from bias, prejudice, or interest that would affect their verdict, and thereby prevent the very prejudice in the minds of the jury that the remarks complained of were calculated to instil.

A further discussion seems entirely unnecessary. We are of the opinion that the trial court exercised its discretion wisely in granting plaintiffs a new trial, and that its action in so doing should not be disturbed by this court.

As further authority for the conclusion that we have reached, see Citti v. Bava, 204 Cal. 136, 266 P. 954; Gee v. Fong Poy, 88 Cal. App. 627-641, 264 P. 564; Dameron v. Ansbros, 39 Cal. App. 298, 178 P. 874; Keena v. United Railroads, 197 Cal. 148, 239 P. 1061; Baroni (Continental Casualty Co., Intervener) v. Rosenberg (Cal. Sup.) 294 P. 1111.

The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by R. H. Golish against Peter R. Van Pelt. From an order vacating a default judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Perry F. Backus, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

R. J. Welch, Jr., of Riverside, for respondent.

WARMER, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff appealed from an order vacating a default judgment. This cause has been before the District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division 2 (287 P. 537), on a motion to have the record returned for preparation, examination, and approval in the superior court, in accordance with sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure. In denying said motion the court said: "There is but one transcript before us, which contains the judgment roll and notice of appeal, certified by the clerk. Other matters are discussed in the briefs as properly constituting an additional transcript for authentication, had one been filed. But it is the duty of the appellant in such a case to prepare and present in the trial court, upon notice, a proposed transcript, and to afford the respondent an opportunity to participate in its final settlement for examination and approval. Since none of these steps requisite to a valid appeal have been taken, and no transcript is available for return or approval, appellant's motion is without foundation." Golish v. Van Pelt (Cal. App.) 287 P. 537.

[1] No other or further record as to the proceedings in the trial court is now presented. Hence we have an appeal on the judgment roll alone. On such a record the order appealed from must be affirmed. Waymire v. California Trona Co., 176 Cal. 395, 168 P. 563, Brown v. Canty, 31 Cal. App. 183, 159 P. 1056.

SHAW, Acting P. J.

This action was brought by plaintiff under the usury law to recover $154.74, being treble the amount of usurious interest alleged to have been paid by plaintiff to defendant. The court gave judgment for plaintiff for the sum of $94.05, from which defendant appeals.

[1] A question has been raised as to the jurisdiction of this department over this appeal. We have concluded that we have such jurisdiction, but do not deem it necessary to discuss the reasons for that conclusion at this time.

Coming to the merits of the appeal, it appears from the record without dispute that the plaintiff borrowed a sum of money from defendant and agreed to pay and did pay to the defendant for the loan interest at the rate of 2 per cent. per month, amounting to $31.35, which interest was paid less than one year before this suit was brought; that the defendant was at the time doing business as a personal property broker as that term is defined in the act of 1909 (St. 1909, p. 969) regulating personal property brokers; and that the transaction satisfied the requirements of that act. Upon these facts, but one question of law is presented; that is, whether the Usury Law, adopted as an initiative measure in 1918 (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii), repealed the act of 1909 regulating personal property brokers, as to the rate of interest that may be charged by such brokers on loans. The act of 1909 was amended in 1911 (St. 1911, p. 978), and has since stood unchanged. The Usury Law is the later in point of time, but it contains no provision expressly repealing the other act, and hence the question is whether it accomplished such repeal by implication. The act regulating personal property brokers has been upheld (Eaker v. Bryant, 24 Cal. App. 87, 140 P. 310; Matter of Stephan, 170 Cal. 48, 148 P. 196, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 617), but these cases were decided before the Usury Law was adopted and have no bearing upon the question before us.

[2] Appellant contends that the act of 1909 was not affected by the usury law, relying on the rule which is stated in Riley v. Forbes, 193 Cal. 740, 745, 227 P. 768, 770, as follows: "Where two statutes treat of the same subject, one being special and the other general, unless they are irreconcilably inconsistent, the latter, although latest in date, will not be held to have repealed the former, but the special act will prevail in its application to the subject-matter, so far as coming within its particular provisions."

It is perhaps impossible to reconcile the many decisions on this point, but the decision of each case must depend largely on the provisions of the particular statutes involved. In Riley v. Forbes, supra, it was held that a statute authorizing the state board of accountancy to collect and keep certain fees and to use them in payment of its expenses was not repealed by a later statute requiring all "moneys belonging to the state" collected by any board to be paid into the state treasury; the court saying that "we find no irreconcilable inconsistency between the two acts," and that the fees collected by the board were not money belonging to the state within the meaning of the later act. The language first quoted from Riley v. Forbes was there quoted from Bateman v. Colgan, 111 Cal. 580, 586, 44 P. 238, 240. In Bateman v. Colgan, the court said there was no inconsistency between the acts under consideration, and further said, quoting with approval from a New York decision (Van Denburgh v. Greenbush, 66 N. Y. 3): "It is a rule of construction that a special statute providing for a particular case, or applicable to a particular locality, is not repealed by a statute general in its terms and application, unless the intention of the legislature to repeal or alter the special law is manifest, although the terms of the general act would be taken strictly, and, but for the special law, include the case or cases provided by it."

In Home for Care of Inebriates v. Reis, 95 Cal. 142, 148, 30 P. 205, 207, the court held that a statute directing fines imposed by the San Francisco police court on charges of drunkenness to be paid to the plaintiff was not repealed by a later statute providing that all fines imposed by said court should be paid into the city treasury. The court here called attention to the fact that the later statute was but a re-enactment of an older one which antedated the special statute, and quoted with approval from Endlich on Interpretation of Statutes, the following: "A general act is to be construed as not repealing a particular one,—that is, one directed towards a special object or a special class of objects. * * * Having already given its attention to the particular subject and provided for it, the legislature is reasonably presumed not to intend to alter that special provision by a subsequent general enactment, unless that intention is manifested in explicit language, or there be something which shows that the attention of the legislature has been turned to the special act, and that the general one was intended to embrace the special cases within the previous one."

On the other hand, there are many California cases where a later general statute has been held to repeal a prior special statute. Among these cases are: People v. Grippen, 20 Cal. 677; People v. Burt, 43 Cal. 560; People v. Sargent, 44 Cal. 430; Pennie v. Reis, 80 Cal. 266, 22 P. 176, 177; People v. Henshaw, 76 Cal. 436, 440, 18 P. 413, 415; Kennedy v. Board of Education, 82 Cal. 483, 492, 22 P. 1042; Ex parte Ah You, 82 Cal. 339, 22 P. 929; Miller v. Curry, 113 Cal. 644, 647, 45 P. 877, 878.

In People v. Henshaw, supra, the court held that a special act providing a police court for the city of Oakland was repealed by a later act providing for police courts in all cities of a certain size, which included Oakland. The court said: "Where, as in the present case, the latter statute is repugnant to the former, and both cannot stand together, the latter will repeal the former."

In Pennie v. Reis, supra, the court said that a repeal by implication "takes place whenever by subsequent legislation it becomes apparent that the legislature did not intend the former act to remain in force."

In Miller v. Curry, supra, the court said that the rule referred to by appellant "has its limits, and means no more than that in arriving at the intent of the legislature, which is always to govern, and endeavoring to deduce that intent from the acts themselves, unless there be plain and explicit terms of repeal in the later act, or unless the provisions of the two acts be so inconsistent as that both may not stand, it will be assumed that the legislature, in making general provision for all cases, did not mean to destroy the effect of a rule laid down with explicit care and directness, and applicable to a particular class of cases. But this, after all, is but a method of arriving at the legislative intent when other and better means are not available. * * * The rules that we have been considering apply only in a case where a repugnancy between the two acts is not manifest. If such a repugnancy exists, then it is well settled that the earlier act must fall. End. Interp. St. § 206. Only so far as the two acts are not in their terms incompatible with each other is the earlier act allowed to stand."

In the Washer Case, 200 Cal. 598, 254 P. 951, the Supreme Court applied the rule mentioned by appellant to the Usury Act so far as to hold that it does not affect or repeal statutes respecting the control of corporate securities, public or private, but said in that connection: "We are not here deciding what may be the effect of the act upon existing statutes regulating the business of pawnbrokers and other personal property brokers." Page 607 of 200 Cal., 254 P. 951, 955.

[3] Comparing now the two statutes here involved, we find that the act regulating personal property brokers (St. 1909, p. 969), as amended in 1911 (St. 1911, p. 978), defines the term "personal property broker" to include "every person or corporation engaged in the business of loaning or advancing money or other thing" on the security of any chattel mortgage or other contract hypothecating personal property, the use or possession of which is not to be in the lender, or on the security of a lien upon, assignment of, or power of attorney relating to "wages, salary, earnings, income or commissions." Section 1. It further provides that "such personal property broker may charge, receive and collect a benefit or percentage upon money or other thing advanced, or for the use and forbearance thereof, of two per centum per month where such loan or advance is made upon security properly falling within the scope of business as set forth in section 1 hereof" (section 2); that such brokers shall not make or receive any further charges for any services or on any pretext in connection with the loan if such charges plus the interest would amount to more than 2 per cent. per month, except certain fees necessary to give legal effect to a mortgage (section 4); that no contract made by a personal property broker in his business shall be valid "if there is therein or thereon directly or indirectly charged, accepted or contracted to be received" a greater benefit, discount or interest than at the rate of two per cent. per month, and if interest at any greater rate is "directly or indirectly advanced or paid" upon such a contract, the excess above 2 per cent. per month may be recovered by the person who paid it (section 4).

The Usury Law provides: "No person, company, association or corporation shall directly or indirectly take or receive in money, goods or things in action, or in any other manner whatsoever, any greater sum or any greater value for the loan or forbearance of money, goods or things in action than at the rate of twelve dollars upon one hundred dollars for one year. * * * Any agreement or contract of any nature in conflict with the provisions of this section shall be null and void as to any agreement or stipulation therein contained to pay interest" (section 2); that every person who pays interest at a rate exceeding 12 per cent. per annum may recover treble the interest paid; and that a violation of section 2 of the act is a misdemeanor (section 3). Also in section 3 there is a provision regarding secured loans to which we shall refer later.

Reducing these statutes to their lowest terms, the act of 1909 provides that personal property brokers may take interest on a loan at the rate of 24 per cent. per annum, and the Usury Law provides that no lender may take interest at a rate greater than 12 per cent. per annum. It appears to us that there is a plain and irreconcilable repugnancy between these two provisions; and, although the Supreme Court in the Washer Case, supra, declined to decide the question now before us, we think the conclusion we have just stated is foreshadowed by that part of the opinion in that case wherein the court said: "The inevitable conclusion from these views is that sections 1 and 2 of the act known as the Usury Law are, in all respects, valid and cover both secured and unsecured obligations" (page 608 of 200 Cal., 254 P. 951, 955), and by the following statement made by the court while holding unconstitutional the provision of section 3, which we will quote in our next paragraph: "It would appear, therefore, that the draftsman of the Usury Law statute in California undertook to broaden the provision respecting personal property loans so as to include secured obligations of all kinds on real and personal property except corporate bonds, municipal and other public bonds, without realizing that the preceding sections of the act fully covered secured loans." (Italics added by us.)

[4] Applying the rule concerning the implied repeal of a special statute by a general statute, as declared in the authorities previously cited, we find a clear indication that the attention of the lawmaking power when enacting the usury law was turned to the act regulating personal property brokers, and that the repeal of the last-mentioned act was intended, in the following part of section 3 of the Usury Law, which describes in detail the business of a personal property broker and denounces as a misdemeanor acts which he is permitted to do by the act of 1909: "Any person, company, association or corporation, who shall ask, demand, receive, take, accept or charge more than twelve per centum per annum upon the sum of money actually loaned for the forbearance, use or loan thereof, when the repayment of the money loaned shall be secured by a mortgage, trust deed, bill of sale, assignment, pledge, receipt or other evidence of debt, except corporation bonds, and municipal and other public bonds, upon property, real or personal or by assignment of wages * * * shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

This provision was, it is true, held unconstitutional in the Washer Case, supra, because it excepted certain classes of securities from its ban, but this holding was coupled with the declarations already quoted that other parts of the act had the same effect; and even an unconstitutional part of a statute may be examined for the purpose of ascertaining the scope and effect of the valid parts thereof. Ex parte Fedderwitz, 6 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 562, 572, 62 P. 935, 940; 36 Cyc. 1131, 1132.

[5] If there were any uncertainty as to the construction of the Usury Law on this point, which we do not concede, it would be proper to resort, in aid of its interpretation, to the arguments submitted to the voters at the time it was voted upon and adopted as an initiative measure. Story v. Richardson, 186 Cal. 162, 165, 198 P. 1057, 18 A. L. R. 750; Yosemite L. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 187 Cal. 774, 781, 204 P. 226, 20 A. L. R. 994. On examining the pamphlet containing these arguments, we find there officially listed, among the provisions which will be repealed by the proposed Usury Law, that part of the act of 1909 which permits personal property brokers to charge interest at the rate of 2 per centum per month; and the respective arguments, while not mentioning the act of 1909, proceed on the assumption that it will be affected by the proposed Usury Law. In view of these facts, it is clear that the voters who read these pamphlets understood that the proposed law would limit the rate of interest to be charged by personal property brokers.

Our conclusion is that the Usury Law has repealed pro tanto the act regulating personal property brokers, and such brokers may not charge or receive interest at a rate exceeding 12 per cent. per annum.

The judgment of the trial court is therefore right, and it is affirmed, with costs of appeal to the respondent.

PEOPLE v. SKLAR et al.
Cr. 425.

Appellate Department, Superior Court, Los Angeles County, California.

Nov. 3, 1930.

1. Riot ☞1.

Unlawful assembly ☞1.

Offense of "remaining at place of riot or unlawful assembly" cannot occur until statutory command to disperse has been given (Pen. Code, §§ 409, 726).

Pen. Code, § 409, makes it unlawful to remain present at the place of a riot, rout, or unlawful assembly "after the same has been lawfully warned to disperse." Section 726 provides that where a number of persons are unlawfully or riotously assembled, the peace officers named in the section must go among the persons assembled, or as near to them as possible, and command them, in the name of the people of the state, immediately to disperse.

2. Riot ☞1.

Unlawful assembly ☞1.

Statute requiring certain peace officers to command riotous or unlawful assembly to disperse held to include police officers (Pen. Code, § 726).

Pen. Code, § 726, provides that where there is an unlawful or riotous assembly, "the sheriff of the county, and his deputies, the officials governing the town or city, or the justices of the peace and constables thereof, or any of them," must command the assembly to disperse.

3. Riot ☞6.

Unlawful assembly ☞3.

Facts held to show required command to disperse was not given, and hence offense of "remaining at place of riot or unlawful assembly" after warning to disperse was not shown (Pen. Code, §§ 409, 726).

Defendants were individually and separately told by different police officers scattered among the crowd to "move on," or "get out of the crowd," but it did not appear that any general proclamation was made to the crowd, calling on them to disperse, or that such commands as were given purported to be "in the name of the people of the state," nor were any of the defendants, except perhaps one, told to disperse or to leave the place of the riotous and unlawful assembly.

4. Riot ☞1.

Unlawful assembly ☞1.

Offense of "remaining at place of riot or unlawful assembly" does not necessarily involve participation in riot or unlawful assembly (Pen. Code, § 409).

Appeal from Municipal Court of Los Angeles; Charles L. Bogue, Judge.

Carl Sklar and others were convicted of a violation of Pen. Code, § 409, and they appeal.

SHAW, Acting P. J.

[1, 2] By the complaint in case numbered 13363 in the municipal court, the appellants were charged with a violation of Pen. Code, § 409, which makes it unlawful to remain present at the place of a riot, rout, or unlawful assembly "after the same has been lawfully warned to disperse." The words quoted no doubt refer to Pen. Code, § 726, which is in pari materia, and provides that where any number of persons are unlawfully or riotously assembled, "the sheriff of the county and his deputies, the officials governing the town or city, or the justices of the peace and constables thereof, or any of them, must go among the persons assembled, or as near to them as possible, and command them, in the name of the people of the state, immediately to disperse." On comparison of the two sections, it is clear that a violation of section 409 cannot occur until the command mentioned in section 726 has been given. The list of officers who are authorized by section 726 to give this command does not expressly include police officers, but we think the terms therein used may be held by construction to include the police.

[3] The evidence shows that at the time charged there was at least an unlawful assembly, as defined in Pen. Code, § 407, and probably even a riot, as defined by Pen. Code, § 404; that appellants and a large crowd of other persons were present at the scene of this unlawful assembly or riot while it was in progress; that the appellants were individually and separately told by different police officers who were scattered among the crowd to "move on," or, in the case of appellant Bulgian, to "get out of the crowd." It does not appear that any general proclamation was made to the crowd calling on them to disperse, or that such commands as were given purported to be "in the name of the people of the state." Neither were any of the defendants, except perhaps Bulgian, told to disperse, or to leave the place of the riotous and unlawful assembly.

We think the facts above stated do not show a compliance with Pen. Code, § 726. That section is evidently derived from the English statute of 1 Geo. I, st. 2, c. 5 (1714), which provided in effect that when a riot occurred and continued for one hour after proclamation made in the king's name to disperse, the participants should be guilty of a felony, and directed that such proclamation should be made by a justice of the peace, or sheriff of the county or his undersheriff, or by the mayor, bailiff, or other head officer, or justice of the peace of any city or town, who should go among the rioters, "or as near to them as he can safely come" and with a loud voice command them to keep silent, and then make proclamation to them in a certain form of words prescribed by the statute, commanding them, in the king's name, to disperse (3 Ward's Justice, 826, 827). This mode of proceeding is commonly referred to as "reading the riot act." This English statute has been the model for laws adopted by various states of this country. Section 726 of our Penal Code was obviously based upon it, and its intent is to provide a similar procedure. Under our Code section no particular form of proclamation is required, but the section does require that something in the nature of a general command to disperse be given and that it purport to be in the name of the people of the state. Since there was nothing of this kind in the present case, the offense charged was not established.

[4] We are not to be understood as holding that the police may not disperse a riot, rout, or unlawful assembly, or arrest those actually participating therein without any such formal command as is required by Pen. Code, § 726. We have no doubt that they may do so under their general powers for the preservation of the public peace and the arrest of offenders who commit misdemeanors in their presence. But the special offense denounced by Pen. Code, § 409 and charged against these defendants does not necessarily involve participation in the riot, rout, or unlawful assembly, and cannot be committed until the requirements of section 726 have been met.

The judgments in case 13363 in the municipal court are reversed as to all the appellants therein, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

RICHARDS, J.

These appeals are from a judgment of the trial court in favor of the defendants and respondents in each of the actions brought by the several plaintiffs named herein, which had for their purpose the establishment and determination of the priority of these several plaintiffs as lien claimants as against certain incumbrances in the form of mortgages or deeds of trust affecting the property with respect to which these several plaintiffs seek to foreclose their respective mechanics' or materialmen's liens. These several cases were consolidated for the purpose of the trial in the lower court, and are also consolidated and presented in a single record upon appeal. The facts as set forth in the pleadings of the respective parties and as shown by the evidence and as found by the trial court are briefly these:

On or about June 1, 1925, and for some time prior thereto, one James A. Keeney was the owner of those certain premises which are sought to be affected by these several actions, and on or about said date sold the same to one W. H. Chute, who, with his wife, on June 1, 1925, made, executed, and delivered to said James A. Keeney their promissory note for the sum of $5,000, which represented the whole or a considerable portion of the purchase price of the premises, and coincidentally therewith, and to secure said note, also executed a deed of trust covering the premises in question. At the time of the purchase of the premises and of the execution of the promissory note and trust deed, W. H. Chute contemplated the erection upon the premises of one or more buildings, for which it was necessary that he should borrow other and larger sums of money which were to be applied to the construction of said buildings. It was therefore agreed between himself and James A. Keeney that the latter was to permit his aforesaid deed of trust upon the premises to be and to be accepted by him as a second lien thereon and to be subject to a prior incumbrance in the form of a trust deed to the extent of $15,000, which was to be or had been executed by W. H. Chute and wife and delivered to the Union Engineering Company, and which trust deed was to secure certain promissory notes to the extent of said $15,000, and which promissory notes or the proceeds thereof were to be used or negotiated by the Union Engineering Company for the purpose of procuring and paying for the necessary materials and labor for the erection of said structure, which the Union Engineering Company was to undertake and carry forward to completion on behalf of and as the agent of said Chute. The foregoing incumbrances were duly executed and recorded on or about June 12, 1925. Thereafter the work of the erection of said structure went forward with the result that there were supplied by the several plaintiffs herein, and upon the order of the Union Engineering Company, the labor and materials for which these plaintiffs eventually filed the several liens which are sought to be foreclosed in these actions. In pursuance of the foregoing arrangement, and on or about June 12, 1925, the Union Engineering Company caused to be executed and delivered to one Leonard L. Jones a promissory note for the sum of $6,500, which was to be secured by an assignment of the aforesaid note and deed of trust of W. H. Chute and wife for the sum of $15,000, and which note for the sum of $6,500 Jones presently sold and transferred to the Western Discount Corporation, receiving therefor the sum of $6,000 in money, which was to be applied to the construction of said building, and which sum was for said purpose delivered to and so used by the Union Engineering Company. Thereafter and on or about August 4, 1925, the Union Engineering Company caused to be executed its certain promissory note in the sum of $1,000 due thirty days after date, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, in favor of the Western Discount Corporation, and for which it received from the latter the sum of $950, and which promissory note was also to be secured by whatever equity the Union Engineering Company had in the promissory notes and deed of trust for the sum of $15,000 theretofore executed by W. H. Chute and wife to it and by it assigned to Leonard L. Jones, and by him transferred to the Western Discount Corporation as security for the prior note of $6,500. At the time of the institution of these several actions for the establishment and foreclosure of the plaintiffs' aforesaid mechanics' and materialmen's liens, there were outstanding and unpaid the foregoing obligations, to wit: The sum of $5,000, with interest thereon, due to the defendant James A. Keeney and secured by the deed of trust to him and which had expressly been made the second incumbrance; the further sum of $6,500 which was represented in the promissory note for the said sum, executed by the Union Engineering Company to Leonard L. Jones and by him transferred to the Western Discount Corporation and which note was secured by an assignment of the aforesaid promissory note and deed of trust of W. H. Chute and wife for the sum of $15,000, and upon which said note for the sum of $6,500 the Union Engineering Company had received from the Western Discount Corporation the sum of $6,000, and which constituted a first incumbrance upon the premises; and the further sum of $950 represented in the promissory note for $1,000 executed directly by the Union Engineering Company to the Western Discount Corporation, and also secured by the aforesaid obligations of W. H. Chute and wife.

Upon the trial and submission of the cause the trial court made its findings of fact and conclusions of law, wherein it found that the aforesaid indebtedness to James A. Keeney, with the trust deed securing the same, constituted a second incumbrance upon the premises and as such was superior to the liens of the several lien claimants who are the plaintiffs herein. The court further found that the promissory note made and executed by the Union Engineering Company to Leonard L. Jones and by him transferred to the Western Discount Corporation and which was secured by the assignment of the $15,000 note and trust deed of W. H. Chute and wife, was, to the extent of $6,000, actually received thereon by the Union Engineering Company, a first lien upon the premises, and that the sum of $950 actually received by the Union Engineering Company through its second loan from the Western Discount Corporation and covered by the same security, constituted also a first lien upon the premises, and as such was superior to both the lien of the defendant James A. Keeney and to the claims of lien of each of the respective plaintiffs herein. Upon the judgment based on said findings of fact the trial court directed the sale of the said premises under and by virtue of the terms of the deed of trust of W. H. Chute and wife for the sum of $15,000, and the application of the proceeds of such sale, after paying the expenses thereof, to the payment of the aforesaid amounts in the order of their precedence, that is to say, to pay to the Western Discount Corporation the sum of $6,000, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum from June 25, 1925; also the sum of $950, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum from August 4, 1925; to pay certain further sums aggregating $609, being the amount expended by the Western Discount Corporation in preserving the property, for insurance, taxes, etc.; to pay from whatever sum remained in the hands of the trustee after making the foregoing payments, to the defendant James A. Keeney the sum of $5,000, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum from June 12, 1925; and finally, from whatever sum remained in the hands of the trustee, to pay to the plaintiffs herein, in the order to their respective lien claims, the several amounts found to be due thereon; and thereafter, in the event that any further sum remained in the hands of the trustee, to pay the same to the administrator of the estate of W. H. Chute and wife, deceased. From such judgment the respective plaintiffs herein have prosecuted their appeals.

[1, 2] The first contention which the appellants urge upon these appeals is to the effect that as to the promissory note for the sum of $6,500 executed by the Union Engineering Company to Leonard L. Jones, and by him transferred to the Western Discount Corporation, the transaction was a usurious one for the reason that the sum of but $6,000 was received thereon from the Western Discount Corporation, $500 of the gross amount of the note having been retained by the Western Discount Corporation as a bonus for making the loan. The difficulty with this contention chiefly consists in the fact as found by the trial court, that the original transaction out of which this indebtedness arose was one between the Union Engineering Company and Leonard L. Jones, to whom for a valuable consideration the note was given, and that Leonard L. Jones thereafter and for a valuable consideration transferred the same to the Western Discount Corporation, who was a purchaser thereof in good faith and for value in the ordinary course of business before maturity, and without any notice or knowledge of any equity existing either between the Union Engineering Company and W. H. Chute, or between the Union Engineering Company and Leonard L. Jones. It is well settled by our recent decisions and those of the Appellate Court that the defense of usury is a personal defense between the parties to a transaction of this character and cannot be availed of against the purchaser of a promissory note in due course and for value. Haines v. Commercial Mortgage Co., 200 Cal. 609, 254 P.

956, 255 P. 805, 53 A. L. R. 725, and cases cited; Baker et al. v. Butcher et al. (Cal. App.) 289 P. 236. A further answer to the foregoing contention is to be found in the fact that the appellants did not affirmatively or otherwise plead in any of their complaints herein that the transaction involved in the issuance and transfer of said promissory note mediately to the Western Discount Corporation was a usurious one, and it appears to have been settled by our recent decisions that where the obligation does not upon the face thereof disclose that it was usurious, those who seek to take advantage of the latent fact of usury, assuming that the same exists, as against transferees of the obligation, must affirmatively plead that the transaction was usurious. Ames v. Occidental Life Ins. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 291 P. 182, and cases cited; Zimmerman v. Boyd, 97 Cal. App. 406, 275 P. 509. The appellants, however, contend that these decisions are contrary to the ruling of this court in the case of Wallace v. Zinman, 200 Cal. 585, 254 P. 946, 62 A. L. R. 1341. But an examination of that case discloses no discord between it and the above more recent decisions, since in the latter case cited the alleged usury appeared upon the face of the obligation, and for that reason it was held that it was not necessary to specially plead the fact of usury.

The foregoing reasoning also applies to the appellants' contention with respect to the note for the sum of $1,000 which was immediately executed by the Union Engineering Company to the Western Discount Corporation, and upon which a discount of $50 was retained by the latter, but in respect to which there was no claim of usury set forth in the appellants' pleadings.

[3] The next contention of the appellant has also reference to the transaction in which the note of the Union Engineering Company for $6,500 was executed to Leonard L. Jones and by him transferred to the Western Discount Corporation, the claim of the appellants being that at the time of the transfer of the note from Jones to the Western Discount Corporation a portion of the consideration therefor received by Jones consisted in the issuance to him by the Western Discount Corporation of certain shares of its capital stock to the extent of $1,000 in face value, which transaction, according to the appellants' contention, was one in violation of the permit issued by the corporation commissioner, prescribing the terms upon which it could dispose of its capital stock and forbidding it to do so otherwise than by a practically cash transaction. The difficulty with this contention on the part of the appellants consists in the fact that the trial court found upon what appears to have been sufficient evidence that the stock transaction between Leonard L. Jones and the Western Discount Corporation was an independent transaction, occurring some time later than the transaction for the sale and transfer to the Western Discount Corporation of the aforesaid note. We are unable to say that this finding on the part of the trial court is not in accord with and supported by the evidence in the case, and this being so, the stock transaction between these parties cannot be held to have affected the validity of the former transaction by which Jones received the sum of $6,000 for and in consideration of his assignment of the aforesaid note of the Union Engineering Company to the Western Discount Corporation.

[4] The next contention of the appellants has relation to the priority of the promissory note and deed of trust held by the respondent Keeney over the lien claims of the several appellants herein. In support of their contention the appellants urge that the fact that the respondent Keeney was willing to agree and did agree that the lien of his trust deed given to secure the purchase price of the property which had been purchased by the Chutes should be postponed in favor of the subjection of the property to a prior lien in the form of the trust deed for the sum of $15,000 given by the Chutes to the Union Engineering Company, and which sum, or so much thereof as might be realized thereon, was to be used by the latter in the course of the erection of a building upon the premises, must be given the effect of having subordinated his said lien to the claims of the plaintiffs herein, who had thereafter contributed labor and materials for the erection of the building and who should have been paid for the same out of the moneys to be derived by the Union Engineering Company through its negotiation of the note or notes secured by said trust deed. It would seem, however, that the respondent Keeney, while aware of such prior transaction and while willing that his lien in the form of a trust deed for practically the whole of the purchase price of said premises should be subordinated thereto, was not a party to said transaction and was in no wise in control of any act or thing which the Union Engineering Company might do in carrying out its engagement with the Chutes. It further appears that Mr. Keeney in due course recorded his aforesaid trust deed and that this was done by him prior to the doing of any work or the furnishing of any material on the part of these appellants in the course of the construction of any building or buildings upon the premises covered by the trust deed. We are thus unable to perceive how any equities could have arisen, either by estoppel or otherwise, in favor of these appellants who furnished whatever labor and materials they or any of them may have supplied in the erection of said structure with full knowledge of the existence of the prior recordation of the trust deed of the respondent Keeney, which in the ordinary course of things would constitute a prior lien to that of these lien claimants. We discover nothing in the case of Fuller v. McClure, 48

Cal. App. 185, 191 P. 1027, which can be held to furnish comfort to these appellants upon this point. On the contrary, we are satisfied that rightly read it supports the respondents' contention herein.

It follows from the foregoing that the conclusions of the trial court with respect to the proper allocation of the several claims of liens upon the premises affected by the foregoing transactions are correct, and that its judgment for the sale of the premises affected and for the disposition of the proceeds thereof in accord with its foregoing conclusions should be and the same is hereby affirmed.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; LANGDON, J.; SHENK, J.; SEAWELL, J.

PRESTON, J. (dissenting).

I find myself unable to agree in toto with the views announced by the learned justice in the above-entitled cause. I agree with all that is said down to the question of priority between the lien claimants and Keeney. Keeney allowed a prior first lien of $15,000 to be created, to take precedence over his mortgage. He commissioned the Union Engineering Company to procure the necessary building material and labor to construct a building on the property in question. The engineering company procured the labor and material here in controversy which actually went into the construction of the building. The court now decrees a sale under the prior mortgage and so marshals the funds as to place the Keeney mortgage ahead of the lien claimants.

I think Keeney should be estopped to assert the priority of his mortgage as long as any portion of the $15,000 remains unconsumed inasmuch as he approved the transaction for the furnishing of labor and materials. I think this would be true even though these claimants had filed no statutory lien claims. I think it is a matter of equity as between the parties and the former owner must be estopped to assert the priority of his claim. For these reasons, I think the judgment of the court below should be modified in this respect.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; A. C. Finney, Judge.

Action by George H. Oswald against the City of El Centro. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

George D. Blair, of Los Angeles, and Hickcox & Trude, of El Centro, for appellant.

Dorsey G. Whitelaw and S. P. Williams, both of El Centro, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J.

This appeal is taken by plaintiff from a judgment refusing the cancellation of a certain lease entered into by plaintiff and defendant. The grounds upon which the validity of said lease is assailed by plaintiff and appellant are that it was executed without consideration to appellant; that it was obtained by means of intimidation, oppression, menace, and coercion practiced by defendant upon plaintiff; that the entire transaction is violative of and contrary to public policy and good morals. No serious disagreement exists between counsel to this appeal as to the facts of the case as hereafter related. Those not expressly admitted are not controverted.

The controversy arises out of a street improvement contract, which had its inception on June 4, 1924. Some two years prior to that date, George H. Oswald, the plaintiff and appellant, was awarded a contract by the city of El Centro to perform certain construction and improvement work ordered by said city. The work, in due time, was completed and accepted by said city. It is the contention of said city that said improvements contained latent defects which rendered them, within a short time after the acceptance thereof, unserviceable, and the city was required to expend large sums of money thereafter in repairing said defective construction.

On November 30, 1923, by resolutions of intention Nos. 261 and 262, respectively, said city awarded contracts to the Los Angeles Paving Company for the paving and improvement of two other certain streets within said city, which contracts were, on April 10, 1924, assigned to appellant, Oswald, who thereupon entered upon the performance of said contracts, and after prosecuting the same with diligence it became evident that the work could not be completed within the time fixed by the superintendent of streets and that it would require an extension of two weeks beyond the time limit fixed by said superintendent of streets for the completion of said work. Oswald filed his application in writing for an extension of time, which matter came regularly before the city trustees on June 4, 1924, for action thereon. No fault was found in any respect with the work as performed or the materials as furnished by the appellant in the construction of said improvements, nor with the diligence with which the improvements had been prosecuted. In fact, the construction work was performed under the close scrutiny of the city engineer and superintendent of streets and strictly conformed with the plans and specifications.

The extension requested by appellant was the first and only request made by him and the findings of the court and admissions of counsel for respondent are to the effect that said work could not have been completed within the time provided in said contracts. The work, which was a district bonded improvement, was inaugurated pursuant to the Improvement Bond Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), together with the amendments thereto. By said statute the superintendent of streets is authorized to make all written contracts that pertain to the street department. He is directed to fix the time for the commencement and for the completion of the work, which must be prosecuted with diligence thereafter to completion, and he may extend the time so fixed from time to time under the direction of the city council. All applications for such extensions of time, if in writing, must be filed in the office of the clerk before the expiration of the original time fixed in the contract, or in the time granted by the extension, as the case may be. Any extension of time shall not release the surety upon any bond required under the act. The work must in all cases be under the direction and to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets, and the materials used shall comply with the specifications and be to the satisfaction of said superintendent of streets. If the contractor fails to complete the work within the time limited in the contract, or within the further time as the city council may give him, the superintendent of streets shall report such delinquency to the city council, which may relet the unfinished portion of said work after pursuing the formalities prescribed in said act for the letting of the whole in the first instance. It also contains the provision that it is to be liberally construed to the end that its purposes may be effective.

[1] The period in which the improvements shall be completed is but the result of an estimate made by the superintendent of streets as to time that will be required to complete the work, and it is clear from sections authorizing extensions of time for the completion of such work that the power of the board of trustees to grant said extensions is not a power to be arbitrarily exercised, but it is to be exercised when the exigencies of the particular case reasonably justify the granting of extensions of time. No claim is made that the request was not reasonable or that the failure of the completion of the improvement was attributable to the unreasonable delay or the fault of appellant. That the extension requested, and which was granted upon appellant yielding to the pressure brought to bear upon him, was a reasonable request and one which would have been granted, as in ordinary cases, but for the opportunity presented by fortuitous circumstances to apply coercive methods to compel the execution of the lease which appellant seeks to have canceled, there is not, within the case presented, room for doubt. The extension applied for was the first and only extension requested by appellant, and it conformed with the requirements of the statute in every particular.

Appellant was at all the times herein mentioned the owner of real estate situate in the city of El Centro upon which he operated a street-paving plant consisting of tracks, roller, and such equipment as is necessary for the construction and repair of general street improvements. The value of the real estate and of the plant, considered separately, took a wide range in the evidence. The court found, upon widely conflicting testimony, that the value of the real property and plant at the time said lease was executed was approximately $26,000. No finding was made as to the plant's rental value.

Appellant was personally present, and presented his case when the matter came regularly before the board of trustees for action on said evening of June 4, 1924. The application for an extension of time met with the positive refusal of the board unless the appellant would consent to enter into the lease of said plant for a nominal money consideration. The proceedings had at said meeting, as told by the plaintiff and which are not questioned or disputed, but, on the contrary, are corroborated by members of the board, were substantially as follows:

"I was present at the meeting of the Board of Trustees at 7:30 p. m., on June 4, for the purpose of asking for an extension of time on this contract and had a conversation with the members of the Board of Trustees at that time.

"I was sitting back there in a seat and they were doing their regular business and Lavayea asked me what I wanted and I told him I wanted an extension of time. Mr. Lavayea was chairman of the Board and Mr. Fawcett [councilman] then spoke up and told me that—started in to talking and told me, he said, 'Mr. Oswald you can't get an extension of time, and furthermore if we do give you an extension of time you will have to do certain things, first put a two-inch asphalt wearing surface over several streets, Main Street, Fourth, Len Rey, Sandalwood and a few others. [The repair work mentioned was to be done on streets constructed by appellant some two or three years prior to June 4, 1924.] Furthermore, you will have to lease this land to the City for ten years at a dollar a year. * * * We have you where we want you * * * you will have to be a good dog, we got you where we want you.' And I plead with him and told him I couldn't do it, but he said, 'Nevertheless George, that is what you got to do.' I told him, I said, 'Mr. Fawcett, don't you realize that this is a lot of money that I have got tied up here?' He said, 'I don't care, George, whether you lose the whole thing or not.' Then I told him, I said, 'Mr. Fawcett, I can't do that,' and he said, 'George, you've got to do this, we've got you where we want you,' and then he said, 'Well we might give you an extension of time by leasing the plant to us for ten years and not putting down the two-inch surface,' like he spoke before and I plead with him and plead with him and it didn't seem to affect the Board at all, he kept on saying he had me where he wanted me and I would have to be a good dog. I said, 'If that is the Board's attitude,' I said, 'gentlemen I will do just exactly what you want me to do, if that is what I've got to do. It is not right. It is not fair, and it has never been done in the history before to my knowledge.' I told him in regard to an extension of time that it was a custom all over in all these little cities and there was never a question of giving an extension of time where the work was carried out in half ways decent manner. And he said, 'Now George if that—if you want to do that; why I will have the city attorney draw up a lease and we will adjourn and have a special meeting tomorrow,' and that meant the fifth of June, 'and you can sign this lease and we will then give you an extension of time.' So that was done."

The board met the next day, when the city attorney presented said lease, which was executed by appellant, wherein it is recited that the lessor, appellant, "in consideration of the sum of $10 and other valuable and sufficient considerations" paid to him by the lessee, city of El Centro, leased for a term of ten years from the date thereof, lots 21, 22, and 23, situate in block 49 of said city, together with the paving plant and all machinery and equipment on said premises used in connection with said paving plant, also one twelve-ton roller, giving and granting unto the lessee the full and unconditional right to the occupation of said premises and the use thereof at all times during said term of ten years, guaranteeing and warranting the use thereof. It was further provided therein that appellant was to keep said paving plant and all machinery and equipment of every kind and nature used in connection therewith in good repair for operation at all times during said ten-year term at his own expense. It also provided that in the operation of said plant and equipment appellant should have the right at his option to furnish a man approved by the board of trustees to direct the operation of said plant and roller, at his own expense, if he should elect to do so, upon fifteen days' notice from the city of its intention to operate said plant and roller. No consideration was given to appellant for the execution, unless it can be said that the extension granted constituted a good or sufficient or valuable consideration. At the time the lease was executed, appellant said to the board that it was a crime to take advantage of him in such a manner and that they held a club over his head and they might as well hang him.

[2, 3] No consideration in fact passed to appellant as a consideration for executing the lease, unless it can be said that the performance of official duty is the subject of barter. Respondent admits in its answer that it refused any extension of time to appellant unless he should execute said lease, and that appellant executed the same in order to save himself many thousands of dollars. The board was required by law to act upon the application, and in so doing it had no authority to consider matters which were not cognate or germane to the subject-matter of the contracts, which was the improvement of the streets described therein and none other. Respondent undertakes to justify its exaction as a legitimate method of recoupment of a loss which it claims to have sustained by reason of inefficient work performed under other contracts made with appellant some two years prior to the execution of said lease. Appellant denies that respondent suffered any loss through his fault. We have no means of determining the merits of those controversies.

It is sufficient to say that said former street work was duly accepted, and any controversy concerning it has long since been foreclosed. No contractual relation existed between the two transactions. As to this proceeding, the prior transactions are ultra vires.

[4, 5] It is evident from a statement of the case that the lease is void for lack of consideration of any kind known to the law and, further, that it violates the public policy rule of the state. Clearly it was the product of compulsion and the employment of coercive methods by which the exercise of freedom of will, which is always essential to a valid contract, was unquestionably overcome by officers of the city acting under color of official authority. It is not necessary to discuss the question of public policy. The principles of law which condemn the transaction as being in violation of public policy are elemental.

The action was brought within the statutory period prescribed by law, and no question of laches is involved.

[6] The criterion of damage in such cases as this is the rental value for the term that the owner has been deprived of possession.

Judgment reversed.

CITY OF OAKLAND v. E. K. WOOD LUMBER CO.

SAME v. PACIFIC FUEL & BUILDING MATERIAL CO. et al.

S. F. 13375-13378.

Supreme Court of California.

Nov. 1, 1930.

1. Wharves ⇨16.

Right to collect tolls for wharfage and dockage is "franchise" which must have its origin in legislative grant (Pol. Code, § 2906).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Franchise," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Municipal corporations ⇨719(4).

Provision in lease of wharf prohibiting discrimination in rates, charges, or facilities held not effective to add anything to operative portion of lease not expressly granted (Civ. Code, § 1069; St. 1911, pp. 1254, 1258).

City by lease granted to private corporation, pursuant to St. 1911, pp. 1254, 1258, the right to use a certain wharf, and provided that no discrimination in rates, tolls, or charges, or in facilities for any use or service in connection therewith, shall ever be made, authorized, or permitted by lessee in management, conduct, or operation of any of the utilities, structures, or appliances mentioned in lease.

3. Wharves ⇨7.

Property rights of operator of wharf, in absence of franchise, exist only until there is lawful interference by state or municipality.

4. Navigable waters ⇨36(3).

Riparian owner on navigable water has no rights below high-tide line as against state, such lands having been reserved to states.

5. Navigable waters ⇨36(3).

Land below high-tide line on navigable water is held by state in trust for people.

6. Wharves ⇨1.

Erection of wharf, dock, or other construction over tidelands without license constitutes encroachment upon sovereignty of state.

7. Navigable waters ⇨39(3).

Littoral owner's right of access to navigable water may not prevail as against rights of state or its grantee (Const. art. 15, § 2).

8. Navigable waters ⇨43(2).

Right to erect wharves on tidelands may be vested subject to same trust by which title is held by state (Const. art. 15, § 3).

9. Navigable waters ⇨37(8).

State may grant tidelands to municipalities with power to maintain wharves and grant leases, privileges, and franchises to private persons (St. 1911, pp. 1254, 1258; Const. art. 15, § 3).

10. Municipal corporations ⇨719(3).

Municipality vested with tidelands for maintenance of wharves, piers, docks, etc., for public use may make reasonable wharfage and dockage charges (St. 1911, pp. 1254, 1258).

11. Commerce ⇨78.

Reasonable wharfage and dockage charges exacted by municipality to whom tidelands were granted for maintenance of wharves and docks held not "duty on tonnage," prohibited by Constitution (St. 1911, pp. 1254, 1258; Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Duties," see Words and Phrases.]

12. Commerce ⇨78.

Tax upon tonnage may not be imposed under cover of laws or ordinances ostensibly to collect wharfage, and therefore they will be carefully scrutinized (Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10).

13. Evidence ⇨20(2).

Court judicially knows that vessels are not accustomed to stop in harbor, except at wharf or similar accommodation.

14. Municipal corporations ⇨719(3).

Though city may exact fee from vessels stopping at its wharves, charge may be imposed only in municipality's proprietary, as distinguished from sovereign capacity (St. 1911, pp. 1254, 1258; Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10).

15. Commerce ⇨78.

Imposition of wharfage or dockage fee by municipality by virtue of sovereignty alone, as distinguished from proprietary capacity, would constitute "duty on tonnage," prohibited by Constitution (Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10).

16. Commerce ⇨78.

Imposition of wharfage or dockage fee by municipality on all vessels coming into harbor, irrespective of whether they use facilities or not, constitutes "duty on tonnage," prohibited by Constitution (Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10).

17. Commerce ⇨78.

Ordinance requiring every vessel to land at municipality's wharves, or, upon paying same charge, be permitted to land at some other wharf, held "duty on tonnage," prohibited by Constitution (St. 1911, pp. 1254, 1258; Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10).

Ordinance provided, in substance, that all vessels with certain exceptions "shall land or moor at the exclusive landings and landing places" established and prescribed "and at no other place in said harbor, without the written permission of the harbor manager, first had for that purpose, which shall be granted on payment to the city" of the dockage, wharfage, and tolls which would have accrued to city if permit had not been granted.

18. Municipal corporations ⇨719(1).

Ordinance requiring all vessels with certain exceptions to moor at wharves of city or pay wharfage charges held not valid exercise of police power (St. 1911, pp. 1254, 1258).

Appeals from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Two separate actions by the City of Oakland against the E. K. Wood Lumber Company, and two separate actions by the City of Oakland against the Pacific Fuel & Building Material Company and another. From judgments dismissing actions, plaintiff in each case appeals.

Appeals consolidated pursuant to stipulation. Judgment in each case affirmed.

Markell C. Baer, of Oakland (Hilton J. Melby, of Oakland, of counsel), for appellant.

Decoto & Calkins, Calkins, Haga, Hall & Linforth, and Clark & Heafey, all of Oakland, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

The appeals in the cases above entitled are from judgments dismissing the actions after an order sustaining demurrers to the complaints without leave to amend. On stipulation the appeals were ordered consolidated and will be disposed of by one opinion.

The city of Oakland filed two actions against E. K. Wood Lumber Company. In the first action it was alleged that the defendant operated a certain landing place or wharf in the city of Oakland as lessee, pursuant to a lease executed by the city of Oakland to said defendant; that pursuant to the provisions of ordinance No. 991 (N. S.), establishing the harbor of the city of Oakland and providing for the regulation and control of the landing and mooring of vessels at the exclusive landing places designated therein, the defendant became indebted to the city of Oakland for wharfage and dockage fees due by virtue of the landing and mooring to the defendant's wharf, which is not one of the exclusive landing places established by said ordinance of vessels belonging to or operated by the defendant without the written permission of the harbor manager first had and obtained and without also paying to the plaintiff any dockage or tolls upon said vessels, etc. The plaintiff by that action sought to recover the amounts to which it would have been entitled had said vessels landed or moored at the exclusive landing places provided for by said ordinance. By the second action against the defendant E. K. Wood Lumber Company, the plaintiff, pursuant to the same ordinance, sought to recover amounts alleged to have been collected on its behalf by the defendant, as wharfage and dockage tolls from other persons operating ships arriving and landing at the wharf leased by said defendant. Two similar actions were filed against the defendants Pacific Fuel & Building Material Company et al., as the operators of Pacific Fuel & Building Material Company wharf, also not included by said ordinance as one of the exclusive landing places of the harbor of the city of Oakland, with the exception that in the latter complaints the source of the right to operate the wharf is not alleged. The time when the tolls, charges, etc., are claimed to have become due to the plaintiff covers a period beginning in February, 1917. The actions were filed in September, 1922.

It is not contended that the complaints do not allege sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action if said ordinance No. 991 (N. S.) is valid. The main question on the appeals involves the validity of said ordinance in so far as it provides that all vessels, with the exceptions therein stated, shall land or moor at the exclusive landing places established and maintained by the city of Oakland, or shall pay wharfage and other charges in accordance with section 4 thereof.

On May 1, 1911, several hundreds of acres of certain described tide and submerged lands in San Francisco bay were granted by the state to the city of Oakland (St. 1911, pp. 1254, 1258), in trust for use by said city only for the establishment, improvement, and conduct of a harbor, and for the construction, maintenance, and operation thereon of wharves, docks, piers, etc., without power of alienation, except in the granting of franchises for limited periods, or leasing the same or parts thereof for limited periods for purposes consistent with the trust. The act further provided that said harbor shall be improved by the city without expense to the state and shall always remain a public harbor for all purposes of commerce and navigation, but that neither the city nor its successors shall make any discrimination in the rates, tolls, or charges or facilities for any use or service in connection therewith.

Pursuant to said grant and said trust, the city of Oakland commenced and completed the construction of wharves and landing places within the area granted by the state. On April 16, 1916, the city council enacted ordinance No. 991 (N. S.), entitled: "An ordinance establishing the harbor of the City of Oakland, regulating, controlling and restraining the landing and moorage of steamboats, sailing vessels, rafts, tugboats and all other water craft in said harbor, regulating the maintenance and erection of structures and other incumbrances over or in the tidewaters of said harbor, and prohibiting encroachments therein and providing penalties." The ordinance established and declared the entire water front and all tidewater and navigable water in the city of Oakland as the harbor of the city of Oakland. Section 3 thereof prescribed certain specified portions of the water front as and for the exclusive landings and landing places in said harbor, which are the wharves and landing places controlled and maintained by the city of Oakland. Section 4 of said ordinance provides: "All steamboats, sailing vessels, rafts, tugboats, and all other water craft (excepting only such vessels, ferryboats and other water craft of any railroad corporation having terminal facilities in said harbor as are operated and exclusively used by it in the conduct of its railroad) shall land or moor at the exclusive landings and landing places hereinabove established and prescribed, and at no other place in said harbor, without the written permission of the harbor manager, first had for that purpose, which shall be granted on payment to the City of Oakland of the dockage, wharfage and tolls which would have accrued to the City of Oakland if such permit had not been granted, and upon compliance with such harbor rules and regulations as are now or may hereafter be provided by the City of Oakland. Provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to restrain or control the lawful rights of the owner or holder of any valid subsisting franchise, privilege, or lease granted by competent authority." The ordinance provided fines or imprisonment for violation of its provisions.

On behalf of the defendants it is contended that the charges attempted to be imposed by the ordinance constitute a tax on vessels entering the port in violation of section 10 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States which provides that "No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty of tonnage"; that the enactment cannot be upheld as a valid exercise of the police power of the city; and that as to the defendant E. K. Wood Lumber Company any collection of such charges as against it pursuant to the terms of the ordinance would unlawfully impair contract rights and constitute a taking without due process inasmuch as said defendant operates its own wharf by virtue of the lease executed to it by the plaintiff city, and that, so it is contended, said lease by its terms also grants the privilege or franchise, irrevocable for the terms of the lease, to collect dockage and tolls from others for the use of the leased wharf.

[1-3] While the right to collect tolls for wharfage and dockage is stated by some authorities to be an incident to the ownership of land abutting on a navigable body of water, the better view is that such a right is a franchise which must have its origin in a legislative grant. Dillon, Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) vol. 1, p. 504, and cases cited. The right to collect wharfage and dockage tolls is a franchise. De Witt v. Hays, 2 Cal. 463, 468, 56 Am. Dec. 352; Pac. Coast S. S. Co. v. Kimball, 114 Cal. 414, 417, 46 P. 275; Pol. Code, § 2906. The lease executed by the plaintiff to the defendant, which is annexed to the complaint, does not expressly grant a franchise or privilege to conduct a general wharfage business. The language relied upon as nevertheless conferring the privilege is the following: "No discrimination in rates, tolls, or charges, or in facilities for any use or service in connection therewith, shall ever be made, authorized or permitted by said lessee, its successors or assigns, in the management, conduct or operation of any of the utilities, structures or appliances mentioned in this lease." But such language may not be considered as being effective to add anything to the operative portion of such an instrument which is not expressly granted thereby. Instruments executed by a public body are construed most strongly in favor of the grantor. Civ. Code, § 1069; Los Angeles v. San Pedro, etc., R. R. Co., 182 Cal. 652, 189 P. 449. In Pac. Coast S. S. Co. v. Kimball, supra, the grant of the leasehold estate in the wharf and the grant of such a franchise were distinguished, and the former was held not to include the latter, at least so as to constitute the lessee a public utility. Such an incident of the property rights of the operator of a wharf in the absence of a franchise must be deemed to exist, therefore, only until there is a lawful interference by the state or municipality. By its own terms, however, the ordinance excepts from its operation leases granted by competent authority. Pursuant to this exception the defendant's right to use the wharf to land vessels owned or operated by it is preserved and unimpaired, unless the requirement that the defendant's vessels dock at the exclusive landing places named is a valid exercise of the police power.

[4-7] It is recognized that the owner of land riparian to a navigable body of water has no right below the high-tide line as against the state, the property in and dominion and sovereignty over the soils "covered and uncovered by the flow and ebb of the neap or ordinary tides" having been reserved to the states subject to the rights granted to the United States by the Constitution (Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S. 1, 14 S. Ct. 548, 38 L. Ed. 331), and on the same equality to California (Weber v. Harbor Commissioners, 85 U. S. [18 Wall.] 57, 21 L. Ed. 798), which holds the title in trust for the benefit of the people for purposes of navigation and fishing (Ward v. Mulford, 32 Cal. 365, 372). The erection of a wharf, dock, or other construction over tidelands by individuals without license is an encroachment upon the sovereignty or a purpresture which belongs to the state as the owner of the soil to which it is affixed. People v. Davidson, 30 Cal. 379; Dana v. Jackson Street Wharf Co., 31 Cal. 118, 89 Am. Dec. 164; Taylor v. Underhill, 40 Cal. 471, 473; Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S. 1, 59, 14 S. Ct. 548, 38 L. Ed. 331; Weber v. Harbor Commissioners, 85 U. S. [18 Wall.] 57, 21 L. Ed. 798; 26 Cal. Jur., pp. 301, 311, 315 et seq., 590 and cases cited. The right of access which a littoral owner has from his land to the ocean or other navigable body may not prevail as against the state or its grantee in the exercise of a lawful use or purpose. Const. art. 15, § 2; Boone v. Kingsbury, 206 Cal. 148, 170, 273

P. 797, citing Shively v. Bowlby, supra; 26 Cal. Jur. 301.

[8, 9] By section 3 of article 15 of our Constitution all tidelands within two miles of any incorporated city or town fronting on the waters of any navigable harbor, bay, etc., are withheld from grant or sale to private persons or corporations. Rights to erect wharves are vested by special grant, privilege, or franchise subject to the same trust by which the title is held by the state. Eldridge v. Cowell, 4 Cal. 80; 26 Cal. Jur., p. 591. In furtherance of the trust for the public benefit and subject thereto, upon which such lands are held by it, the state may grant its tidelands to municipalities (City of Oakland v. Oakland Water Front Co., 118 Cal. 160, 185, 50 P. 277; McQuillin Municipal Corporations [2d Ed.] vol. 1, pp. 1020, 1021; Dillon, Municipal Corporations [5th Ed.] vol. 1, pp. 474, 481, 496; 26 Cal. Jur., pp. 329, 334, 593 and cases cited), with power to build and maintain wharves for public use and with power to grant leases, privileges, and franchises to private persons (St. 1911, pp. 1254, 1258; 26 Cal. Jur., pp. 335-6; City of Oakland v. Williams, 206 Cal. 315, 274 P. 328; City of Oakland v. Larue Wharf & Warehouse Co., 179 Cal. 207, 212, 176 P. 361).

[10-12] Unquestionably the municipality so vested which has erected or acquired wharves, piers, docks, etc., for the use of the public may make reasonable wharfage and dockage charges for services and facilities rendered and furnished by it, and such a reasonable charge will not constitute a duty of tonnage prohibited by article 1, § 10, of the Constitution of the United States. Dillon, Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) vol. 1, p. 513; McQuillin, Municipal Corporations (2d Ed.) vol. 1, pp. 1017, 1020; Packet Co. v. Keokuk, 95 U. S. 80, 24 L. Ed. 377; Packet Co. v. St. Louis, 100 U. S. 423, 25 L. Ed. 688; Vicksburg v. Tobin, 100 U. S. 430, 25 L. Ed. 690; Transportation Co. v. Parkersburg, 107 U. S. 691, 2 S. Ct. 732, 27 L. Ed. 584; Huse v. Glover, 119 U. S. 543, 7 S. Ct. 313, 30 L. Ed. 487; People v. Roberts, 92 Cal. 659, 28 P. 689. It is established that neither a state nor a municipality may be permitted to impose a tax upon tonnage under cover of laws or ordinances ostensibly passed to collect wharfage, and such ordinances will be carefully scrutinized. Packet Co. v. Keokuk, supra, page 86 of 95 U. S. The leading case in which such legislation was held by the Supreme Court to impose a duty of tonnage, and the case mainly relied upon by the defendants as controlling the determination of the question in the present instance, is Cannon v. New Orleans, 87 U. S. (20 Wall.) 577, 581, 22 L. Ed. 417. There the city of New Orleans passed an ordinance which provided for the collection of levee and wharfage dues from all steamboats which should moor or land in any part of the port of

New Orleans. It was held on the state of the evidence in that case that, since the ordinance applied to vessels landing anywhere within the city limits, and the fees were by the terms of the ordinance collectible from vessels which landed at any point on the banks of the river, without regard to the existence of wharves, the dues claimed could not be supported as a compensation for the use of the city's wharves, but that they constituted a tax upon every vessel which stopped, either by landing or mooring, in the waters of the Mississippi river within the city of New Orleans, for the privilege of so landing or mooring. It was there stated: "Whatever more general or more limited view may be entertained of the true meaning of this clause [that no state shall, without the consent of congress, lay any duty of tonnage], it is perfectly clear that a duty or tax or burden imposed under the authority of the State, which is, by the law imposing it, to be measured by the capacity of the vessel, and is in its essence a contribution claimed for the privilege of arriving and departing from a port of the United States, is within the prohibition." The defendants herein contend that the charge imposed by the ordinance is in its essence a contribution for the privilege merely of stopping in the plaintiff's harbor.

[13-17] We may take judicial knowledge of the fact that vessels engaged in commerce are not accustomed to stop or land in the harbor of the city of Oakland except at a wharf or pier or similar accommodation, and the effect of the present ordinance must necessarily be to collect the charge imposed from such vessel which lands or moors in the harbor of the city of Oakland, whether at the plaintiff's or some other wharf, or dock, or pier. It is conceded that the plaintiff may exact a wharfage or dockage fee from all who elect to stop at its wharves. But it appears to be settled that such a charge may be imposed only in its proprietary as distinguished from its sovereign capacity. When it becomes an imposition by virtue of sovereignty alone, i. e., where the limits of the imposition are not co-extensive with the bounds of its proprietary capacity, it then becomes a tax in violation of the Constitution. It is stated in Packet Co. v. Keokuk, 95 U. S. 80, at pages 84 and 85, 24 L. Ed. 377: "But a charge for services rendered or for conveniences provided is in no sense a tax or a duty. It is not a hindrance or impediment to free navigation. The prohibition to the State against the imposition of a duty of tonnage was designed to guard against local hindrances to trade and carriage by vessels, not to relieve them from liability to claims for assistance rendered and facilities furnished for trade and commerce. It is a tax or a duty that is prohibited; something imposed by virtue of sovereignty, not claimed in right of proprietorship. Wharfage is of the latter character. Providing a wharf to which vessels may make fast, or at which they may conveniently load or unload, is rendering them a service. The character of the service is the same whether the wharf is built and offered for use by a State, a municipal corporation, or a private individual; and, when compensation is demanded for the use of the wharf, the demand is an assertion, not of sovereignty, but of a right of property. A passing vessel may use the wharf or not, at its election, and thus may incur liability for wharfage or not, at the choice of the master or owner." All of the cases cited by counsel and which independent research has discovered so limit and define the right of the state or municipality to collect wharfage and dockage fees. Other cases of the nature defined by Cannon v. New Orleans are cited and reviewed in Packet Co. v. Keokuk, 95 U. S. 80, 86, 24 L. Ed. 377. See, also, Inman Steamship Co. v. Tinker, 94 U. S. 238, 24 L. Ed. 118. Any imposition of such a charge on all vessels which land in the harbor, irrespective of whether they use the facilities and services furnished by the municipality when there may exist an election to do otherwise, must be held to be an impost on navigation and therefore unconstitutional. The fact that they land at some wharf within the harbor is not sufficient. The charge may only be exacted in exchange for facilities or services belonging to or furnished by the municipality imposing the charge. We can see no escape from the conclusion that the present ordinance requiring every vessel to land at the city's wharves, or, upon paying the same charge, be entitled to a permit to land at some other wharf in the city, is not a charge, as to vessels so landing elsewhere, for facilities or services furnished by the city. As to such vessels the exaction must be deemed to be a charge for the privilege merely of stopping in the plaintiff's harbor and, as such, constitutes a restriction on free commerce and navigation in violation of the constitutional prohibition.

The plaintiff relies on City of Dubuque v. Stout, 32 Iowa, 80, 7 Am. Rep. 171, as authority for the rule that legislation will be considered valid which provides that vessels may be permitted to land elsewhere on payment of the same wharfage fees. But in that case there was no question of a tax. All of the charges were for use of the city's facilities, and the ordinance provided that boats other than steamships might use other city landing places than the places specially designated upon permission of the harbor master, who might grant such permission on payment of the same wharfage dues. The regulation was obviously based upon the necessity for proper policing and protection.

[18] The plaintiff attempts to justify the present ordinance as a valid exercise of its police power in the regulation and control of the harbor of the city of Oakland. It contends that the authorities establish the power of the municipality to "monopolize its waterfront, and require all vessels to land at its wharves and landing and pay wharfage" (28 Cyc. 923); to prescribe "the rates of wharfage on wharves owned by the state or by the municipality, or by private parties, or prescribing a penalty for landing at a place other than a government wharf" (12 C. J. 117); that "a city may designate the proper landing places and prohibit the use of others" (Cincinnati, etc., Packet Co. v. Catlettsburg, 105 U. S. 559, 26 L. Ed. 1169); that a "city may regulate the construction, maintenance and use of landing places, docks and piers within the corporate limits, and require all vessels to land at its wharves" (44 C. J. 1093). The plaintiff also relies on City of Dubuque v. Stout, 32 Iowa, 80, 7 Am. Rep. 171. City of Dubuque v. Stout, 32 Iowa, 47, and City of Keokuk v. Keokuk Northern Line Packet Co., 45 Iowa, 196, as establishing the power of the municipality as a police regulation to compel all vessels to land at the public wharves maintained by it.

There can be no question of the correctness of the statements from the foregoing texts as applied to the facts in the cases cited in support thereof. All of those and similar cases relied upon by the plaintiff involve the exercise of the police power in the protection of the banks of such rivers as the Mississippi or the Ohio, and in none of them does it appear that any wharves existed except those maintained by the municipality. It does appear, however, in some of those cases that large steamers, in order to escape payment of wharfage and dockage charges, persisted in landing along the banks of the river to the great detriment thereof. A pertinent statement in Packet Co. v. Catlettsburg, supra, page 562 of 105 U. S., may be said to be the basis of the decision in all of those cases, viz.: "There can be no doubt that the rules which govern the landing and departure of vessels at points situated on navigable waters may seriously affect them in their business of navigation and transportation, and in some sense such rules are regulations of commerce. On the other hand, the necessity is obvious of the existence in each port, where vessels as large as steamboats land at the shore and deposit their cargoes on the banks of navigable streams, of some authority to prescribe the places where this may be done, the time of doing it, and the points at which they may discharge cargo, both as relates to the streets, shores, houses of the town, and other vessels landing at the same time. The protection of the shore of the sea or bank of a river on which a town is situated is a necessity to the town, and the washing and crumbling of the bank from the agitation of the waters, made by the landing of large steamers, demand that such regulations should exist." The power claimed by the plaintiff to exist in municipalities to monopolize their harbors and require all vessels to land at the public wharves maintained by the city would seem to be upheld by language appearing in the case of Dubuque v. Stout, 32 Iowa, 80, 7 Am. Rep. 171, but in City of Keokuk v. Keokuk Northern Line Packet Co., 45 Iowa, 196, that result is shown to depend on the valid exercise of the police power. In the latter case it was stated: "In the exercise of their police powers the cities of the State may control the landings of boats, designating the place they shall receive or discharge freight and passengers. It is within their power to require this to be done at these wharves and to charge reasonable compensation therefor. The City of Dubuque v. Stout, 32 Iowa, 80 [7 Am. Rep. 171]. This doctrine is founded upon the clearest reason, well understood by all persons familiar with the transaction of business upon the Mississippi river. * * * We have seen that cities may build wharves and charge for their use a sum that would be a just compensation. Now unless they have power to compel vessels to land at the wharves, the masters of vessels, in order to escape payment of wharfage fees, may discharge and receive cargoes on the natural banks of the river, to the inconvenience and loss of shippers and consignees. This power is necessary to enable the cities to exercise their police authority in providing places for the landing of vessels. It has never been doubted that the police power of the State, exercised through the municipal corporations, may regulate in this way transactions connected with commerce. We will not be expected to cite authorities in support of a doctrine so familiar. It is fully recognized in the case which we now proceed to consider," and the opinion then proceeds to a discussion of Cannon v. New Orleans, supra. There is not in the present case even the semblance of an attempt to show the existence of any facts which would justify the ordinance as an exercise of the police power. With respect to the section of the ordinance under consideration, there is no police regulation to be enforced by the harbor manager. He has no discretion in granting or refusing the permit, but he must grant the same on payment of the required charges. This plainly characterizes the charge as a tax.

Inasmuch as none of the complaints seeks to recover for charges which may properly be imposed by the city for services rendered at its wharves or for facilities furnished by it, the demurrers were properly sustained.

The judgment in each of the cases consolidated is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WARD.

Cr. 1140.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Nov. 3, 1930.

Criminal law ⇨1130(4).

Where defendant on appeal from conviction filed no brief and made no appearance when case was called for hearing, judgment was affirmed (Pen. Code, § 1253).

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County;
H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Joseph Ward was convicted of a felony, to wit, escape, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

C. I. Bennington, of Oroville, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM.

The defendant was convicted in the superior court of Butte county of a felony, to wit: Escape.

The transcript on appeal was filed in this court September 25, 1930. No brief has been filed in behalf of appellant. The cause was regularly placed on the calendar for oral argument on November 3, 1930. No appearance was made for appellant at the time the case was called for hearing. Pursuant to the provisions of section 1253 of the Penal Code, the judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF SAN DIEGO v. LA MESA, LEMON GROVE AND SPRING VALLEY IRR. DIST. et al.

Civ. 444.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Oct. 31, 1930.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 24, 1930.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court
Dec. 29, 1930.

1. Waters and water courses ⇨202.

Railroad commission had no control over irrigation district which purchased water system of utility under agreement to continue serving its customers (St. 1897, p. 254, as amended).

2. Waters and water courses ⇨203(6).

Transfer of utility's water system to city did not give railroad commission authority to fix rates charged by irrigation district (St. 1897, p. 254, as amended).

3. Waters and water courses ⇨203(6).

City had no authority to fix price of water purchased from irrigation district for individual consumers (St. 1897, p. 254, as amended).

4. Waters and water courses ⇨203(1).

Irrigation district could not fix rates in conflict with contract under which district acquired water system on condition of continuing to furnish water to utility's customers (Const. art. 11, § 13; California Irrigation District Act, § 55 [as amended by St. 1927, p. 205], § 61b [as added by St. 1915, p. 1291, § 1], § 15 [as amended by St. 1927, p. 23, § 1], § 15c [as added by St. 1917, p. 758, § 9], § 18 [as amended by St. 1929, p. 657], and § 39f [as amended by St. 1925, p. 501]).

Public utility engaged in impounding and distributing water for domestic use and irrigation purposes sold its entire system to irrigation district with exception of a portion remaining outside the district. The option given the irrigation district provided that the district should continue to furnish water to the outside territory now served by the utility "the price of said water to be nine cents per hundred cubic feet until such time as this rate may be changed by competent authority." The irrigation district further agreed not to ask for rehearing or re-rating for period of three years from date.

5. Waters and water courses ⇨203(1).

Irrigation district may not vary contract under guise of rate regulation.

6. Waters and water courses ⇨203(1).

Contract duty of irrigation district to furnish water to customers of utility at specified rate was not altered by utility's transfer of system to city.

7. Waters and water courses ⇨203(1).

Agreement of irrigation district purchasing utility's water system to continue to furnish water to customers outside district at specified rate until changed by "competent authority" was binding, and district did not become "competent authority" referred to.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Competent Authority," see Words and Phrases.]

8. Waters and water courses ⇨201.

Contract of irrigation district to furnish water to utility for customers outside district was not subject to termination after reasonable time.

9. Waters and water courses ⇨201.

Where irrigation district acquired water system under agreement to continue to furnish water for outside customers, water was dedicated to use of customers and was not "surplus water" which district could sell at its pleasure (Const. art. 11, § 13; California Irrigation District Act, § 55 [as amended by St. 1927, p. 205], § 61b [as added by St. 1915, p. 1291, § 1], § 15 [as amended by St. 1927, p. 23, § 1], § 15c [as added by St. 1917, p. 758, § 9], § 18 [as amended by St. 1929, p. 657], and § 39f [as amended by St. 1925, p. 501]).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Surplus Water," see Words and Phrases.]

10. Waters and water courses ⇨203(1).

Contract whereby irrigation district agreed to furnish water to utility at specified rate until changed by "competent authority" permitted change only by some authorized public agency.

11. Contracts ⇨170(1).

In case of doubt as to contract, court may look to understanding acted upon by parties.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; V. N. Thompson, Judge.

Action by the City of San Diego against the La Mesa, Lemon Grove and Spring Valley Irrigation District and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Modified and affirmed.

Stearns, Luce & Forward, of San Diego, for appellants.

M. W. Conkling and C. L. Byers, both of San Diego, for respondent.

BARNARD, J.

This is an appeal from an order and judgment restraining the defendant irrigation district from discontinuing or shutting off a supply of water, and from raising the rate for the service of such water until such time as such action should be authorized, either by the railroad commission of the state of California or by the city of San Diego. The action was submitted to the trial court upon stipulated facts, which were adopted by the court as its findings. The agreed facts may be briefly stated as follows:

For some time prior to April 5, 1924, the Cuyamaca Water Company was a public utility engaged in impounding and distributing water for domestic use and irrigation purposes over a considerable area in San Diego county. On April 5, 1924, the Cuyamaca Water Company gave to the La Mesa, Lemon Grove and Spring Valley irrigation district an option to buy, in consideration of $1, 100,000, its entire system with the exception of a portion which was to remain outside of the irrigation district in which area the public utility was to continue to serve the consumers and as to which territory the option contained the following provision:

"It is understood that for East San Diego, Normal Heights and Kensington Park territory now being furnished with water by the Cuyamaca System, the district will continue to furnish water to us through a master meter at the east line of the East San Diego city limits, the price of said water to be nine (9) cents per hundred cubic feet until such time as this rate may be changed by competent authority; and further we agree not to ask for a rehearing or rerating for a period of three (3) years from date."

On June 13, 1925, a written agreement was entered into by which the irrigation district agreed to purchase from the water company the properties described in the option, upon the terms therein set forth, subject, however, to the consent of the railroad commission of the state of California. On June 15, 1925, the railroad commission authorized the sale, its opinion and order reciting that the officials of the irrigation district had represented that it was the intention and desire of the district to "assume all of the service obligations of the Cuyamaca Water Company," and the order was made subject to the condition that the consideration paid should not later be urged as a finding as to the value of the property for the purpose of rate fixing before the commission, "or any other public body." The order was also contingent upon the irrigation district filing with the commission its agreement to serve an adequate supply of water to all the present consumers of the Cuyamaca Water Company, outside the boundaries of said district, except such consumers as under the terms of the option were to continue to be served by the water company itself. Thereafter, the irrigation district passed such a resolution and filed the same with the commission, following which the actual transfer was consummated by deed. Later, the city of East San Diego, Normal Heights, and portions of Kensington Park were annexed to the city of San Diego, and thereafter, on September 27, 1926, the Cuyamaca Water Company gave to the city of San Diego a lease, with an exclusive option to purchase for $150,000, covering that part of their system which had been reserved by them in the sale to the irrigation district. On January 26, 1927, the railroad commission approved transfer from the water company to the city of San Diego. Thereafter, the district continued to furnish to the city such water for distribution in East San Diego, Normal Heights, and Kensington Park at the 9-cent rate until March 1, 1929, at which time the district notified the city that the rate thereafter would be increased to 25 cents per hundred cubic feet for the first thousand cubic feet, and 15 cents per hundred cubic feet for all additional water. Upon the refusal of the city of San Diego to pay bills rendered at this higher rate, a notice was served that unless the bills were paid the water would be shut off. This action followed. It is stipulated that at all times herein involved the Cuyamaca Water Company was a public utility engaged in the business of supplying, selling, and distributing water appropriated, dedicated, and impressed with a public use to the consumers entitled thereto for domestic, agricultural and municipal purposes.
